TAYLOR, Thomas Rawson, b. at Ossett, near Wakefield, May 7, 1807; d. at Airedale, March 7, 1835; a Congregational minister at Sheffield, and tutor at Airedale College. He wrote only a few hymns, best known among them is "I'm but a stranger here." His Memoir and Remains appeared 1836. F. M. BIRD.

TAYLOR, William, D.D., a prominent and venerable minister of the Presbyterian Church in Canada; b. in the parish of Dennie, Scotland.

March 18, 1803; d. in Montreal, Can., Sept. 4, 1876. His father was a farmer. After the usual preparation in school and college, he attended the Theological Hall of the Secession Church for five sessions, and was licensed to preach in 1827. In 1831 he was ordained the pastor of a congregation in Peebles. In 1833, along with two other ministers, Messrs. Thornton and Murray, he was sent to Canada, where a mission had been commenced the preceding year. He arrived in Montreal immediately after the city had suffered severely from the scourge of cholera. He was immediately called as the pastor of a congregation just formed, and was installed July, 1833. He retained the same pastoral charge till the close of his life, — forty-three years. Dr. Taylor was a thorough scholar, an able theologian, an earnest preacher, and a wise counsellor in all ecclesiastical affairs. He was an acknowledged leader in the church courts, and held a high place in the esteem of his brethren in the ministry. He labored for years most indefatigably to secure the union of all the branches of the Presbyterian Church, and had the happiness to see its accomplishment in 1875. He was truly an apostle in the cause of temperance, and an able advocate of every cause of social and moral reform. He was specially interested in the evangelization of the French Canadians. His manners were courtly, yet affable, his devotion to his work zealous and unflagging, his ministry successful and greatly blessed, his influence great and widely extended, his life pure and eminently useful, his death calm and peaceful; and his memory is cherished, not only by the congregation whom he served so long and so faithfully, and by the city where his labors abounded, but by the whole denomination, which long regarded him as one of her pillars. He published many articles and several able discourses on the topics of the day. WILLIAM ORMISTON.

TE DEUM. See AMBROSIAN MUSIC.

TELELOGY (from τέλος, "an end," and λόγος, "discourse"), a technical term denoting a line of speculative researches concerning the final ends involved in and revealed by the phenomena of nature. The teleological or physico-theological argument on the existence of God is based on this line of evidence.

TELESPHORUS (Bishop of Rome, 128-139) was a native of Greece. Nothing is known of his reign. The reports of his regulations concerning the Easter fast, and his introduction of the Gloria and the three masses at Christmas, depend upon an interpolated passage in the Chronicle of Eusebius, and a spurious sermon of Ambrose.

TELLER, Wilhelm Abraham, b. at Leipzig in 1734; d. at Köln-an-der-Spree, Dec. 9, 1804; one of the shining lights of the rationalism of the eighteenth century. He was educated, and pursued his theological studies, in his native city, and began to lecture at the university there in 1755. In 1761 he was appointed professor of theology at Helmstadt, and in 1764 he published his Lehrbuch des christlichen Glaubens. The book created quite a sensation, though it represents rationalism only in its first stage. Irrespective of the time-honored scheme which ruled with almost absolute authority, he arranged all the materials of doctrinal theology under the two heads, the realm of sin and the realm of grace; and all such doctrines as would not fit in that arrangement he omitted. The doctrine of God he referred to natural religion; the doctrine of the Trinity he did not mention; the expression "hereditary sin" he declared a contradictio in adjecto. It became a little difficult for him to keep his chair; but, just as the situation grew dangerously difficult, he was by the Berlin Government appointed provost of Köln-an-der-Spree, and member of the provincial consistory. In 1772 he published his Wörterbuch des Neuen Testaments, representing the second stage of rationalism. In this dictionary he does not pretend to give a linguistic explanation of the words occurring in the New Testament: it is a philosophical explanation he aims at. Convinced that a thorough understanding of the peculiar Græco-Hebraic manner of speech will offer a new key to the understanding of the doctrines of the New Testament, he lays hand on the task, and explains that such an expression as the "kingdom of heaven" (which Christ had come to found) is simply a peculiar Græco-Hebraic idiom, meaning nothing but a "new religion." The same is, of course, the case with such expressions as law and gospel, sacrifice and atonement, etc. The edict of 1788 again brought him into difficulties; and on account of his vote in the trial of Schulze he was sentenced to suspension for three months, and a fine to the insane-asylum. Nevertheless, in 1792 he was able to publish his Die Religion der Vollkommenen, which represents the very perfection of rationalism. Christianity is there explained to have been, from the very day of its birth, in a steady process of development, which will not stop until it has made the Christian religion a religion of morals only. See FR. NICOLAI: Gedächtnisschrift auf Teller, 1807. THIOLUCK.

TELLIER, Michael le, b. at Vire, Normandy, Dec. 16, 1648; d. at La Flèche, Sept. 2, 1719. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1661; devoted himself for some time to the study of history, but threw himself finally into theological polemics. By his attacks on the Jansenists he acquired so great a notoriety that he was made a provincial of his order, and appointed confessor to Louis XIV. after the death of Père La Chaise in 1709. He was fanatical, ambitious, unimpressible, a master of diplomatic trickery; and he had the old king completely in his power. The destruction of Port-Royal, the condemnation of Quesnel's writings, the enforcement of the bull Unigenitus, were among his principal exploits. After the death of Louis XIV. he was banished from the court. C. SCHMIDT.

TEMPERANCE. Our English word "temperance" is of Latin derivation. Its etymological meaning may perhaps be best understood by observing that of the verb "temper." Plastic substances, mortar for example, are properly tempered when their ingredients are mingled in correct proportions, with the result of making the article exactly fit for the purposes for which it is designed. A steel tool is tempered to a standard degree of hardness. Temperance as a virtue is the virtue of being properly tempered for the purposes for which a human being is designed. One possesses this virtue in the proportion in which he possesses desirable elements of character desirably balanced.

This is, therefore, a good word by which to translate the Greek ἑγκρατεία of the New Testament. The latter term properly denotes mastery over one's self. A self-controlled character is a well-tempered character, at least in some important respects.

But it is not without good reason that the word has come to be prevailingly restricted to a much narrower meaning. The use of intoxicating drinks is so conspicuously connected with the loss of self-mastery and of proper balance, that we very naturally connect the terms "temperance" and "intemperance" peculiarly and almost exclusively with the drinking-habit.

Intoxicants, in the form of wine and beer at least, have been known from the earliest historical times; and the vice of drunkenness has also been known. This is evident from the familiar biblical instances of Noah, Nabal, and others, from the figures on the early Egyptian monuments, from the Greek myths concerning Bacchus, and from many other sources. But the conditions of the problem of drunkenness have been very materially changed within the last few centuries by the extent to which the art of distillation has been developed. This art has long been known and practised; but it was not until a comparatively recent period that it came to be the powerful means it now is for increasing and cheapening the world's stock of intoxicating beverages.

According to an article by Professor Theodore W. Dwight, LL.D., published in the Independent of April 27, 1882, the earliest recognition of the existence of distilled liquors to be found in English legislation is in the year 1629; and it was not until much later in the seventeenth century, that these came to be recognized as in general use. As might have been expected, their introduction greatly increased the evils of intemperance. Says the Encyclopædia Britannica, in its article on "Gin,"—

"In the early part of the eighteenth century, gin-shops multiplied with great rapidity in London; and the use of the beverage increased to an extent so demoralizing, that retailers actually exhibited placards in their windows, intimating that there people might get drunk for a penny, and that clean straw, in comfortable cellars, would be provided for customers."

Contemporaneously with these changes in the facilities for the practice of drunkenness occurred certain other changes in men's habits of living, which also greatly affected the question of the use of alcoholic drinks. Coffee was known as early as 875 A.D., but it was first brought from Abyssinia into Arabia early in the fifteenth century. Coffee-houses were established in Constantinople about the middle of the sixteenth century, and in London in 1652; and, before the close of the seventeenth century, coffee was a customary beverage in Europe. Chocolate and tea came to be generally used as beverages within a few years of the same time.

In both these directions, throughout Europe and America, and parts of Asia and Africa, the generation of men who were of middle age about the year 1700 witnessed a radical revolution in the conditions of human life. In their childhood, fermented alcoholic drinks were the one resource of men, not only for purposes of intoxication, but for all the purposes for which tea, cocoa, and coffee are now employed. They lived to see the fermented beverages largely superseded, in the one use of them by distilled liquors, and in the other use of them by the hot drinks which have ever since been on our tables. In their childhood, however plenty wine and ale may relatively be said to have been, they were yet scarce enough so that habitual drunkenness was beyond the reach of any except those who had access to the cellars of the rich. Before they died anybody could get drunk, at any time, for a penny.

It should be added to this, that the use of tobacco became general during the seventeenth century. And as having a real, though less direct, connection with the temperance problem, we must count all the marvellous discoveries and inventions which have rendered human life in these later centuries so utterly different from what it ever was before.

These radical changes of condition naturally led to corresponding changes in the convictions of men in regard to the use of alcoholic drinks. To trace the development of these convictions is to sketch the history of the modern temperance reform in America and the Old World.

Until the current century, the general opinion of mankind has certainly not condemned the use of intoxicating drinks, nor even occasional drunkenness, provided the drinker kept himself prudently guarded from further bad results. Philo the Jew, contemporary with Jesus, wrote extensive treatises on Drunkenness and Sobriety, which are largely of the nature of allegorical comment on the passages in the Mosaic writings which mention the use of wine. These include a formal discussion of the question, "Whether the wise man will get drunk?" He replies by citing the expressed opinions of men, as well as evidence of other sorts, on both sides of the question. He says that "the sons of physicians and philosophers of high repute . . . have left behind ten thousand commentaries entitled treatises on drunkenness," and censures these for the narrowness of their treatment of the subject. He insists on the difference between the drinking of "unmixed wine," which will produce intoxication, and that of light or diluted wines. He calls unmixed wine a poison and a medicine. He condemns the drinking contests which were common in his day. He exposes in graphic pictures the vileness of drunken orgies and riots, and the deterioration of health and morals which results therefrom. He holds that "the wise man will never of his own accord think fit to enter upon a contest of hard drinking, unless there were great things at stake, such as the safety of his country, or the honor of his parents," etc. But he none the less indorses what he represents to be the current opinion; namely, that a wise man will occasionally get drunk. His helplessness when drunk no more disproves his wisdom than if it resulted from a bilious attack, or from sleep, or from death. Philo intimates that the opposite opinion is quite respectably defended, but proves, to his own complete satisfaction, that it is indefensible. His explanation of the doctrine of the Scriptures in the matter is, that "Moses looks upon an unmixed wine as a symbol, not of one thing only, but of many; namely, of trifling, and of playing the fool, and of all kinds of insensibility and of insatiable greediness, and of a cheerfulness which comprehends many other objects," and the like. Philo's opinion does not seem to be at all that the Scriptures commend drinking but condemn excess, but rather that they either commend or condemn, according to the aspect in which they look at the case; that is, they commend drinking, and even intoxication, when they associate these with cheerfulness and plenty, and condemn them when they look at them in connection with their bad results or accessories.

Philo's opinions concerning the drinking-habit are certainly those which have been commonly held until our own century. But, as far back as we can trace the matter, we also find a highly reputable line of opinion in favor of total abstinence from intoxicating beverages. Of this, in the eighteenth century, the distinguished Samuel Johnson is an instance. Somewhat earlier in the century, the author of Gil Blas sarcastically admires "the patriotic forecast of those ancient politicians who established places of public resort, where water was dealt out gratis to all customers, and who confined wine to the shops of the apothecaries, that its use might be prohibited, but under the direction of physicians," and the wisdom of those who frequented these resorts, not for "swilling themselves with wine, but . . . for the decent and economical amusement of drinking warm water" (Adventures of Gil Blas, book ii., chap. 4). This sarcasm must have been aimed at opinions held by respectable contemporaries of Le Sage. In 1743 John Wesley, in his General Rules, mentions as sinful, "drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." It is said that in 1733 the trustees of the Colony of Georgia, who were living in London, enacted that "the drink of rum in Georgia be absolutely prohibited, and that all which shall be brought there be staved." In the Colonies and in Great Britain, during that century, there were several instances of similar legislation. Samuel Pepys, in his Diary, 1659-69, figures as an inconsistent total abstainer. Going back with a bound to the times of Philo, we find him asserting (Treatise on Drunkenness, ii.) that "great numbers of persons, who, because they never touch unmixed wine, look upon themselves as sober," yet display the same foolishness, senselessness, lack of self-control, and the like, which are displayed by a drunken person. Still earlier familiar instances are those of the Rechabites and the Nazarites, of Samuel and Samson.

Nearly up to our own times, therefore, the world has been aware of the dangers and evils attendant upon the use of inebriating beverages, has been in possession of the idea of total abstinence from them, and has been compelled to look upon total abstainers with high respect, but has, on the whole, approved the use of such beverages, not merely in what is now sometimes called moderation, but up to the line of occasional and discreet drunkenness.

The revolution of opinion, at least as a great and controlling movement, began in America. A representative incident will indicate its nature. The incident is taken from the Collections of the Cayuga County Historical Society, 1882.

Joseph Tallcot was a member of the Society of Friends, living a few miles south of the town of Auburn, N.Y. In all that vicinity, in 1816, the crops were so short that poor people found it difficult to procure breadstuffs for food. At the same time, Tallcot noticed, the distilleries kept in operation. He says,—

"The circumstances affected me not a little, and induced me to write an address to the sober and influential part of the community, inviting them to a serious consideration of the melancholy situation, and the evils and calamitous consequences of intemperance. I insisted that nothing short of the example of that part of society which gives habits to the world, of abstaining altogether from the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes, would correct this alarming evil."

It occurred to Joseph Tallcot to offer his views for the consideration of the members of the Presbyterian synod of Geneva at one of their meetings held in Geneva. In his narrative he says,—

"I found my way to the house of Henry Axtell, the Presbyterian clergyman of that place. His brethren from the surrounding country soon began to come into the village, and call on him for instruction where they might find entertainment among their friends. The master of the house appeared very hospitable, inviting them to partake of his brandy; which they did, with what would be thought moderation. He turned to me, and pleasantly said he 'supposed it would be useless to invite me to partake,' considering my business. I as pleasantly replied, that 'we had been in the same habit, but, seeing the evil of it, we had abandoned it,' and I hoped they would do the same."

Joseph Tallcot read his paper, first before a committee, and afterward before the synod, and went his way. The synod, after duly considering it, published it, with resolutions "fully approving it, and solemnly declaring, that from that time they would abandon the use of ardent spirits, except for medical purposes; that they would speak against its common use from the pulpit, . . . and use their influence to prevail with others to follow their example."

Similar incidents were transpiring in different parts of the country and among people of various religious persuasions. In 1789 two hundred farmers of Litchfield, Conn., had pledged themselves for that season not to use distilled liquors in their farm-work. In 1791 Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia published his Medical Inquiry, in which he insisted that the use of distilled liquors as a beverage ought to be entirely abandoned. In 1812 the Presbyterian General Assembly made a deliverance "not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it." In the same year the General Association of Connecticut recommended entire abstinence from ardent spirits; while the Consociation of Fairfield County adopted the principle of total abstinence from all intoxicating drinks whatever, especially for "those whose appetite for drink is strong and increasing." The Temperate Society, formed at Moreau, N.Y., 1808, and the Boston Society for the Suppression of Intemperance, 1813, were not total abstinence bodies. In 1818 the Presbyterian Assembly planted itself squarely on the principle that men ought to "abstain from 'even the common use' of ardent spirits." In 1823 President Nott of Union College published his Sermons on the Evils of Intemperance. In 1826 the American Temperance Society was organized, The National Philanthropist was started, and Dr. Lyman Beecher published his Six Sermons on Intemperance. In the same year Rev. Calvin Chapin, in The Connecticut Observer, advocated abstinence from all intoxicating drinks, and not from distilled spirits merely. From about 1836 this principle came to be generally accepted by the reformers.

The spread of the movement was very rapid in Great Britain, and marvellously rapid in the United States. Societies, local and general, were organized. Temperance books, pamphlets, and newspapers were published in great numbers. Public meetings were held. The pledge was circulated. Total abstinents came to be counted by millions. Lancashire, Eng., contributed the word "teetotal" to characterize the reform. In 1840 six hard drinkers in Baltimore suddenly signed the pledge, and started the "Washingtonian" movement. In a few months, about 1838, the Irish Roman-Catholic priest, Father Mathew, administered the pledge to near a hundred and fifty thousand persons in Cork alone. He was eminently successful in temperance-work in different parts of Great Britain, as well as in the United States, which he visited in 1849.

Fuller accounts of the movement in this country may be found in the article on Temperance Reform, in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia, and in the article by Professor J. W. Mears, in the Presbyterian Review for 1881, p. 500; while the temperance article in the Library of Universal Knowledge is pretty full in regard to the movement in Great Britain. To these sources the present article is indebted for a few of its facts and dates.

Many seem to suppose that the effort to secure the legal prohibition of the liquor-traffic is a later and more advanced stage of the temperance reform than the efforts for total abstinence; but this is only true in a modified sense. We have already seen, that there was prohibitory legislation for the Colony of Georgia as early as 1733. Most of the other earlier attempts to restrict the use of liquors were accompanied either by demands for the legal restriction of their sale, or else by actual legislation for that purpose. Dr. Beecher's Six Sermons emphatically declared the remedy for intemperance to be "the banishment of ardent spirits from the list of lawful articles of commerce," and invoked the interference of legislation to this end, as well as of public sentiment (edition of 1828, p. 61). As the numbers of the temperance men increased, they became more and more pressing in their demands for legislative remedies. During the decade beginning about 1846, they found it easy to carry the elections in most parts of the United States. Rigid prohibitory laws were very generally enacted, and local option laws in a few instances where general prohibition could not be obtained. It proved easier to enact laws, however, than to execute them. In most cases they have either been pronounced unconstitutional, or repealed, or allowed to become a dead letter.

The passage of these laws may, perhaps, be regarded as the culmination of one great movement of temperance reform. The subject has not since been so prominently before the public. This is doubtless to be accounted for, in part by the fact that it has ceased to be a novelty, in part by the fact that the advocates of temperance have unwisely allowed their attention to be too largely diverted from the great issues at stake to the minor points in which they differ among themselves, and in part to the presence of other public questions of absorbing interest, notably those connected with our civil war. Many imagine that the temperance movement is receding, but there is no sufficient evidence that such is the case. The larger part of the increase of our population for forty years past has been of immigrants and their descendants; that is, of classes of people who did not participate in the great reform movement. During the same time there has been a drifting into the large towns, which have always been centres of temptation. Though our population has trebled, those classes of it among whom the reform achieved its principal successes have not increased in any thing like that ratio. In these circumstances, if the proportion of our total abstainers to our whole population were now half as large as it was forty years ago, that would probably indicate that the reform had held its own. But doubtless the ratio is at least as large now as it was then, instead of being much smaller; and this indicates, on the whole, a decided and steady progress. Among the Irish members of the Roman Church, in particular, the gain is very marked and gratifying; and it seems to be even more so in Great Britain and the different parts of Europe.

In the temperance-work of the past thirty years, the Sons of Temperance, the Good Templars, the Rechabites, and other so-called secret temperance organizations, have been quite prominent. The various red-ribbon and blue-ribbon movements are familiar to all. Organizations of women, as well as of men, have made their influence felt in what have been described as praying "crusades" in the places where liquors were sold, in working with voters for better laws, and doubtless yet more effectively in the establishing of friendly inns, coffee-houses, and the like, and in securing temperance sermons and addresses, circulating temperance literature, forming temperance schools, and introducing temperance instruction into Sunday schools. Possibly the work now done, though less public than formerly, is not less in amount, nor less effective.

For some years renewed attention has been paid to the legislative aspects of the subject. The laws recently enacted in Michigan, which attempt to restrict the traffic by a high special tax, without the form of a license, seem to many the best available kind of legislation; while prohibitory constitutional amendments such as have lately been approved by the popular vote of Kansas and Iowa are advocated by others. Experiments have been tried in what are known as civil damage laws, by which those who sell intoxicating drinks are held responsible for certain of the evils thereby produced. Such laws were passed in Wisconsin as early as 1849, and in some of the other States at a much later date. In regard to all these, temperance-workers need to keep in mind that they cannot afford to cheapen the sanctity of law by the passage of infeasible or carelessly framed laws, however just; nor to concede that even a license-law (and much less any other restrictive law) is at all of the nature of a sanction to the traffic; nor in the least to intermit their attempts to save the fallen, or to commit the young to temperance principles and habits, for the sake of giving effort to the securing of legislative changes.

The movement, from the beginning, has been, in the main, earnestly and reverently religious. Here and there, men who dislike the Bible and the churches have contrived to use the new temperance doctrines for venting their dislike; but such instances attract attention principally because they are exceptional. For a generation past, the habitual use of inebriating drinks has been so rare among the members of the distinctively Protestant churches, that the few who use them attract notice to themselves thereby; though this is less the case, perhaps, in the great cities than in the country.

In the earlier stages of the movement, as we have seen, there were several rapid advances, one after the other, in the doctrinal position of temperance men. At first the idea was to secure abstinence from excess in the use of alcoholic beverages, then abstinence from ardent spirits as distinguished from fermented liquors, and finally abstinence from all drinks that would intoxicate. This last stage defines historically the term "total abstinence." This term properly denotes, not abstinence from every thing which contains alcohol, but from every thing which so contains alcohol that it might possibly produce drunkenness; not abstinence from such liquids for all purposes, but abstinence from them as a beverage or common drink. The abstinence is total in that it is from all common drinking, and not merely from getting drunk; and in that it is from all sorts of inebriating drinks, and not from ardent spirits only. The historical total-abstinence position does not place the very light wines and beers on the same footing with those that will intoxicate; though it disapproves of them as a matter of prudence, on account of their relations to the stronger beverages. For similar reasons, it demands that alcohol shall not be recklessly or unnecessarily used for medicinal or other purposes; while it sharply distinguishes these from its use as a beverage.

This doctrine is almost universally held by temperance men in America, and is widely held elsewhere. There are some exceptions. A few men who are doing honorable and effective service against drunkenness advocate the propriety of the so-called moderate drinking of alcoholic beverages, as opposed to teetotalism; but the general opinion is against them. There is almost an equal unanimity in basing the duty of total abstinence upon our obligation to deny ourselves for the benefit of others, as presented in 1 Cor. viii. 13 and elsewhere, and generally acknowledged by casuists of all schools. The advocates of total abstinence everywhere would probably agree in affirming the existence of this obligation, and in regarding it as absolutely sufficient to cover the whole case.

But, except in these two points, they differ so radically as greatly to hinder their work. They flatly contradict one another in their teachings as to the grounds of the duty of total abstinence, its limits, and some of the means by which it is to be urged. It is evident that some of them, at least, are seriously mistaken. The cause has now no more pressing need than that its advocates should carefully and candidly sift the arguments they are accustomed to use, throwing away the bad, and retaining only those that will endure testing.

In the physiological argument, for example, it is sometimes held, on the one side, that alcohol is properly a food, and a genuine stimulant, and, on the other hand, that it is merely an irritant poison. But with alcohol, as with other substances, this may depend on the quantity of the alcohol, the presence of other ingredients, and the condition of the body when the alcohol is taken. Joseph Cook asserted, in his lectures in Boston, in 1882, that the tables of certain insurance-companies which insure total abstainers in one class, and moderate drinkers in another, show that there is a distinct and considerable difference of longevity in favor of the former. This and similar facts conclusively prove that alcohol habitually taken in the form of an intoxicating beverage is deleterious, even when it does not lead to drunkenness. Nevertheless, alcohol is commonly believed to have a genuine medicinal use, though it is a dangerous medicine. And while the experience of some generations of total abstainers proves that it is never necessary as a food, the most trustworthy experiments seem to show, that, in minute quantities, it is sometimes harmless, and even salutary. It would not be easy to determine the percentage of alcohol necessary to render a beverage intoxicating. But, from the considerations just mentioned, it seems clear that the using of dilutions in which alcohol is contained in quantities clearly less than that percentage is a very different thing from using intoxicating drinks. Our war, let us remember, is not against alcohol, but against intoxicating alcohol. Doubtless the two are so related as to render it prudent to abstain from even the very light wines, beers, and ciders. But we ought to remember that this obligation, unlike that to refuse the stronger beverages, depends on local and temporary conditions. It would have very little weight, for example, in the state of things which existed in the world prior to about the year 1700.

Again: it is argued, on the one hand, that literature, ancient and modern, recognizes two different meanings of the word "wine;" namely, fermented grape-juice, and unfermented. The common reply to this is a sweeping and contemptuous denial that the word is ever used to denote unintoxicating juice of any kind. The facts proved are, that preparations of unfermented grape-juice have been well known among many peoples, that they have sometimes been used in beverages, and that the name "wine" has been frequently applied to them, though certainly not in such a way as to establish this as one of the current and natural meanings of the word.

As a rule, both the parties in this discussion sturdily ignore any distinction between the terms "fermented" or "alcoholic," and "intoxicating." But the existence of precisely this distinction is the one fact of real importance which the evidence adduced in the discussion abundantly proves. In the history of the grape a very important part is played by wines — sometimes of cheap and ordinary quality, and sometimes very choice — which contained alcohol in such quantities and combinations as to render the wine agreeable, but absolutely unintoxicating. It is these uninebriating wines, which, with some confusion of thought as to their relations to the grape-jellies, have been mistaken by many for wines without alcohol.

Men who are accustomed to recognize the Bible as an inspired rule of conduct have been compelled to try to reconcile its occasional approval of wine, in the example of Jesus at Cana, for example, with its repeated and sweeping denunciations of wine. Those who hold that the word "wine" may equally well mean either the fermented or the unfermented juice of the grape, think that, when the Bible approves of wine, it must be held to refer to that which is unfermented. Their opponents, denying the distinction, commonly assert that the Bible approves of the drinking of intoxicants, but disapproves of excess. The opinion thus denied is certainly erroneous; but, as certainly, that substituted for it does not follow from the premises. Philo, as we have seen, held the different theory, that the Scriptures approve wine-drinking in certain aspects of it, but not in others. It would be easy to construct other theories as plausible as either of these. The discussion of this question properly belongs, not to this article, but to that on WINE. It is sufficient here to say, that we must look for a better solution of it than has yet been offered. Meanwhile, whatever solution we may adopt, it will still be true that the specific precepts concerning wine, found in the Scriptures, may not apply in the changed conditions of our modern civilization; while the scriptural principles on which our obligation to total abstinence is based are at all times applicable.

LIT. — The various religious publishing boards and societies, the private houses that publish Sunday-school literature, and the National Temperance Society and Publication House, offer each its own list of temperance stories and of other temperance books and tracts. Many of the secret and other temperance organizations publish each its newspaper. At different times, and notably within a few years past, the subject has been discussed in the reviews. To the catalogues and indexes of these publishers and publications the reader is referred. It is impossible particularly to name more than a very few works out of the vast number.

Some of the more celebrated older publications are mentioned in the body of this article. Others are, L. M. SARGENT: Temperance Tales, circ. 1830; Rev. GEORGE B. CHEEVER: Deacon Giles's Distillery, and Deacon Jones's Brewery, circ. 1835; Permanent Temperance Documents, 1837-42. No more valuable temperance book exists than the Autobiography of John B. Gough, 1869. For additional literature, including that of prohibition, consult any current number of the organs of the National Temperance Society, — the National Temperance Advocate, or the Youth's Temperance Banner. The theory of unfermented wines, and the view that the churches ought to use unalcoholic grape-juice at the Lord's Table, are advocated in many of the publications of this society, but in none of them more reasonably than in The Bible Rule of Temperance, published by the Rev. GEORGE DUFFIELD in 1834-35, and republished, 1868. These two doctrines are attacked by Dr. DUNLOP MOORE, in the Presbyterian Review for January, 1881, and January, 1882. In the same Review, for April, 1882, is an article which advocates the using of the unalcoholic juice of the grape in the communion, and maintains generally the positions taken in the present article. Of temperance Sunday-school stories, which are being produced in considerable numbers, We Three, by Mrs. G. R. ALDEN, is a highly creditable specimen. The stories by MARY DWINELL CHILLIS are favorites with many. W. J. BEECHER.

TEMPLE AT JERUSALEM. I. TEMPLE OF SOLOMON. — David, when he was inhabiting his house of cedar, and God had given him rest from all his enemies, meditated the design of building a temple in which the ark of God might be placed, instead of being deposited within curtains (2 Sam. vii. 2; 1 Chron. xvii. 1). In this he was discouraged by the prophet Nathan, on account of his many wars, and the blood which he had shed, but promised at the same time that his son and successor shall build a house unto the Lord. While David was prohibited from building the temple, he nevertheless made preparations for it (1 Kings vi.; 1 Chron. xxii.); and, as far as the material and ideal of the building is concerned, David was its author, while Solomon merely executed the design. The workmen and the materials employed in the erection of the temple were chiefly procured by Solomon from Hiram, king of Tyre. The building, which was begun four hundred and eighty years after the exodus from Egypt, in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, in the third month of the year 1012 B.C., was finished in the twelfth year of his reign, in the eighth month (1 Kings vi. 38).

In its construction the temple was mainly built after the pattern of the tabernacle; since it was only to be an enlarged and fixed dwelling of the Lord, a palace in place of the movable tent. Of course every thing was on an enlarged scale, and of more substantial materials.

The temple itself was sixty cubits long, twenty wide, and thirty high. The floor was throughout of cedar, but boarded over with planks of fir

(1 Kings vi. 15). The internal dimension of the "holy" was forty cubits long, twenty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. The holy was separated from the "Holy of holies" (debir) by a partition. It was on the western extremity of the entire building, and its internal dimensions formed a cube of twenty cubits. On the eastern extremity of the building stood the porch. At the entrance of this porch stood the two columns called Joachin and Boaz, which were twenty-three cubits high. The temple was also surrounded by a triple story of chambers, each of which stories was five cubits high. The lowest story of the chambers was five cubits, the middle six, and the third seven cubits wide. The difference of the width arose from the circumstance that the external walls of the temple were so thick that they were made to recede one cubit after an elevation of five feet; so that the scarcement in the wall of the temple gave a firm support to the beams which supported the second story without being inserted into the wall of the sanctuary. The entrance to these stories was from without. The windows, which are mentioned in 1 Kings vi. 4, served chiefly for ventilation; since the light within the temple was obtained from the sacred candlesticks. In the Holy of holies were no windows, because "the Lord said that he would dwell in the thick darkness" (1 Kings viii. 12). The temple was wainscoted with cedar-wood, which was covered with gold. The boards within the temple were ornamented by beautiful carvings, representing cherubim, palms, and flowers. From 2 Chron. iii. 5, it appears that the greater house was also ceiled with fir. The doors of the oracle were composed of olive-tree; but the doors of the outer temple had posts of olive-tree, and leaves of fir (1 Kings vi. 31 sq.). Both doors, as well that which led into the temple as that which led from the holy to the Holy of holies, had folding leaves; the aperture being closed by a suspended curtain. The lintel and side-posts of the oracle seem to have circumscribed a space which contained one-fifth of the whole area of the partition; and the posts of the door of the temple, one-fourth of the area of the wall in which they were placed (1 Kings vi. 31-35).

Within the Holy of holies stood only the ark of the covenant between two cherubim; but within the holy were ten golden candlesticks, and the altar of incense, and a table for the shew-bread.

The temple was surrounded by a court of priests (2 Chron. iv. 9). This, again, was surrounded by a wall consisting of cedar-beams placed on a stone foundation (1 Kings viii. 36), and contained the altar of burnt offering, the brazen sea, and ten brazen lavers. From the court of the priests, which is called (1 Kings vi. 36) the inner and (Jer. xxxvi. 10) the upper court, a few steps led into the lower court of the people, which is called (Ezek. xl. 17) the outward and (2 Chron. iv. 9) the great court. Both courts were paved. Doors overlaid with brass led into the outer court. On the east was (Ezek. xi. 1) the main gate. According to 2 Kings xv. 35 and 2 Chron. xxvii. 3, Jotham built the "higher gate" of the house of the Lord. A "gate of foundation" is mentioned (2 Chron. xxiii. 5). Near the eastern gate, inside of the court of priests, probably stood the brazen scaffold which Solomon had built for the dedicatory prayer (2 Chron. vi. 13), and which afterwards probably served as the king's stand (2 Kings xi. 14, xxiii. 3). There was also an ascent by which the king went up into the temple from his own house (1 Kings x. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 11). The covert for the sabbath (2 Kings xvi. 18) probably served as a kind of protection against the sun and wind.

After the temple was finished, it was consecrated by the king. It remained the centre of public worship for all the Israelites, only till the death of Solomon, after which ten tribes forsook this sanctuary. But even in the kingdom of Judah it was from time to time desecrated by altars erected to idols (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 4, 13). There was a treasury in the temple, in which much precious metal was collected for the maintenance of public worship. The gold and silver of the temple were, however, frequently applied to political purposes (1 Kings xv. 18 sq.; 2 Kings xii. 13, xvi. 8, xviii. 15). The treasury of the temple was repeatedly plundered by foreign invaders; for instance, by Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 26), by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 14), by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 13), and, lastly, again by Nebuchadnezzar, who, having removed the valuable contents, caused the temple to be burned down (xxv. 9 sq.) four hundred and sixteen years after its dedication.

The restoration of the temple was prophesied; and, fourteen years after the destruction of the Temple of Solomon, Ezekiel saw in a vision a new temple, which he describes in chaps. xl.-xliii.

II. THE SECOND TEMPLE.—In the year 536 B.C. Cyrus permitted the Jews to return to their country, and rebuild the temple, at the same time commanding that the sacred utensils which had been pillaged in the first temple should be restored, and that, for the restoration of the temple, assistance should be granted (Ez. i., vi. 2). The first colony which returned under Zerubbabel and Joshua, having collected the necessary means, and having also obtained the assistance of Phœnician workmen, commenced, in the second year after their return, the rebuilding of the temple. The Sidonians brought rafts of cedar-trees from Lebanon to Joppa. The Jews refused the co-operation of the Samaritans, who, being thereby offended, induced the king, Smerdis, to prohibit the building. It was only in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (520 B.C.) that the building was resumed; and was completed 516 B.C. (Ez. iv.-vi.; Hag. i. 15). According to Ez. vi. 3, it was sixty cubits high and wide, thus larger than the Temple of Solomon; while, according to Hag. ii. 3, it was inferior to the first. The inferiority probably consisted in the absence of the ark and precious metals. Antiochus Epiphanes pillaged and desecrated it through idolatry (1 Macc. i. 21, iv. 38; 2 Macc. vi. 2). Judas Maccabæus repaired, furnished, and cleansed it, 165 B.C. (1 Macc. ix. 36; 2 Macc. i. 18, x. 3), whence the Jewish "feast of dedication" (John x. 22). He also fortified the temple mount (1 Macc. iv. 60, vi. 7). Alexander Jannæus (about 106 B.C.) separated the court of the priests from the external court by a wooden railing (Joseph., Ant. XIII. 13, 5). In the year 63 B.C. Pompey attacked the temple from the north side, caused a great massacre in its courts, but abstained from plundering the treasury, although he even entered the Holy of holies (Ibid. XIV. 1, 2 sq.). Herod the Great, with the assistance of Roman troops, stormed the temple, 37 B. C., on which occasion some halls were destroyed (Ibid. XIV. 16, 2).

III. THE HERODIAN TEMPLE. — Herod, wishing to ingratiate himself with the Jews, undertook to raise a perfectly new temple. The work was commenced in the eighteenth year of his reign (20 or 21 B. C.). Priests and Levites finished the temple in one year and a half, while the courts required eight years. The out-buildings, however, were completed under Agrippa II. and under Albinus the procurator, in the year A.D. 64 (Joseph., Ant. XX. 9, 7). The structure of the temple is described by Josephus (Ant. XV. 11; Jewish War, V. 5), and in the Talmudic treatise Middoth. Already under Archelaus the courts of the temple became the scene of revolt and bloody massacres (Joseph., Ant. XVII. 9, 3; 10, 2). But the most horrid scenes were during the last Jewish revolt (Joseph., War, IV. 5, 1; V. 1, 2, 3). In August of the year 70 the Romans rushed from the Tower of Antonia into the sacred precincts, the halls of which were set on fire by the Jews themselves. It was against the will of Titus that a Roman soldier threw a firebrand into the temple, which caused its conflagration. The Emperor Hadrian (A.D. 136) founded a Roman colony, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, on the ruins of Jerusalem, and dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus. Under the reign of Constantine the Great the Jews were severely punished for having attempted to restore the temple. In the year 363 the Emperor Julian undertook to rebuild the temple, but he was compelled to desist by flames which burst forth from the foundations.

The temple ground, called by the Turks el Haram, is now occupied by a splendid mosque erected by Omar, es Sakhara, south of which stands the mosque el Aksa (formerly a Christian church).

TEMPORAL POWER. See CHURCH AND STATE; CHURCH, STATES OF THE.

TEMPUS CLAUSUM ("closed time," also feriatum or sacratum) is a canonical term denoting those days on which no noisy festivities are allowed to take place. Regulations of that kind naturally originated from the general conception of how a Christian festival ought to be celebrated; but already among the Israelites it was customary to prepare one's self for the celebration by prayer and abstinence (Exod. xix. 5; 1 Sam. xxi. 4); and, as Paul indorsed the custom (1 Cor. vii. 5), the Church had thus a basis for further development given. The oldest laws relating to the subject date back to the middle of the fourth century. In its can. 51-52 the Council of Laodicea (351) forbade various festivities during the quadragesimal fast; and its ordinances were confirmed by the State. Later on, not only the quadragesima, but also advent and other feast cycles, were put down as tempus clausum: though the observance never became uniform during the middle ages. The Council of Trent (sess. xxiv., Nov. 11, 1563) introduced various mitigations of the rules. The evangelical churches generally adopted the ordinances of a tempus clausum, but the observance varied very much in the different countries. The conference of Eisenach (1857) gave much attention to the subject, and its protocols contain an exhaustive survey of the state of affairs in the different churches. In its general principle it recognized the Tempus clausum (Quadragesima) as a wholesome pedagogical institution, and recommended the careful maintenance of such remains of it as might still exist. See KLEFOTH: Liturgische Abhandlungen, i. pp. 55 sqq. II. F. JACOBSON.

TEN ARTICLES, The, were brought into Parliament by Bishop Fox, and passed July 11, 1536. Though emanating from the crown, it is probable that Fox and Crammer helped to prepare them. They mark an advance in the work of the Reformation, but retain the doctrines of baptismal regeneration, transubstantiation, the invocation of saints, and the usefulness (though not the efficacy) of prayers for the dead.

TEN COMMANDMENTS. See DECALOGUE.

TENISON, Thomas, was born at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, in 1636; and studied at Benet College, Cambridge University. In the year of the ejection (1662) he became a fellow, and in 1665 was appointed university preacher. The rectory of Holywell, Huntingdonshire, the living of St. Peter's Mancroft, Norwich, the vicarage of St. Martins-in-the-Fields, London, the archdeaconry of the metropolis, and the bishopric of Lincoln, successively fell to his lot; and in all these preferments he showed administrative power, for which he was more remarkable than for pulpit eloquence. He was an active Churchman, and busy in matters connected with the Revolution of 1688. On the death of Tillotson, he was raised to the primacy, in which he made a considerable figure, both as to temporal and spiritual affairs. When William III. was absent from England in 1695, Tenison filled the post of a lord-justice, being first in the commission appointed by the sovereign for that purpose; but his actual power and political influence in that capacity must have been far below what accrued to some of the English archbishops in the middle ages. It was as president of the Upper House of Convocation that he had the most arduous duties to discharge, and the greatest trouble to endure. The Lower House was chiefly composed of High-Churchmen, unfriendly to the Revolution (which Tenison cordially approved), and advocating the independence of the Ecclesiastical Establishment in a way which he condemned. The Upper and Lower Houses of Convocation came into boisterous conflict; and scenes were enacted in the Jerusalem Chamber, the adjoining organ-room, the dean's yard, and Henry VII.'s Chapel, such as were disgraceful to the High-Church clergy, who figured as chief actors in the strife. The archbishop manifested a steadiness of purpose and an invincibility of calm resistance, which won for him the name of the "rock-like" Tenison. He aimed at church reform, and issued circulars to the bishops with that view, but achieved little success. A funeral-sermon he preached for Mary, consort of William III., was warmly censured in a letter attributed to Bishop Ken. He was more a man of words than letters, but he founded a library which bore his name. He attended his royal master on his death-bed, and survived Queen Anne, in whose reign he had fresh convocation troubles. He died in 1715.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

TENNENT, a family of ministers illustrious in the history of the American Presbyterian Church. — 1. William Tennent, b. in Ireland, 1673; d. at Neshaminy, Bucks County, twenty miles north of Philadelphia, Penn., May 6, 1746. Originally in the Established Church of Ireland, he emigrated to America in 1716 or 1718, and entered the Presbyterian synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 17, 1718. In 1721 he settled at Bensalem, Bucks County, Penn., and in 1726 became pastor at Neshaminy in the same county, although he was never formally installed. Impressed by the lack of educational facilities for the young men growing up around him, he erected in 1726 a log house, the famous "Log College," wherein he taught three of his four sons and a number of other youth, several of whom afterwards rose to eminence in the church. Log College was the first of the literary and theological institutions of the Presbyterian Church in America, the parent of those in Princeton, N.J., and, indeed, of them all. Mr. Tennent's publications were mostly sermons. Our knowledge of his life and college is in good part derived from Whitefield's journal, which shows his apostolic character. — 2. Gilbert Tennent, eldest son of the preceding, and a distinguished Presbyterian divine; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, April 5, 1703; d. in Philadelphia, July 23, 1761. He came to America with his father, 1718; was educated by him; was licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, May,

1726; acted as tutor in Log College for a year; was ordained and installed pastor in New Brunswick, N.J., in the autumn of 1727. Like his father, he was an ardent admirer of Whitefield; and, in imitation of the great evangelist, he made a preaching-tour through West Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and in 1740, at Whitefield's solicitation, through New England, as far as Boston. By his fiery zeal, deep moral earnestness, spirituality, no less than by his logic and argumentative ability, he produced everywhere a profound impression. His popularity was second only to Whitefield's. But he was lacking in tenderness and consideration for those who differed from him. At that time many Presbyterian ministers were conscientiously opposed to the methods adopted by the revival preachers. Tennent had no appreciation of such scruples, but set them down to a lack of vital religion. Moreover, Log College was openly criticised by the synod of Philadelphia, because of the type of piety there fostered, and its educational defects. Tennent naturally resented these attacks, and, under what he deemed sufficient provocation, preached in 1740 his famous "Nottingham sermon," "one of the most severely abusive sermons which was ever penned" (Alexander), in which he lashed his ministerial brethren for their "hypocrisy." Tennent had a large following throughout the country, and able ministers were upon his side. The agitation lasted for many years. The presbytery of New Brunswick seceded from the synod of Philadelphia in 1741 (see art. PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, p. 1907). In May, 1743, Tennent was called to the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, then just started, made up of the admirers of Whitefield and the friends of the revival. But, although he remained their pastor till his death, he did not repeat in his second charge the triumphs of his first. He was faithful and highly useful; but his preaching was quieter, and not so many souls came under his influence. His delivery was much less impassioned, due very probably to his use of a manuscript. In 1753 he raised in Great Britain some fifteen hundred pounds for the College of New Jersey, — a sum much beyond his expectations. Although he had contributed so largely to the disruption of the Presbyterian Church in 1741, he toiled to effect a reconciliation, and saw with great satisfaction the breach healed in 1758. Besides a memoir of his brother John (Boston, 1735), he published a volume of sermons (Philadelphia, 1743), and occasional sermons and pamphlets. See list in Log College, pp. 65 sq. — 3. William Tennent, brother of the preceding; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, June 3, 1705; d. at Freehold, Monmouth County, N.J., March 8, 1777. He studied under his father in Log College, and theology under his brother Gilbert in New Brunswick; was licensed by the presbytery of New Brunswick; ordained pastor of the church at Freehold, October, 1733, and held the position till death. He is the subject of several highly remarkable stories, of which the two most famous are, (1) that, while preparing for his examination for licensure, he fell sick, and had a trance which lasted three days, during which time he was, as he believed and declared, in heaven, and heard "unutterable things." His friends thought he was dead, and were upon the point of burying him, notwithstanding the protestations of his physician, when he revived. He regained his health in a year, but had lost all his knowledge of reading and writing, much more, all his previous learning. After a time, however, he experienced "a severe shock in his head;" and his knowledge from that moment began rapidly to return, until all was regained. "For three years," he said, "the sense of divine things continued so great, and every thing else appeared so completely vain, when compared to heaven, that, could I have had the world for stooping down for it, I believe I should not have thought of doing it." No autobiographic record of his experiences during his trance is believed to be extant, although his intention to prepare one is known. See Log College, pp. 112-118, 147. (2) The second story is, that "one night, when Mr. Tennent was asleep in his own bed, he was waked up by a sharp pain in the region of the toes of one of his feet; and upon getting a light, and examining the foot, it was discovered that several of his toes had been cut entirely off, as if by some sharp instrument. But, though the wounded part was bleeding, nothing was seen of the excised members, nor any means by which such a dismemberment could have been effected" (Log College, p. 151). Mr. Tennent was a remarkable character, full of resources, indefatigable in Christian labors, wise to win souls and to guide them to heaven. By his earnestness, eloquence, simplicity, and, above all, ardent piety, he made such an impression upon his neighborhood, that he is vividly remembered until this day. — 4. John Tennent, third son of William, sen.; b. in County Armagh, Ireland, Nov. 12, 1707; educated in Log College; licensed by the presbytery of Philadelphia, and settled at Freehold, N.J., Nov. 19, 1730, but d. April 23, 1732, leaving behind him a pleasant and godly memory. "His labors were attended with three notable qualities. — prudence, diligence, and success." Two of his sermons, and memoir, were published in a volume by Gilbert Tennent, Boston, 1735. — 5. Charles Tennent, fourth son of William, sen., b. at Colerain, County Down, Ireland, May 3, 1711; was pastor at White-Clay Creek, Del.; d. after 1760, at Buckingham, Md. See ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER: Biographical Sketches of the Founder and Principal Alumni of the Log College, Phila., (Presbyterian Board), 1816; Sermons and Essays by the Tennents and their Contemporaries, Phila., (Presbyterian Board), 1855; *Life of the Rev. TERAPHIM (Gen. xxxi. 19, 31; 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16), a word found only in the plural form, derived, probably, from תָּרַח, "to be rich," designating a sort of household gods, or penates, in size and appearance approaching the human, which were regarded as dispensers of good-fortune, and shields against evil (Judg. xviii. 21). They were objects of worship, and consulted as oracles (Ezek. xxi. 26; Zech. x. 2). The Israelites derived their use of them from the Arameans, and they existed in common private use, although forbidden in public worship, and always described by the prophets as idols, even after the Babylonish captivity (Gen. xxxv. 4; 2 Kings xxiii. 24; Zech. x. 2; Hos. iii. 4).

TERMINISM AND THE TERMINISTIC CONTROVERSY. Mediaeval theology, partially supported by Augustine, maintained that the terminus of grace coincided with the terminus of life; so that infants dying without baptism could not possibly escape hell. During the Reformation, this doctrine was modified in various ways. On the one side, the idea of the free, infinite grace of God expanded the terminus beyond life, and gave rise to the doctrine of apokatastasis; on the other side, the conviction that a certain interior, moral-religious state was an absolute condition of grace, narrowed the terminus down almost to a single moment of life, and gave rise to the doctrine of terminism. The Friends are the principal representatives of this doctrine, holding that every person has in his life a moment or period of visitation, but that no second opportunity is granted. The Pietists, with their suspicion against the late repentance, also incline towards this doctrine; and in J. G. Bose, deacon of Sorau, it found a decided and eloquent spokesman. His Terminus peremptorius salutis humanæ (Frankfort, 1698) attracted much attention, and called forth a great number of refutations. The most remarkable among these were J. G. Neumann's Dissertatio de termino salutis humanæ peremptorio (Wittenberg, 1700) and Dissertatio de tempore gratiæ divinæ, etc. (Wittenberg, 1701). As Bose died in 1700, A. Rechenberg, the son-in-law of Spener, took up the defence of his ideas, and a long and bitter controversy ensued with Ittig, professor at Leipzig; but the spreading rationalism finally bereft the question of all interest. [F. H. Hesse: Der terministische Streit, Giessen, 1877.] J. P. LANGE.

TERRITORIALISM denotes a theory of church government which originated with the Reformation, and according to which the ruler of a country has a natural right to rule also over the ecclesiastical affairs of his people. The theory found its principal supporter in Christian Thomasius, and its principal opponent in J. B. Carpzov. See the art. CHURCH AND STATE.

TERSTEEGEN, Gerhard, b. at Mears in Rhenish Prussia, Nov. 25, 1697; d. at Mulheim in Westphalia, April 3, 1769; a famous mystic and hymnist of the Reformed Church. He was educated in the Latin school of his native city, and in 1713 apprenticed to a merchant in Mulheim, where he soon after made the acquaintance of Wilhelm Hoffmann, the leader of a pietistic revival movement in those regions. As he found that mercantile business interfered with the development of his religious life, he left that profession in 1719, and learned the trade of a ribbon-maker. Settling in a lonesome little hut, he led a secluded and ascetic life, dividing his time between work and prayer, and distributing not only his earnings, but also the inheritance from his mother, among the poor. After 1721, his activity in the service of Christ assumed greater dimensions. He began to preach, and he engaged in literature. Travelling from one place to another, he visited many towns and cities in Holland and Westphalia, held conventicles, and formed minor communities. He translated numerous books of the French mystics, — Labadie, Madame Guyon, Louvigny, and others. Of his own compositions, the principal are, Auserlesene Lebensbeschreibungen heiliger Seelen (1733-53, 3 vols.), Geistliche Bräutamen (1769-74, 4 vols.), Weg der Wahrheit, Gebete, etc., and a number of beautiful hymns. His Gedanken über die Werke des Philosophen von Sans Souci was read by Friedrich II., and is said to have made an impression on him. A collected edition of his works has appeared at Essen, and separate editions are still made. The principal source of his life is his correspondence, of which the German part appeared at Solingen, 1773-75, 2 vols., and the Dutch at Hoorn, 1772. His biography was written by Kerlen (Mülheim, 2d ed., 1853) and Stursberg (1869). See art. HYMNOLOGY, p. 1051.

TERTIARIES, TERTIARII (Tertius ordo de penitentia), formed associations whose members, though not obliged to live in monasteries, or take the three monastic vows, nevertheless led a religious life according to certain definite rules. They remained in the world, and were distinguished from other people only by their sombre, unadorned costume, by certain religious restrictions, and certain religious practices. But in the world they represented the interests of the order with which they were connected, and enjoyed, beside the reputation of greater sanctity than was to be found among ordinary laymen, not a few of the privileges of the orders. It is said that such associations were first formed by Norbert, the founder of the order of the Præmonstratenses; but its complete organization and success the institution owes to Francis of Assisi, who, afraid of receiving into the monasteries all the persons who were awakened by his preaching,—because, in that case, whole regions might have been depopulated,—and yet unwilling not to meet the popular craving for penitence, had recourse to this device. The success of the institution was prodigious. The highest persons became members of the order,—the Emperor Charles IV., King Louis of France, King Bela of Hungary, Queen Blanche of Castile, and others. Other monastic orders followed the example of the Franciscans, and formed associations of tertiaries. There were also female tertiaries.

TERTULLIAN (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus), b. at Carthage about 150 or 160; d. there between 220 and 240; the first great writer of Latin Christianity, and one of the grandest and most original characters of the ancient church. Of his life very little is known. His father held a high position (centurio, aide-de-camp) in the Roman garrison in Africa; but the Punic blood of his descent is visibly pulsating in his style, with its archaisms or provincialisms, its glowing imagery, its passionate temper. He received an excellent education. He was a scholar. He wrote books in Greek, of which, however, none has come down to us. But his proper study was jurisprudence, and his method of reasoning shows striking marks of his juridical training. It is not known at what time he was converted to Christianity, nor how the conversion came about. But the event must have been sudden, decisive, transforming at once his whole personality; for afterwards he could not imagine a truly Christian life without such a conscious breach, a radical act of conversion: fiunt, non nascuntur Christiani. In the Church of Carthage he was ordained a presbyter, though he was married,—a fact which is well established by his two books to his wife, though Roman-Catholic writers have tried to deny it. Rome he visited once or twice; and it may be that the laxity and corruption of morals which at that time (see CALIXTUS) he found prevailing in the Church of Rome contributed not a little to drive him into Montanism. At all events, a few years after his conversion (about 202) he became the leader, the passionate and brilliant exponent, of that movement (see MONTANISM),—that is, he became a schismatic; and the story, that before his death he returned to the bosom of the Catholic Church, is very improbable, since his party, the Tertullianists, continued to exist. Nevertheless, in spite of his schism he continued to fight heresy, especially Gnosticism; and by these doctrinal works he is the teacher of Cyprian, the predecessor of Augustine, and the chief founder of Latin theology.

The writings of Tertullian are very numerous, though generally not very large. As they cover the whole theological field of the time,—apologetics against Paganism, polemics against heresies, and polity, discipline, morals, or the whole reorganization of human life on a Christian basis,—they give a picture of the religious life of the time which is of the greatest interest to the church historian. Their general character is stern and practical, but they are full of life and freshness. In his endeavors to make the Latin language a pliant vehicle for his somewhat tumultuous ideas, he now and then becomes strained, queer, and obscure; but as a general rule he is quick, precise, and pointed. And he is always powerful, commanding the attention of the reader, not begging it; always rich, lavish with wit and satire, sometimes, also, with sophism and lawyer's tricks; and always original. Though thoroughly conversant with Greek theology, he was entirely independent of it. Indeed, he forms a direct contrast to Origen, just as Montanism forms the opposite extreme of Gnosticism. While Origen pushes his idealism far in the direction of a Gnostic spiritualism, Tertullian carries his realism to the very verge of materialism. Rejecting the Platonic doctrine of pre-existence, and the Pythagorean doctrine of metempsychosis, he adopts the traducianistic view of hereditary sin, teaches that soul and body originate at the same moment, and proves, metaphysically and from the Bible, that the soul has corporeality. Greek philosophy he despised; Gnosticism he considered a crime; and Neander has exactly hit the centre of his spiritual character by calling his monograph upon him, Antignosticus. But it is just this practical bearing of his ideas, even the most abstract ones, which places him at the head of the theology of the Western Church. The direction he thereby gave to all theological speculation has never since been entirely lost sight of, not even by the schoolmen.

The chronology of Tertullian's writings is very uncertain. The principal question, however,—Which of them belong to the Catholic period of his life, and which to the Montanist?—can in many cases be decided by internal criteria. To the Montanistic period belong Adversus Marcionem, De anima, De carne Christi, De resurrectione carnis, Adversus Pravian. De corona militis, De fuga in persecutione, De monogamia, De jejuniis, De pudicitia, etc.; certainly Catholic are his Apologeticus (A.D. 197), De pœnitentiâ, De oratione, De baptismo, Ad uxorem, Ad martyres, perhaps also, De præscriptione hæreticorum, etc.; while others, Ad Nationes, De testimonio animæ, De pallio, Adversus Hermogenem, etc., are of uncertain date. Among his apologetical writings, his Apologeticus, written during the reign of Septimius Severus, and addressed to the Roman magistrates, is the best defence of Christianity and the Christians ever written against the reproaches of the Pagans, and one of the most magnificent monuments of the ancient church, full of enthusiasm, courage, and vigor. It first clearly proclaims the principle of religious liberty as an inalienable right of man. Of his dogmatical works, the most important is his De præscriptione, developing as its fundamental idea, that, in a dispute between the Church and a separating party, the whole burden of the evidence lies with the latter, as the Church, in possession of the unbroken tradition, is by its very existence a guaranty of its truth. His five books Adversus Marcionem, written in 207 or 208, are the most comprehensive and elaborate of his polemical works, and invaluable for the true understanding of Gnosticism. Of his moral and ascetic treatises, the De patientia and De spectaculis are among the most interesting; the De pudicitia and De virginibus velandis, among the most characteristic.

TEST ACT, The, an act passed by the English Parliament in 1663, which enacted that all persons holding public offices, civil or military, should receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the usage of the Church of England, take the oaths of supremacy and uniformity, and declare their rejection of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was entitled an "Act to prevent dangers from Popish Recusants," and was in the first instance levelled against the Catholics. The Toleration Act of William (1689), and especially the legislation of the present century (the Relief Act of May 9, 1828, and the Roman-Catholic Relief Bill of April 13, 1829), have abolished the hardships of the Test Act.

TESTAMENT, The Old and New, is the dominant name in the Occidental Church for the collection of Holy Scripture, and the translation of the Greek designation ἡ παλαιὰ καὶ ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη. The term arose in this way: διαθήκη means disposition; then the special form, a will; then, so far as the execution of this will depends upon certain conditions, an agreement bordering upon a covenant (συνθήκη), yet differing from it, since in a διαθήκη one of the parties takes the initiative, and lays down the terms. It was in obedience to a right instinct that the LXX translated בְּרִית by διαθήκη, instead of by συνθήκη; for thereby they expressed the correct idea, that, in the "covenant" between God and man, God appears, not as one of the parties simply, but as the founder, who holds the other strictly to certain terms. It is upon this idea that the argumentation in Gal. iii. 15 sqq. rests. The Itala translates "covenant" also by testamentum ("will"), where Jerome, in the Old Testament, uses fœdus. The Scriptures are τὰ βιβλία τῆς διαθήκης ("the books of the will"), which meant at first the Decalogue, then the whole law. For sake of brevity the phrase was replaced by the single word διαθήκη (so 2 Cor. iii. 14). In the Greek Church the expression was used of the whole canon (so Origen: π. απχ., iv. 1). In old ecclesiastical Latin, besides testamentum, instrumentum was used (so Tertullian: Adv. Prax. c. 20). For the contents of the Old and New Testament, see CANON. OEHLER.

TETRACRAMMATON (four letters), the combination יְהוָה (Jehovah), by the use of which name the miracles of Christ were said by the early opponents of Christianity to have been performed.

TETRAPOLITAN CONFESSION (also called Suevica or Argentinensis), the Confession which the four cities of Strassburg, Constance, Memmingen, and Lindau, presented to the diet of Augsburg (July 11, 1530), and, properly speaking, the first Confession of the Reformed Church. Landgrave Philipp of Hesse in vain exerted himself to bring about a union between the two branches of the reformatory movement. But the Saxon princes and theologians obstinately excluded the representatives of the cities of Southern Germany suspected of Zwinglian heresy, from all their political and theological conferences. Under such circumstances, it became necessary for them to present a confession of their own. It was drawn up by Bucer and Capito, who arrived at Augsburg a few days after the presentation, by the Saxon theologians, of the Confessio Augustana, and consists of twenty-three articles. The formal principle of the Reformation — the absolute authority of Scripture in matters of faith, which, for irenical purposes, the Conf. Aug. passes by silently — is stated with great energy; and the whole instrument is distinguished for clearness and precision, with the exception of the representation of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, which is held in somewhat vague expressions, probably in order not to make a reconciliation with the Lutherans impossible. The Confession was not read before the diet; though its refutation, drawn up by Eck, Faber, and Cochlæus, and full of misrepresentations and insults, was. In September, 1531, Bucer published both the confession and the confutation. See NIEMEYER: Collectio confessionum, Leipzig, 1840; SCHAFF: Credentials of Christendom, New York, 1877, vol. i., p. 524 sqq.

TETRARCH (ruler of a fourth part of a kingdom, called a "tetrarchy"), according to the later Roman practice, the vassal-governor of portion of a province under the Roman sovereignty, but not necessarily of a fourth. The word "tetrarchy" first appears in connection with Philip of Macedon's division of Thessaly into four parts (Diodorus: Phil. iii. c. 26; Strabo, 9, p. 430). The term is applied to the ruler of each of the four Celtic tribes which lived in Galatia before the Roman conquest, B.C. 189 (Pliny, 5, 42). In the New Testament the term "tetrarch" is used as synonymous with king (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; compare Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 22). It is applied to three persons.—Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 1; Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1), Herod Philip (Luke iii. 1), and Lysanias (Luke iii. 1).

TETZEL, Johann, b. at Leipzig between 1450 and 1460; d. there in July, 1519. He studied theology and philosophy at the university of his native city, entered the Dominican order in 1489, achieved some success as a preacher, and was in 1502 commissioned by the Pope to preach the jubilee indulgence. He continued in that business for the rest of his life. Though in 1512 he was sentenced to death for having seduced a married woman at Uhn, he had the sentence commuted to imprisonment for life, was then pardoned and released; and in 1517 Leo X. not only made him commissioner of indulgences for all Germany, but also inquisitor. The incredible impudence with which he carried on his business, selling full forgiveness for sins not yet committed, caused great scandal; and when Luther, in the confessional, became aware of the evil effect of the doings of the mountebank, he began to preach openly against him. Tetzel answered by lighting bonfires, suggestive of the stake. But, when Luther nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, it soon became evident to the Church of Rome, that men of another stamp than Tetzel were required for the case. It even became necessary to disavow Tetzel; and, when he discovered that Miltitz was aware of all his frauds and embezzlements, he became so frightened, that he died shortly after. His life has been written by Hofmann (Leipzig, 1844), Gröne (Soest, 1853), and [Körner (Frankenberg, 1880). THACHER, Peter, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Milton, Mass., March 21, 1752; d. in Savannah, Ga., Dec. 16, 1802. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1769, and ordained minister at Malden, Mass., Sept. 19, 1770; and from January, 1785, till his death, he was pastor of the Brattle-street Church in Boston. He entered heartily into the pre-Revolutionary measures, was a member of the Provincial Congress, a delegate to the State Constitutional Convention of 1780, and often was a chaplain of the State Legislature. He was noted for eloquence, particularly in prayer and conversation. He was called "the silver-tongued" Thacher, and by Whitefield, "the young Elijah." He belonged to many New-England literary and charitable institutions. On March 5, 1776, he distinguished himself at Watertown, Mass., by the annual oration which commemorated the massacre, when he spoke against standing armies. Of his numerous publications, mostly pamphlets, may be mentioned Observations upon the present state of the clergy of New England, with strictures upon the power of dismissing them, usurped by some churches, Boston, 1783, and Memoirs of Dr. Boylston, 1789.

THADDÆUS. See JUDAS.

THAMER, Theobald, a native of Rossheim in Alsace; entered the university of Wittenberg in 1535, and was in 1543 appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church in Marburg. He was an ardent Lutheran, but the experiences he made as a field-preacher gradually led him to the conviction that the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith was a most fertile cause of immorality. By his vehement attacks on that doctrine he caused much disturbance, and was finally deposed. He went to Italy, entered the Roman-Catholic Church in 1557, and died as professor in Freiburg, May 23, 1569. See HOCHMUTH: De Thameri vita et scriptis, Marburg, 1858.

THEATINES (Clerici regulares Theatini, or Cajetani, or Chietini), an order of regular clergy founded in Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century as a kind of counter-Reformation. The Pope and the higher clergy of the Roman-Catholic Church considered for a long time the Reformation a merely external incident, which could be made wholly ineffectual by re-organizing the clergy, and raising it in the estimation of the laity; and for this purpose the order of the Theatines was founded in 1524 by Cajetan of Thiene, Bishop Caraffa of Theater or Chieti (afterwards Paul IV.), and Boniface of Colle. It was confirmed by Paul III., 1540, and by Pius V., 1568. The members renounced all property. They lived neither by labor nor by beggary, but simply by what Providence bestowed on them. They had convents in Rome, Naples, Venice, Milan, and other Italian cities. They also spread to Poland, Germany, and France; but their number was always small. They made some attempt at missionary labor in Tartary, Georgia, and Circassia, but without any result. Two female orders, founded in 1583 and 1610 by Ursula Benincasa, were by Urban VIII. and Clement IX. united with them. See HELYOT: Hist. des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

THEATRE, The, and the Church. Dramatic poetry is of heathen origin. Neither biblical authority nor biblical interdiction of the drama can be found. The Old Testament contains all other kinds of poetry—epic, lyric, didactic, and idyllic—except dramatic poetry, although in Job and the Song of Songs there are dramatic combinations. It is historically certain that the stage was introduced from the Greeks among the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes (176-161 B.C.) was the first to venture to erect a theatre at Jerusalem. Herod the Great followed his example by inviting Greek players to his court, and erecting a theatre at Cæsarea. Both these attempts to domiciliate theatrical spectacles in Judæa were met with glum opposition by the Jews. It was only one of his many characteristic surmises, when Luther called the Book of Judith a tragedy, and the Book of Tobit a comedy. In all his parables and figurative words, Christ never referred, even in the most remote way, to the theatre. The case was different with Paul, who uses in a figurative sense the term "theatre" (θέατρον, 1 Cor. iv. 9), as does also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and refers to the gladiatorial games. It is no wonder that the early Christians looked with horror and disgust upon the amphitheatres, in which many of their own number were given to the wild beasts, and called them the domiciles of the Devil. To these feelings, Tertullian more especially gave expression in his famous work on spectacular displays (De Spectaculis). The dramatic art he regarded as the offspring of hell, and the stage as a part of the Devil's pomp (pompa diaboli), which the candidate for baptism must renounce forever. He was not alone in these opinions among the Church Fathers. Chrysostom courageously opposed the theatrical passion of Antioch and Constantinople, and declared the stage the house of Satan and lies, the consummation of unchastity, the Babylonian furnace, which is heated with combustible material of unchaste words and attitudes. [See Migne: Chrysost. Opera, ii. 337, 682; iv. 696, 697; vi. 266, 267; vii. 71, etc.] Augustine, after his conversion, condemned the theatre as severely (De Civ. Dei, i. 32) as he had before patronized it habitually. Cyprian not only forbade a converted actor plying his occupation, but refused to allow him to give instruction in declamation and mimicry to gain his daily bread. [The Council of Carthage in 419 forbade plays on Sundays and other sacred days of the calendar.] The Trullan Council of 692, and other councils, forbade the clergy attending the theatre. Now and then an actor was converted, like Genesius, whose confession of Christ brought him a violent death.

The Catholic Church, however, during the middle ages, adopted and transformed the heathen drama in the miracle-plays. (See RELIGIOUS DRAMAS.) The Reformers took a less favorable view of the theatre, though at first they did not oppose it. Ecolampadius in his youth composed a tragedy, Nemesis Theophili. Luther spoke out boldly in his Table-Talk: "Christians should not flee comedies entirely, because now and then they contain gross jokes and mimicry; for the same consideration would prevent us from reading the Bible." Calvin, in the spring of 1546, allowed some of the pious citizens of Geneva to act in a play which showed how true piety increases a people's happiness. But he opposed the frequent repetition of such plays; and Michael Cop, one of his colleagues, sternly denounced them, so that the magistrate issued a permanent edict prohibiting them in Geneva. The synod of Rochelles issued a similar edict in 1571. In 1633 the Puritan Prynne published his celebrated Histrio-mastix, the Player's Scourge, against the theatre. The Jansenists, especially Nicole, were opposed to it; and it is said that Racine, who inclined to Jansenism, regretted at one time of his life having written plays. The Pietists of Germany included among the worldly pleasures which are to be shunned theatrical spectacles, although Spener made a distinction between good and bad plays. Pastor Reiher of Hamburg in 1681 issued his work against the theatre, Theatromania oder Werke d. Finsterniss in den öffentlichen Schauspielen ("theatre-mania, or works of darkness in the public plays"). At a later age Jean Jacques Rousseau threw himself, with the zeal of a Puritan or Pietist, into the ranks, in opposition to the theatre, and in a tract of 1758 sternly condemned it. In Germany, Lessing opened a new period for the drama, and sought to make it a moral power; but in 1777, in a letter to his brother, he complains that actors look to their support, and care little about their art as such. Schiller and Goethe lent their powerful influence to the stage, and clergymen who would have dared to speak out against it from the pulpit were warned and checked by the civil authorities. In the present century, such writers on ethics as De Wette, Nitzsch, and Rothe, have discussed the moral side of the theatre; and the deeper study of Shakespeare and of Dante has also brought into prominence the question of dramatic representations. Without going into the question, we will content ourselves with quoting from Rothe's Ethics:—

"Our theatre certainly stands in need of a reformation from the base upwards; but the way to reach it is certainly not for Christians to denounce the stage as unchristian, and then to withdraw from it all sympathy and solicitude."

[Among the early writers of English plays in the sixteenth century were Bishops Bale and Still (Gammer Gurton's Needle, acted at Cambridge, 1566). The public interest in the theatre in Elizabeth's reign met with considerable opposition from the clergy. Archbishop Grindal advised Cecil to suppress players. The first public license granted in England to give theatricals was granted to the servants of the Earl of Leicester in 1571. The Puritans were always opposed to the stage, but on it members of the royal family in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. figured. In 1617 Parliament suppressed the theatres, and forbade actors to exercise their vocation, under penalty of being whipped. After the restoration of the Stuarts, the theatres were again in full blast. The early Methodists shunned the theatre, as do, also, the majority of nonconformists. The most recent public discussions of the claims of the stage to the patronage of the Christian public have been carried on by the Bishop of Manchester, in England, who hopes to elevate it by such patronage, and Dr. Herrick Johnson of Chicago, who looks upon it as a school of immorality beyond the reach of reclamation.]

THECLA AND PAUL. See APOCRYPHA, p. 107. THEINER, Augustin, b. at Breslau, April 11, 1804; d. in Rome, Aug. 10, 1874. He studied theology, and afterwards canon law, at the university of his native city, and published, together with his brother, Die Einführung der erzwungenen Ehelosigkeit bei den christlichen Geistlichen (Altenburg, 1828, 2 vols.), which was put on the Index. Afterwards, however, he made his peace with Rome, entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and was in 1855, by Pius IX., appointed conservator at the papal archives. But during the Council of the Vatican he was by the Jesuits accused of procuring documents from the archives for the bishops in opposition, and removed from his position. He was a very industrious writer; published a new edition of the Annals of Baronius, with continuation, and Geschichte des Pontificats Clemens XIV., 1852; Vetera Monumenta Polonice et Lithuanice, 1860-64, 3 vols.; Acta genuina Concilii Tridentini, 1871, 2 vols. See GISIGER: Pater Theiner, und die Jesuiten, 1875.

THEISM. Theism in its etymological and widest acceptance is a generic term for all systems of belief in the existence of the Divine. Thus understood, it includes pantheism, polytheism, and monotheism, and excludes only atheism; but this acceptance of the term is rare. Common usage has determined that theism must be identified with monotheism, and consequently opposed to polytheism and pantheism, as well as to atheism. In this sense, the one here adopted, it is the doctrine that the universe owes its existence, and continuance in existence, to the wisdom and will of a supreme, self-existent, omniscient, righteous, and benevolent Being, who is distinct from and independent of what he has created. The articles on DEISM, GOD, and INFIDELITY, published in previous volumes of this encyclopædia, treat more or less either of theism or of its history. To these the reader is referred, as the writer of this article wishes to avoid repeating what has already been said.

There has been much discussion as to the historical origin of theism. Herbert of Cherbury, Cudworth, Creuzer, Ebrard, and others have learnedly argued that monotheism was the primeval form of religion. Lubbock, Tylor, and the majority of recent anthropologists, maintain that monotheism can be proved to have been everywhere preceded by polytheism. Schelling and Max Müller have held that the starting-point of religion was henotheism, an imperfect kind of monotheism, in which God was thought of as one, only because others had not yet presented themselves to the mind,—a monotheism of which polytheism was not the contradiction, but the natural development. Pantheism, the belief that all things and beings are but transient phenomena of one divine substance, the only and absolute Reality, has also been frequently represented to be the earliest phase of religion. And, when all that has been adduced in favor of these opinions is examined, there may be seen, perhaps, to be ample room for yet another opinion; namely, that the present state of our knowledge is not sufficient to enable us to determine what the primeval religion was. Science has not yet arrived at certainty as to the primitive condition of men, and until it has done so cannot pronounce with certainty as to the primitive religion of men. The Book of Genesis distinctly informs us of direct manifestations of God to the primitive man, Adam, and therefore that Adam knew God; but it does not appear to inform us how much he knew of God, and whether, for example, his knowledge was monotheistic or henotheistic.

The question as to the psychological origin of theism is, perhaps, more important than that as to its historical origin; but the two questions are scarcely separable. Some trace theism to such external agencies and media as revelation, instruction, and tradition: and these have undoubtedly been the sources of much knowledge, and of most important knowledge, regarding God and divine things; but they all imply the mind to have natural powers of knowing God, and a certain kind of affinity to divine things. A revelation in words or signs, relative to religious objects, made to a purely passive and entirely empty mind, would be meaningless. Instruction implies the exertion of powers which can understand and profit by it. Tradition can only carry what has already been originated, and will not carry far any thing to which the mind is constitutionally indifferent and uncongenial. Others refer theism to internal but entirely non-rational sources. Thus it has been traced to mere feelings,—to fear by Lucretius, to desire by Feuerbach, to the sense of dependence by Schleiermacher, etc. It is obvious, however, that all these feelings presuppose apprehensions and judgments, and are valid only in so far as they have the warrant of intelligence. Max Müller, in his Hibbert Lectures, traces the idea of God to a special faculty of religion,—“a subjective faculty for the apprehension of the infinite,” “a mental faculty, which, independent of, nay, in spite of, sense and reason, enables man to apprehend the infinite under different names and under varying disguises.” This view will not bear a close scrutiny. The infinite, as an implicit condition of thought, is not more involved in religious than in other thought. We cannot think any thing as finite without implying the infinite. Space cannot be thought of except as extensively, nor time except as proten-sively, infinite. As a condition of thought, the infinite is involved in religious knowledge, only so far as it is involved in all knowledge. On the other hand, as an explicit object of thought, it is not present in the lower forms of religion at all, which exist only because the thought of infinity is not associated in the religious consciousness with that of Deity, except where reflection is somewhat highly developed; and, even in the highest stages of religion, it is only apprehended as one aspect of Deity. Infinity is not God, but merely an attribute of the attributes of God, and not even an exclusively divine attribute. The hypothesis that the idea of God is gained by intuition or vision is proved to be erroneous by the fact that the idea of God, and the process by which it is reached, are capable of being analyzed, and therefore not simple; and, likewise, by the variety and discordance of the ideas of God which have been actually formed. The apprehension of God seems to be only possible through a process which involves all that is essential in the human constitution,—will, intelligence, conscience, reason,—and the ideas which they supply,—cause, design, goodness, infinity. These are so connected that they may all be embraced in a single act, and coalesce into one grand issue. The theistic inference, although a complex process, is a thoroughly natural one, similar in character to the inference that there are other human minds than our own. The principles which it involves may be drawn into formal proofs, although this is a secondary operation, not essential to the validity of the inference itself. The theistic proofs constitute an organic whole of argument, each of which establishes its separate element, and thus contributes to the general result, — confirmatory evidence that God is, and complementary evidence as to what God is.

Theism, in order to be adequately understood, requires to be studied in various relationships. Thus, first, it must be viewed with reference to the nature of thought itself. Can the intellect of men attain to a knowledge of God? Is it so constituted that such a being as God is supposed to be can be apprehended either directly or indirectly, either in himself or through media? The theist must meet the agnostic, who always relies on some erroneous theory of knowledge. Further: the elaboration of theism calls for the most careful consideration of how far the chief categories of thought are applicable to God.

Then, secondly, theism must be viewed in connection with the sources of knowledge whence it is derived. These sources are the physical creation, the human mind, history, and the Bible. It is necessary to determine within what limits, and in what way, each is a source of knowledge regarding God, to trace how they are connected, and to show how they shed light on one another. A theism not based on all the sources must be seriously defective. A theism drawn even from the Bible alone must be, in so far as exclusive, both unreasonable and unscriptural; unreasonable, because the special revelation of God in Scripture, while completing and crowning the general revelation of God in nature, mind, and history, throughout implies it, and is without meaning apart from it; and unscriptural, because the Bible explicitly accepts and assimilates the revelation through nature. The God of the Bible is at the commencement of the Scripture records identified with the God of creation, the Author of man, and the Disposer of history. In almost every page the Bible refers its readers to the revelation of God in nature, mind, and society. It is therefore distinctly to disregard its own teaching to attempt to derive a doctrine as to God from it alone, or to the exclusion of any of the sources of knowledge of God.

Thirdly, theism must be compared and contrasted with other forms of religion. The respects in which it differs from animism, polytheism, pantheism, and deism, must be indicated; and it must be shown whether or not the differences are in its favor, whether or not they are necessary to true and worthy conceptions of God and of religion. In opposition to animism, theism claims for the Divine freedom and intelligence; in opposition to polytheism, unity, self-existence, and independence; in opposition to pantheism, transcendence and personality; in opposition to deism, an all-presence and activity, etc. The theist has to show that it, in consequence, responds better to the demands of the intellect, affections, and conscience, than any other phase of religion.

leads to results which seem ultimate to reason, but only to results beyond which the method of the science does not carry us. The view of the constitution of matter with which chemistry must be content to close its inquiries is no more self-explanatory than the one with which it began them. The laws of development reached by biology are as mysterious as were the facts which have been reduced under them. Is reason to affirm that the sciences lead to unreason, or merely that the special methods of each science carry us only so far, and that the conclusions of the sciences are data of philosophy, and also of natural theology?

Fifthly, the relationship of theism to philosophy has to be determined. If there be no philosophy except a phenomenalism or positivism which rests on criticism and agnosticism, there can clearly be no theism, no theology of any kind. The materialism which proclaims itself a monism, and therefore a philosophy, not only transcends science as much as any theological doctrine, but contravenes the findings of science. A philosophy which rises above such materialism must necessarily be, to some extent, a religious philosophy. It will find that there are only two plausible ways of conceiving the first or ultimate principle, — the monotheistic or the pantheistic. The theist has to show that the only satisfaction of philosophical reason is to be found in the personal God of his religious faith. The philosophical view and the religious view of the universe must harmonize, and even coalesce, in a comprehensive theism.

A history of theism embraces (1) A survey of heathen thought regarding God so far as it has approximated to the theistic idea. HEGEL'S Philosophy of Religion, BUNSEN'S God in History, FREEMAN CLARKE'S The Great Religions, the ST. GILES Lectures on the Faiths of the World, still more, the series of Sacred Books of the East, and of ancient texts published under the title of Records of the Past, etc., will be found useful to those wishing to make such a survey. (2) A view of the progress of the idea of God from the beginning to the end of the biblical record of revelation. To attain such a view is an entirely biblico-theological task, with which all treatises of biblical theology are more or less occupied. The second volume of EWALD'S Doctrine of the Bible concerning God is entirely devoted to the theme. (3) An account of the development of theistic thought in the Christian world. The best published account is that contained in the last three volumes of R. BOBBA'S Storia della Filosofia rispetto alla Conoscenza di Dio da Talete fino ai Giorni Nostri, Lecce, 1873. The literature has been so far indicated in the articles on DEISM, God, etc.; and it is so extensive, that a more general view cannot usefully be attempted. [To it is to be added, ROBERT FLINT: Theism, Edinburgh, 1877, 4th ed., 1883; SAMUEL HARRIS: The Philosophical Basis of Theism, N.Y., 1883; GEORGE P. FISHER: The Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief, N.Y., 1883.] R. FLINT.

THEOCRACY, the "rule of God," in contradistinction to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, etc., was first applied by Josephus to designate the peculiar state organization of the Jews. As the Mosaic law was at once the direct expression of the will of God and the civil law of the people, God was, indeed, the ruler of the Jewish state. The name may, however, justly be applied to any people occupying the same stage of political development; that one, namely, at which no distinction has as yet been reached between religious and civil legislation.

THEODICY (from θεός, "God," and δικη, "justice") denotes a vindication of God's wisdom and goodness in the creation and government of the world, in spite of seeming imperfections and the actual existence of evil. The Book of Job may be mentioned as an attempt of the kind, though its true philosophical form the theodicy did not obtain until LEIBNITZ'S Essais de Théodicée, Amsterdam, 1747. Later attempts are, TH. BALGUY: Divine Benevolence Vindicated, London, 1782; J. G. K. WERDERMANN: Neuer Versuch zur Theodice, Leipzig, 1784-93; T. F. BENEDICT: Theodicea, Annaburg, 1822; A. VON SCHADEN: Theodice, Carlsruhe, 1842; H. L. C. MARET: Théodicée chrétienne, Paris, 1857; J. YOUNG: Evil and God, London, 1861, 2d ed.

THEODORA is the name of two Byzantine empresses who have exercised considerable influence on the history of the Greek Church.—I. Theodora, b. 508; d. June 12, 548; the wife of Justinian I., 527-565. She was a native of Cyprus, but came early in life to Constantinople with her parents. Her father was a bear-trainer. She herself became an actress, and that of the worst possible notoriety. She accompanied Heccebolus as his concubine, when he was made prefect of the African Pentapolis; but she was soon after dismissed, and she returned to Constantinople in a state of destitution. She profited, however, by the experience, became studious of decent appearances, and having incidentally become acquainted with Justinian, the heir-apparent to the throne, she completely captivated him by her beauty, her many social charms, and her real mental superiority. After the death of the Empress Euphemia, he married her (525), and after his accession to the throne he made her co-regent. Justinian hated the Monophysites, and considered it one of the great objects of his reign to carry through the ordinances of the Council of Chalcedon (451). Nevertheless, Theodora succeeded in having a Monophysite, Anthimus, appointed Patriarch of Jerusalem in 535; and when Anthimus was deposed in the following year, on account of the denunciations of Agapetus, Bishop of Rome, she succeeded in giving Agapetus himself a Monophysite successor, Vigilius, in 536. As soon, however, as Vigilius had come in possession of the Roman chair by the intrigues of Theodora and the armed aid of Belisarius, he withdrew from the alliance; and his Monophysitism remained a secret, or at least a private affair. Only in the Three-Chapter controversy she compelled him to play an open game, to recognize Macenas as Patriarch of Constantinople, and to promise to preside over a synod to be convened in Constantinople. She died, however, before the council met. See J. P. DE LUDWIG: Vita Justiniani et Theodoræ, Halle, 1731; PH. INVERNIZZI: De rebus gestis Justiniani, Rome, 1783; GIBBON: History.—II. Theodora, the wife of Theophilus (829-842). Theophilus was an iconoclast; and the rigorousness, not to say cruelty, with which he enforced his various measures against image-worship, produced great excitement in the numerous monasteries, whose monks chiefly lived by the manufacture of images. Before his death, he confided the regency, during the minority of his son, to his wife Theodora, her brother Bardas, the general Manuel, and the chancellor Theoctistus. But Theodora was an ardent image-worshipper. She immediately gave freedom of conscience, which, however, she herself interpreted in a very partial manner, not only calling back those image-worshippers who had been banished by Theophilus, but also expelling all the iconoclasts whom he had appointed. Thus the Patriarch of Constantinople, Johannes Grammaticus, was deposed, and a monk, Methodius, a fanatical image-worshipper, appointed in his stead. In 842 she convened a synod in Constantinople, which restored the images to the churches throughout the realm, and instituted an annual festival, the feast of orthodoxy, in commemoration of the act. At the same time she renewed the persecutions against the Paulicians; but as the latter formed a very powerful party, and, for their defence, entered into alliance with the Saracens, a war ensued, in which several of the fairest provinces of the empire were laid waste. More considerate was her policy with respect to the Bulgarians, whose conversion to Christianity was effected in 862 by Cyrillus and Methodius. In the mean time, her son, Michael III., had grown up in complete ignorance, a prey to his own unbridled passions and corrupt caprices; and a conspiracy between him and Bardas compelled her to lay down the sceptre, and retire into private life. She was suspected, however, by her own son, and shut up in a monastery, where she died shortly after, in 855. See the literature under IMAGE-WORSHIP. KLIPPEL.

THEODORE is the name of two popes.—Theodore I. (642-649) was a Greek by birth. As a decided adversary of the Monothelites, he excommunicated Paulus, the Patriarch of Constantinople in 645, and recognized Pyrrhus, who, deposed himself as a Monothelite, had recanted in Rome. When restored to his see, Phyrus returned to Monothelitism, and Theodore then also excommunicated him. In 649 he convened a synod in Rome, which condemned the Typus. He wrote an Epistola synodica ad Paulum, and an Exemplar propositionis . . . adversus Pyrrhum. See the art. MONOTHELITES.—Theodore II. (897) was a Roman by birth. He reigned only twenty days.

THEODORE, St., was, according to Gregory of Nyssa (Oper., Paris, 1615, tom. ii. p. 1002) a Syrian or Armenian by birth, and served in the Roman army when the persecution of Maximin and Galerius began. Discovered, and brought before the Pagan court, he refused to recant, was sentenced to death, and burnt. He is commemorated by the Greek Church on Feb. 17, by the Roman on Nov. 19.

THEODORE, surnamed Graptus, b. in Jerusalem; educated in the monastery of St. Saba, and ordained a presbyter there; was in 818 sent to Constantinople by the Patriarch Thomas of Jerusalem, in order to defend the worship of images, and that he did, so regardless of circumstances, that he was thrice scourged and banished, the last time to Apamea in Bithynia, where he died. A Nicephori Disputatio written by him, a letter from Bishop John of Cyzicum, telling us about his sufferings, and a life of him, are found in COMBESIS (Orig. Constantinop., p. 159), together with fragments of a larger work, In fide orthodoxa contra Iconomachos.

THEODORE LECTOR, one of the last of the Old Greek Church historians; was lector in the Church of Constantinople in 525. He wrote a Historia Tripartita,—extracts from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; but it has never been published. Of much importance was a second work by him, a continuation down to the time of Justin the Elder; but it has perished. Only fragments of it have been preserved by John of Damascus, Nilus, and Nicephorus Callisti: they have been published in Paris, 1544, and at Canterbury, by G. Reading, 1720.

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA, b. at Antioch about 350; d. at Mopsuestia, in Cilicia secunda, 428 or 429; one of the chief leaders of the Antiochian school of theology. As a preparation for a juridical career, he studied philosophy and rhetoric under the famous Libanius, but at the same time he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom; and the religious enthusiasm of the latter induced him to devote his life to Christian philosophy and asceticism. Soon after, however, he repented of the change, and meditated a return to his former occupation; but the reproaches and admonitions of his friend finally decided him (see Chrysostom: Ad Theod. lapsum). His biblical studies he made under Diodorus the presbyter, afterwards bishop of Tarsus: indeed, his whole character as a theologian was modelled by Diodorus. He was ordained a presbyter in the Church of Antioch, and as a teacher in the school he soon acquired a great reputation. John, afterwards bishop of Antioch, Theodoret, and perhaps, also, Nestorius, were among his pupils. In 392 he was elected bishop of Mopsuestia; and in 394 he was present at a synod in Constantinople, where the emperor, Theodosius I., is said to have been very much impressed by his preaching. Throughout the whole Eastern Church his name had a great weight: even Cyril of Alexandria, to whom he sent his Commentary on Job, felt the greatest esteem for him. Nor did the attitude he assumed in the Pelagian controversy in any way impair his authority. It was not until the outbreak of the Nestorian controversy, and the clash between the christology of the Antiochian school and that of the Alexandrian school, that his name came into bad odor; but he died just as the controversy began.

Theodore was a very prolific writer. A great number of his works were devoted to the interpretation of Scripture. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, Job, the four Gospels, the Acts, and the Pauline Epistles; but, unfortunately, only his Commentary on the Minor Prophets—which, however, is very instructive with respect to his exegetical method—has come down to us in its original Greek text. A Latin Commentary on the minor Pauline Epistles, which Pitra has published under the name of Hilary of Poitiers, is now generally considered as belonging to Theodore; and extracts of his other commentaries have been collected by Wegnern, A. Mai, and Fritzsche, from the catenæ. Under the influence of the Alexandrian school, the mystico-allegorical interpretation of Scripture prevailed throughout the Greek Church, more especially the christological interpretation of the Old Testament, totally neglecting the organical connection and all historical relations. In opposition to this method of exegesis, Theodore, following the track of Eusebius of Emesa and Diodorus of Tarsus, placed a simple, direct interpretation, based on the given historical conditions; not that he, for instance, denied the idea of prophecy, but he confined its application within very narrow limits, outside of which he ascribed to it only a typical designation. Thus he referred all the messianic Psalms, with the exception of three, to Zerubbabel and Hezekiah, and denied altogether that the Old Testament knew any thing of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as forming the Trinity. Equally free was his treatment of the canon. He distinguished between historical, prophetic, and pedagogical books; and the last group (Job, the Solomonian writings) he criticised without reserve. The Canticles he rejected altogether, and spoke of with great contempt.

It took some time before the Pelagian controversy, which originated in the West, reached the East, and at first it made no deep impression there. Nevertheless, there came a moment when Theodore felt compelled to make an open attack on the Augustinian doctrine of hereditary sin; and he wrote his book Against those who say that man falls by nature, and not by sentence. The book itself has perished: but Marius Mercator has preserved some fragments of it in Latin translation; and Photius, who had read it, gives a summary of its contents. It was directed against Augustine, but addressed to Jerome. The latter is very plainly indicated by allusions to his translation of the Bible, his journey to the East, etc.; and the circumstance that he had spread the new heresy in Syria; by writing books in its defence was the very cause of Theodore's interference. Theodore absolutely rejects such propositions as these,—that man, originally created good and immortal, became bad and mortal by Adam's sin; that sin now has its origin in human nature, and not in the will of man; that newly born infants are tainted by sin, and must obtain forgiveness by baptism, and eating the Lord's Supper; that marriage and generation are the evil results of an evil nature, etc. According to Marius Mercator and Photius, he even went so far as to assert that man was created mortal by God, and that the doctrine of death as a punishment of sin is a mere fiction invented for the purpose of sharpening man's hatred of sin. In his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans he expresses himself very cautiously on this point; and, though he does not directly deviate from the Pauline doctrine of the relation between sin and death, he evidently considered the history of the human race so closely connected with the general development of the world, that death became to his eyes a necessary and indispensable transition in human existence. At a later date, Julian of Eclanum, and other Pelagians who were expelled from Italy, found refuge with him. It is therefore a mistake to say, that at a provincial council he took part in the condemnation of Pelagianism.

The exegetical principle of Theodore, as well as the position he took in the Pelagian controversy, gives a preliminary idea of his christological views. While presbyter of Antioch, he wrote fifteen books on the incarnation, and a special work against Eunomius. Thirty years later on, as bishop of Mopsuestia, he wrote a work against Apollinaris. These books have perished, with the exception of a few fragments; but we know that he was the true representative of the speculative theology of the Antiochian school, and that, in contradistinction to the Alexandrian school, he emphasized in his christology the completeness of the human nature of Christ, and its indelible difference from his divine nature. It was, however, not he, but Nestorius, who was destined to carry this view to its last consequences, and fight for it in the world. At the Council of Ephesus (431) no one dared to attack Theodore directly; and, though open attacks were made upon him shortly after by Marius Mercator and Rabulas of Edessa, it took more than a century before the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in weaning the Eastern Church from its great teacher, and branding his name with the stamp of heresy. See NESTORIUS and THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY.

THEODORET, b. at Antioch towards the close of the fourth century; d. at Cyrus, or Cyrrhus, the capital of the Syrian province of Cyrrhestica, 457. He was educated in the monastery of St. Euprepus, near Antioch; ordained a deacon by Bishop Porphyrius; and elected bishop of Cyrus in 420 and 423. As a pupil of Diodorus of Tarsus, and Theodore of Mopsuestia, he joined at the synod of Ephesus (431) the minority which deposed Cyril; but by the robber-synod of Ephesus (449) he was himself deposed, and banished to the monastery of Apamea. By the synod of Chalcedon, however (451), he was again restored to his see. He was a very prolific writer. Exegetical, historical, polemical, and dogmatical works, sermons, and letters by him, still exist. But his principal work is his Church History, comprising the period from 325 to 429, translated into French by Mathée (Poitiers, 1514). The first collected edition of his works was published by Sirmond (Paris, 1642, 4 vols. fol.), to which was added in 1684 a fifth by Hardouin, containing, among other things, his life by Garnier. There are also editions by Schulze (Halle, 1769–74, 4 vols.) and Migne (Paris, 1859–60, 5 vols.). See ROOS: De Theodoro Clementis et Eusebii compilatore, Halle, 1883, 69 pp.; A. THEODOSIUS (I.) THE GREAT, Emperor of the East, Jan. 19, 379–Jan. 17, 395. He was a native of Spain, b. at Canca in 346. He was educated in the camp; and it was his military exploits which induced Gratian to accept him as co-regent, and leave him the eastern part of the empire. Nevertheless, he exercised as great an influence on the religious as on the political affairs of the realm. He belonged to the orthodox party, and one year after his accession to the throne (Feb. 28, 380) he issued a decree which declared the Nicene Confession the only true and catholic one, and threatened with severe punishment any deviations from it. Immediately after his entrance in Constantinople, he deposed the bishop, Demophilus, one of the leaders of the Arians, and banished him from the city; and, in spite of the riots of the Arian populace, he gave all the churches of the capital to the orthodox, and put a heavy penalty on the celebration, even in private, of Arian service. In spring, 381, he convened a synod in Constantinople,—the second oecumenical council, consisting of a hundred and fifty picked bishops. The thirty-six bishops belonging to the semi-Arian group, and forming the party of Macedonius, were at once brought to silence; and the council confirmed the Nicene Creed, adding the new clause of the procession of the Holy Spirit. The decrees of the council were followed by a number of imperial edicts depriving Christians who relapsed into Paganism of the right of making a will, or inheriting a bequest, confiscating the property of the Manichæans unless they allowed their children to be educated in the Catholic faith, and forbidding the Eunomians and the Arians to build churches, and celebrate service. He also exercised considerable influence on the religious affairs of the West, especially after the overthrow of Maximus in 388, and the establishment of Valentinian II., and still more especially after the crushing of the rebellion of Arbogast in 392, and the establishment of Honorius. He was a friend of Ambrose, and accepted with meekness a very severe rebuke from him. In order to avenge the assassination of Botericus, his governor in Thessalonica, he allowed over seven thousand mostly innocent people to be massacred (April, 390); but, when Ambrose heard of his cruelty, he denied the emperor access to the church until due penance was done. In Alexandria he ordered, and in other places he allowed, the Pagan temples to be destroyed; and certain forms of Pagan worship—sacrifice, investigation of the future, etc.—he absolutely forbade, even under penalty of death. THEODOTIUS. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 281.

THEODULPH, surnamed Aurelianensis, one of those men whom Charlemagne invited from Italy to France for the advancement of science and art in the latter country. He was probably a Goth by descent. He came to Gaul at the latest in 781, and was made abbot of Fleury, and afterwards bishop of Orleans, where he died in 821. His literary character is not unlike that of Alcuin. He was a poet and a theologian. His theological works consist of minor treatises: De ordine baptismi, De spiritu sancto, etc., and capitularia for his priests, which show that he was very anxious for the establishment of schools. His poems were edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1646. His collected works are found in Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. 105. [See H. HAGEN: Theodulfi episcopi Aurelianensis de iudiciis versus cogniti, Bern, 1882, 31 pp.] JULIUS WEIZÄCKER.

THEOGNOSTUS is mentioned by Philippus of Sida as being catechist in the school of Alexandria in the second half of the third century. See DOWELL: Dissert. in Iron., Oxford, 1689. According to Photius (c. 106), he belonged to the party of Origen, and wrote a large speculative work on the general scheme of loci. The fragments of his works which have come down to us are found in ROUTH: Reliqu. Sacr., iii. p. 221.

THEOLOGIA GERMANICA is the name of a little book first discovered and published by Luther. The first edition, of 1516, contains only about one-fourth of the whole work; but the second, of 1518, is complete, and bears the title Eyn Deutsch Theologia, which has ever since continued in use. Wherever the book went, it made friends, except in Rome, where it was put on the Index. No less than seventy editions of it have been required up to the present time. It has been translated into High and Low German, Dutch, English, French, Walloon, and Latin. Up to our day, however, all editions were made from the same manuscript which Luther used; but in the middle of the present century another and more complete manuscript was discovered in Würzburg, and published by F. Pfeiffer, Stuttgart, 1851, 3d ed., Gütersloh, 1855. [The best English translation is that by Susanna Winkworth, London, 1854, new ed. 1874.] It is not known who is the author of this book; but it appears from the book itself that he was a priest, and custos in the Deutschherrn-Hause in Francfort, and a member of the "Friends of God." The character of the book corresponds closely with that of the works of Eckart, Tauler, and Suso, urging the sacrifice of one's own self, with all its deceptions and vanities, in order to better fulfil the will of God. See LISCO: Die Heilslehre der Theologia Deutsch, Stuttgart, 1857, and PFEIFFER (above). JULIUS HAMBERGER.

THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION. Among the ancient Hebrews, from the time of Samuel on, there were schools of the prophets, in which young men were trained for the office of public instruction. (See EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS.) The sons of priests were trained in the temple service for their subsequent duties. At a later date the synagogues were the schools of the Jews. The apostles received their special training, first in the school of John the Baptist, and then in that of Christ. Paul alone had a rabbinical education. The necessity of special training was felt early in the Christian Church, not only for the conduct of worship, but the opposition of error, and, above all, the Pagan religion. The first instruction was given, probably, in the local churches, by their bishops; but, at the close of the second century, there existed at Alexandria a theological seminary, the first of its kind, in which students were drilled in Christian apologetics, and guided in the study of the Scriptures. It is known as the catechetical school of Alexandria. Its primary purpose was to prepare catechumens for baptism; but it answered a wider design, and instructed those already Christians. The first known superintendent of this school is Pantænus, but the most famous are Clement and Origen. At first the school had only one teacher, then two or more, but without fixed salary or special buildings. The more wealthy pupils paid for tuition, but the offer was often declined. The teachers gave instructions in their dwellings, generally after the style of the ancient philosophers. Origen established a similar school at Cæsarea. The dissensions in the Alexandrian Church put an end to the school at the close of the fourth century.

Next in point of time and importance comes the school of Antioch, which was founded about 290 by the presbyters Dorotheus and Lucian. In opposition to Alexandrian allegorizing, it developed a severe grammatico-historical exegesis. Its most eminent members are Chrysostom, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Nestorius. In Edessa, Ephrem Syrus (d. 378) founded a school, and continued the methods of Antioch. It furnished ministers for Mesopotamia and Persia.

In the West the priests were trained in cloisters and private episcopal schools. The Roman Church has continued to train her clergy in this fashion. Several of the most learned Fathers, such as Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, and Augustine, were educated in heathen schools, and then studied theology, either in ascetic retirement or under some distinguished church-teacher.

In the middle age the cloister schools were the sole centres of learning until the universities arose at Paris, Oxford, Cologne, and elsewhere. In them the theological faculty ranked first, and dominated the others. In England, John Wiclif (d. 1381) had a seminary at Oxford, and later at Lutterworth, in which he trained the "poor priests," who disseminated Lollard doctrine all over the land. The Reformers were university trained men. The ministry of the Protestant churches of most denominations has always been distinguished for its education. On the Continent, theology in all its branches is taught as a department of the university. The theological students are on a par with those of the other faculties. The professors are members of the university corps, but constitute a separate faculty. In the great English universities those who contemplate entering holy orders read with a professor, and are examined by a bishop's chaplain. There is no regular theological faculty, and no theological department, though there are theological professors. Independent of the universities, there are, however, eighteen theological schools connected with the Church of England, under the supervision of bishops. In Scotland the Established Church has regular theological faculties at its four universities,—Glasgow, Edinburgh, St. Andrews, and Aberdeen. The Free Church has three "theological halls," as they are called,—at New College, Edinburgh, with seven professors; at Glasgow, with four; and at Aberdeen, with four. The United Presbyterian Church has its "hall" at Edinburgh, with four professors. The Presbyterians of England have a "theological college" in London; those of Ireland, one in Belfast, and another in Derry. The Wesleyans have in Great Britain seven theological schools, the Congregationalists fourteen, the Baptists nine, and the Roman Catholics twenty-six. All these are supported by voluntary subscriptions.

THEOLOGICAL SEMINARIES, Sketches of (arranged according to denominations, in alphabetical order, and chronologically under each). Each sketch is prepared by a professor or secretary of the institution. Some sketches are anticipated in earlier arts.

I. Baptist. (1) HAMILTON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated in Hamilton, N.Y., a suburban village of rare beauty and healthfulness, distinguished as an educational centre among Baptists, where in one system of schools are trained one-tenth of all ministerial students of that denomination in the United States. The seminary was founded in 1819 by far-sighted pioneers, who were actuated by a profound conviction, then widely felt, of the necessity of higher education for the ministry. It is the oldest Baptist seminary in the country, has sent out the largest number of students, and, by reason of its pronounced religious and missionary character, has been most intimately identified with the history and growth of American Baptists for the past sixty years. Its impress upon alumni is claimed to show the following characteristics:—a biblical theology, an educative pulpit, a missionary spirit, and remarkable adaptation to the varied phases of real life. The course of study embraces six departments under as many regular professors, with series of lectures by other eminent scholars, and covers a period of three years, with abundant provision for special students. The seminary owns a domain of a hundred and thirty acres, on which are several residences, two large four-story school-buildings, and a site for another finer structure, which is to be speedily erected. Its financial condition is excellent. Productive funds insure the payment of all salaries and current expenses. Numerous scholarships, and generous contributions from the churches, provide for the needs of indigent students. Carefully selected working libraries are accessible, to the extent of 20,000 volumes. The presidents have been, Rev. Drs. D. Hascall, N. Kendrick, J. S. Maginnis, G. W. Eaton, and E. Dodge, the present head. The chairs of instruction have been occupied by such eminent teachers as Barnas Sears, Thomas J. Conant, Asahel C. Kendrick, A. N. Arnold, David Weston, A. M. Beebe, H. Harvey, and W. H. Maynard.

H. S. LOYD (Secretary).

(2) NEWTON THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION. See art. by Dr. Hovey, vol. ii. p. 1612.

(3) ROCHESTER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.—This institution was established at Rochester, N.Y., in 1850. It is supported and controlled by Baptist churches, and is strictly a professional school for the higher education of candidates for the Christian ministry. The seminary has no organic connection with the University of Rochester, either in management or instruction, though both institutions were founded at about the same time, and largely through the same instrumentalities.

The influence and characteristics of the seminary during the first twenty years of its history are due, more than to any other one man, to Ezekiel G. Robinson, D.D., LL.D., for many years instructor in both homiletics and systematic theology. Among other past instructors, are included Drs. Thomas J. Conant, Horatio B. Hackett, John H. Raymond, Asahel C. Kendrick, and George W. Northrup. There were at first only two professors. There are now, in the English department alone, six active professors; viz., Rev. Augustus Strong, D.D. (since 1872 president), Rev. Howard Osgood, D.D., William A. Stevens, D.D., LL.D., Rev. T. Harwood Pattison, D.D., Rev. Adelbert S. Coats, and Rev. Benjamin O. True.

The German department, altogether distinct from the regular English course, was founded in 1854. It is the only school in America expressly designed to train men for the ministry in German Baptist churches. Since 1858 Rev. Augustus Rauschenbusch, a pupil of Neander, has had charge of this department.

A peculiarity of the seminary has been the widely separated sections of country from which its students have come, and to which they have gone. During its entire history of thirty-two years, about eight hundred persons have entered the institution. They have come from sixty-five colleges, and from forty-two states and countries. Among them are pastors in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, in the Southern States, and on the Pacific coast. Forty have been professors in colleges and theological seminaries, and about the same number have become foreign missionaries. Of the six hundred students connected with the English department, nearly four hundred have completed the full course, including the study of the Scriptures in Hebrew and Greek.

For several years the financial resources of the seminary were entirely inadequate, and altogether disproportionate to its usefulness. In 1868 the funds amounted to only $100,000, and there were no permanent buildings. In 1869 Mr. John B. Trevor was the largest donor of Trevor Hall, a spacious dormitory building, which cost $42,000. In 1879 Rockefeller Hall, containing convenient lecture-rooms, a chapel, a fire-proof room used as a library, and costing $38,000, was erected by Mr. John D. Rockefeller. Other prominent benefactors are Messrs. Jacob F. Wyckoff, Joseph B. Hoyt, John H. Deane, Charles Pratt, and James O. Pettengill. At present the invested funds amount to about $450,000. The land and buildings are valued at $125,000.

The library, numbering nearly 20,000 volumes, is well arranged, and of exceptional value for theological study. It comprises the entire collection of Neander, the church historian; and during the last five years $25,000, the timely gift of Mr. William Rockefeller, has been expended in the purchase of carefully selected works.

Subscription to creeds or to formal statements of doctrine is never required of either students or instructors. Persons of all evangelical denominations who give satisfactory evidence of personal religious experience, and of a call to the Christian ministry, are admitted to the privileges of the institution. BENJAMIN O. TRUE (Professor).

(4) THE SOUTHERN BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was established in 1859 at Greenville, S.C., and removed in 1877 to Louisville, Ky. Its plan of instruction is quite peculiar, all the studies being elective. In 1856 Rev. James P. Boyce, D.D., in a published address entitled Three Changes in our Theological Institutions, urged that provision should be made in the same institution to give the most extensive and thorough theological course to those desiring and prepared for it, and at the same time a good theological course to those who can study only the English Scriptures, and also opportunity for any student to select special studies at will. This was considered necessary to meet the wants of the Baptist ministry, which includes men of all grades of general education.

In order to fulfil these conditions, the whole range of theological study was divided into eight independent schools, some of them having two separate departments; as Old-Testament English and Hebrew, New-Testament English and Greek, Systematic Theology English and Latin. Among these schools and departments, each student selects, under the guidance of the professors, according to his preparation, and the number of years he can give to theological studies. Some remain only one session (of eight months); others, two, three, four, or even five years. A separate diploma is given in each school to those who have pursued its studies, and have passed very thorough written examinations, intermediate and final. Those who have been thus graduated in all the schools receive at last the diploma of "full graduate;" and those graduated in all except the departments of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Theology, receive the diploma of "English graduate." Some of the students thus pursue an unusually extensive course, such as would not be possible where there is the same curriculum for all. It is noticed that all alike elect to attend the "English" classes in the Bible and theology, the most scholarly finding these highly profitable along with their more erudite studies.

Beginning in 1859 with a good endowment (subscribed by Southern planters) and a large attendance, the seminary was suspended, 1862-65, by the war, and began again in 1865 with seven students and no endowment, the private bonds being then valueless. It has lived, through great exertions and sacrifices, with a steadily increasing attendance, till, in 1882-83, there were a hundred and twenty students from twenty different States. The invested endowment has reached over $200,000, besides $50,000 in real estate. Most of this has been contributed at the South, but several friends in New-York City and elsewhere have given very generous assistance.

The professors have been James P. Boyce, D.D. (since 1859), chairman of the faculty, John A. Broadus, D.D. (since 1859), Basil Maule, D.D. (1859-71 and since 1879), Crawford H. Toy, D.D. (1869-79), William H. Whitsett, D.D. (since 1872), William Williams, D.D. (1859-77, when he died), Rev. G. W. Riggan, assistant instructor (since 1881). JOHN A. BROADUS (Professor).

(5) THE BAPTIST THEOLOGICAL UNION, located at Chicago, was organized in 1863, its object being to establish and sustain a theological seminary. In 1865 W. W. Cook of Whitehall, N.Y., and Lawrence Barnes and Mial Davis of Burlington, Vt., pledged fifteen hundred dollars per year, for five years, for the support of a professor. Instruction was given, under this encouragement, to about one dozen students, in 1866, by Dr. N. Colver and Rev. J. C. C. Clark, in the building of the Chicago University.

In September, 1866, Rev. G. W. Northrup, D.D., professor of church history in the Rochester Theological Seminary, was invited to the presidency, and professorship of systematic theology; and Rev. J. B. Jackson, D.D., of Albion, N.Y., was chosen to the chair of church history. They accepted the appointments, and entered on their duties in October, 1867, when the seminary was fully organized, and commenced its work with twenty students. In the early years of its history the seminary found most liberal helpers in C. N. Holden and C. B. Goodyear of Chicago, and J. Warren Merrill of Boston. In 1869 the first seminary building was erected in Chicago.

In 1873 a Scandinavian department was organized, under the care of Rev. J. A. Edgren. It began with four students. In 1882-83 the number had increased to twenty-eight.

In 1877 the institution was removed to Morgan Park, a suburb eight miles south of Chicago. Here the seminary has a beautiful site of five acres, and one commodious building. It is proposed eventually to use the present building for dormitories exclusively, and to add three others, — one for the Scandinavian department, one for the library, and one for chapel and lecture-rooms. Beside the teachers already mentioned, the following professors have been members of the faculty, — Rev. A. N. Arnold, D.D., Rev. William Hague, D.D., G. W. Warren, Rev. E. C. Mitchell, D.D., Rev. R. E. Pattison, D.D., Rev. T. J. Morgan, D.D., Rev. J. R. Boise, D.D., LL.D., W. R. Harper, Ph.D., Rev. E. B. Hulbert, D.D., Rev. J. A. Smith, D.D., Rev. N. P. Jensen.

Dr. G. W. Northrup has been president from the beginning, and conducted the affairs of the seminary with distinguished ability.

Rev. G. S. Bailey, D.D., was financial secretary from 1867 to 1875, and was succeeded by Rev. T. W. Goodspeed, D.D., in 1876.

The growth of the seminary has been rapid from the beginning. The first year there were twenty students; the second year, twenty-five; and, with occasional fluctuation, this rate of increase has continued through sixteen years, the number of students in 1882-83, reaching ninety-four. Being the only Baptist theological seminary in the West, it seems destined to attract increasing numbers of students every year.

The library numbers about 20,000 volumes, and is of great value.

In 1880 the endowment of the seminary was about $50,000. In 1881 E. Nelson Blake of Chicago, long a most liberal friend of the institution, subscribed $30,000, on condition that the amount be increased to $100,000. The effort to do this was successful. In 1883 J. D. Rockefeller of Cleveland subscribed $10,000, on similar conditions. The completion of this subscription gives the seminary a living endowment. T. W. GOODSPEED (Sec'y).

II. Congregational. (1) ANDOVER. See art. by Professor Park, vol. i. p. 81.

(2) BANGOR THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY was chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts in February, 1814. It was designed to provide an evangelical ministry for the State, then the District, of Maine. It was originally located at Hampden on the Penobscot River, where it began its work in October, 1816. The founders of the seminary had especially in view the needs of students desirous of entering the ministry without a previous college-training. Accordingly the original course of study occupied four years; the first two chiefly devoted to literary and classical studies, and the last two to the strictly theological branches. In 1819 the institution was removed to Bangor, at the head of navigation on the Penobscot, then a town of twelve hundred inhabitants. In 1820 the first class, numbering six students, was graduated. In the same year the District was separated from Massachusetts, and became the State of Maine. It was in territory larger than the rest of New England, and had a population of three hundred thousand, largely of Puritan descent. In 1827 the classical department was given up, the period of study reduced to three years, and the curriculum made similar to that of other theological institutions in this country.

During the sixty-seven years of its existence, the seminary has numbered among its instructors not a few men eminent for piety, scholarship, and influence. Not to speak of any still living, mention may be made of Jehudi Ashmun, afterwards distinguished by his labors in the service of the American Colonization Society; the scholarly and accomplished Leonard Woods, jun., afterwards president of Bowdoin College; George Shepard, so widely known and eminent as a pulpit-orator; and Enoch Pond, to whom, more than any other man, the success of the institution was due, and who for fifty years was connected with it as professor and president.

The seminary has sent out more than six hundred graduates, and given a partial theological education to nearly two hundred more. These men have made a faithful and useful body of workers. The majority of them are still living, and are at their posts all over the land, or laboring in foreign countries, in pulpits of many denominations and every grade of eminence.

The seminary has been from the first connected with the Congregational denomination, its board of trustees and faculty being members of Congregational churches. Its aim, however, has always been practically Christian, rather than denominational. Its founders favored the type of theology known as "New-England theology," but Bangor has never been identified with any particular school or system. At present the seminary draws its students, not only from Maine and other parts of New England, but also from the Dominion of Canada, especially the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The faculty as now constituted numbers five professors. The number of students in attendance has varied from twenty to fifty.

L. F. STEARNS (Professor).

(4) THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTE OF CONNECTICUT (now usually known as HARTFORD THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY), the fourth in age, and second in number of students, among Congregational seminaries in the United States. Established in 1831 at East Windsor Hill, Conn.; the laying of the corner-stone of the building, and the inauguration of Dr. Tyler (see art. BENNET TYLER), taking place May 13. Removed to Hartford in 1865, where a commodious building was erected through the munificence of Mr. James B. Hosmer. The corner-stone of Hosmer Hall was laid in May,

1879, and the building occupied early in 1880. The appointments and arrangements of the edifice are admirably adapted for its purpose. The library-building is connected with the main hall; the chapel, recitation-rooms, dormitories, dining-hall, etc., are under the same roof; the well-equipped gymnasium is a detached building. For an account of the origin of the institute, see art. BENNET TYLER. The Pastoral Union of Connecticut chooses ten trustees annually (since 1880 one-third retire each year); the former body elects its own members, who are required to subscribe its creed, to which the professors give their assent annually. The three professors first chosen were Bennet Tyler, D.D., Jonathan Cogswell, D.D., and William Thompson, D.D. The last-named survives, and continued in active service until 1881, when he became professor emeritus. There are at present (1883) five active professors, an instructor in music and voice-building, and one in gymnastics. A course of lectures on the Carew foundation is given each year.

The number of students in all amounts to 495: at present there are 53 in attendance. Twenty-eight graduates have become foreign missionaries. The theological position of the seminary has from the beginning been Calvinistic, and the creed is in accordance with the accredited formularies of New-England Congregationalism. The present faculty recognize, more fully than did the founders of the institute, the exegetical and historical point of view; but the doctrinal result is substantially the same. The views on the doctrine of original sin are probably more Augustinian than those of Dr. Tyler; and the entire range of theological science is now regarded, in its higher unity, as centring in the person and work of Christ.

The methods of instruction are less formal than in many institutions,—fewer lectures and more constant drill, together with a greater demand for individual labor on the part of the students.

The chief benefactor of the seminary has been Mr. James B. Hosmer, who not only gave the present building, and endowed the chair of New-Testament exegesis, but left a considerable sum to the general fund. In the early years of the institute, annual contributions of small sums were made by many persons who were in sympathy with its aims. Recently Mr. Newton Case of Hartford has given largely to increase the library, which now numbers over 35,000 volumes, many of them rare and valuable. It is particularly rich in editions of ancient codices, early printed New Testaments, patristic literature, and works of the sixteenth century. The collection of periodical literature, especially of missionary intelligence, is large and increasing. M. B. RIDDLE (Professor).

(6) THE CHICAGO THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY dates its existence from the fall of 1854. It was the first of the four denominational seminaries located at Chicago, or in its vicinity, and had its origin in a deep and widespread conviction that the time had come when the churches of the West should more largely provide and educate their own ministers. After several preliminary conferences, it was organized Sept. 26, 1854, by a convention, called for that purpose, of delegates from the Congregational churches of Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Missouri. It was made directly responsible to the churches by being placed under the general supervision of triennial conventions, composed of the Congregational ministers, and one delegate from each of the Congregational churches in the States and Territories west of Ohio, and east of the Rocky Mountains. These triennial conventions elect the board of twenty-four directors and the board of twelve visitors, under whose direct control the seminary is placed, and who, by the requirements of its constitution, must be members of some Congregational church within the bounds of its constituency. The members of these boards hold their office for six years, and are eligible for re-election.

The seminary was thus, from the first, under Congregational control; but its privileges were equally open to students from all denominations of Christians. A special and liberal charter, exempting all the property of the seminary from taxation, was secured from the State of Illinois, Feb. 15, 1854.

The institution was formally opened Oct. 6, 1858, with two professors — Professor Joseph Haven, D.D., and Professor Samuel C. Bartlett, D.D. — and twenty-nine students.

Subsequently other chairs were filled; and the present faculty (1883) are:—

 Professor J. R. ANTHONY, Instructor in Education.
 Professor GUSTAV A. ZIMMERMAN, Instructor in German Department.

A special course of study is provided for those, who, though not able to acquire a liberal education, may yet possess both the talents and piety requisite for the Christian ministry. Also a German department is established, giving such instruction and training, additional to the regular studies of the seminary, as will best qualify German students to preach the gospel in their mother-tongue as well as in English.

During the twenty-five years since the opening of the seminary, 496 have been under instruction, and 213 have graduated. The seminary-buildings, Keves and Carpenter Halls, and Hammond Library, are located fronting Union Park, Chicago, and in addition to lecture-rooms, chapel, and library, furnish study and dormitory rooms for nearly a hundred students.

The library numbers about 7,000 volumes, and with the completion of the new fire-proof library-building, immediate efforts will be made for its enlargement. Seven professorships are established, which are in part or fully endowed; also twenty-five scholarships, yielding an average annual income of a hundred dollars each. From these and other educational funds a hundred and fifty dollars of annual aid is given to the students who need it.

The seminary has had a vigorous growth, and now furnishes to theological students ample privileges and instructions. With its able faculty, its central position, and the large and continually increasing number of churches embraced in its constituency, its future enlargement and usefulness are assured. There is no reason to question, that it will be the peer of the best seminaries in the land. G. S. F. SAVAGE (Secretary and Treasurer).

III. Episcopalian. (1) THE GENERAL THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in New York was founded May 27, 1817, by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, to provide a school for the education of its candidates for holy orders, whose plan and situation would meet the wants of the church in all sections of the country. Bishop Bowen of South Carolina, Bishop White of Pennsylvania, and Bishop Hobart of New York, were most active in its behalf. In accordance with a plan drawn up by the two latter bishops, foreshadowing the institution and its several professorships as they exist to-day, it was opened in a room of St. Paul's Chapel, May 1, 1819. The first professors were the Rev. Samuel H. Turner, D.D., and the Rev. Samuel F. Jarvis, D.D. But notwithstanding the munificent offer by Dr. Clement C. Moore, of the ground on which the buildings now stand, and the efforts of a large committee, subscriptions came in so slowly, that the General Convention, in 1820, removed it to New Haven, where it was thought it might be supported at less expense than in New York. That this was an error soon made itself apparent; and the death of Mr. Jacob Sherred of New York, who left a noble legacy of $60,000 to a seminary to be established in New York, gave the Convention an opportunity to bring it back in 1822, and thus correct a mistake which would have proved fatal to its continuing a general institution. It was re-opened in a building belonging to Trinity School, on the corner of Canal and Varick Streets, in February, 1822, with twenty-three students and six professors. The constitution laid the foundation of a widely extended system of theological instruction. It provided not only for the seminary in New York, but for branch schools under its control in different parts of the country. In its board of trustees, which is elected in part by the General Convention and in part by certain dioceses, the church in all parts of the United States is represented. The course of study is to be prescribed by the House of Bishops; and each bishop is not only ex officio a trustee, but a visitor of the institution, with all the powers that that involves. Thus the interest, as well as the rights, of every part of the Episcopal Church in its general seminary, is amply secured and protected.

The corner-stone of the first building, now known as the East Building, was laid July 28, 1825, by Bishop White, in the presence of a large assemblage of clergy and citizens, on the ground given by Dr. Clement C. Moore. At that time the site was an apple-orchard on the banks of the Hudson River, which at that time flowed a little east of the present Tenth Avenue.

In 1831, to accommodate the increasing number of students, a second building, now known as the West Building, was erected.

But it was still the day of small things for the Episcopal Church in this country, as well as for the city. The large fortunes now so common were then unknown; and, in common with all our other collegiate institutions, it had to struggle to do its work with a very small and insufficient endowment, but always with the unimpeachable record, that not a dollar of its trust-funds has ever been lost. More than once in its history, in consequence of the growth of the city, heavy assessments have been laid upon it, which have absorbed all its available income; and had not the professors, at great personal sacrifice, and some of the leading clergy of the city, voluntarily offered their services to the institution without remuneration, its trustees would have been compelled to close its doors. Thus it has gone on steadily with its work, until its graduates, which number more than a thousand, are to be found among the leading clergy of every diocese of the Episcopal Church; and on the roll-call of its alumni are the names of more than thirty honored bishops, scattered from Shanghai in the Far East to Oregon and Washington Territory in the Far West.

But a brighter day has at length dawned on its history. Renewed interest has been awakened among its old friends, and new ones enlisted. Within three years, the office of dean has been made permanent by a liberal foundation, two additional professorships endowed, provision made by Mr. Tracy R. Edson for instruction in elocution, a fellowship founded by Miss Caroline Talman in memory of her father, a lectureship similar to the Bampton Lectureship in England established by Mr. George A. Jarvis, and several handsome additions made to the general endowment. Encouraged by these gifts, and liberal donations for building-purposes, the trustees have recently procured from Mr. C. C. Haight, architect, a plan of a complete series of buildings for the future needs of the institution. They are to be of brownstone and brick, and in design similar to the collegiate buildings of Oxford and Cambridge; so arranged, that separate portions may be erected as memorials; and will, when finished, be an ornament to the city. The corner-stone of the first, which is to be called Sherred Hall, in memory of an early benefactor of the seminary, and which is to provide six ample lecture-rooms, was laid May 10, 1883. And already the fire-proof building which is to contain the valuable library has been promised, on condition that funds shall be provided to erect the dormitory which is to connect it with Sherred Hall. With its financial affairs in the hands of a very able committee, the day is not far distant when the seminary will be amply endowed for all departments of its work.

The students that have been matriculated number nearly fourteen hundred, of whom about a hundred are at present in the institution.

The library, which is particularly rich in some departments of theology, contains 17,500 volumes, and upwards of 10,000 pamphlets. It is open daily, from ten A.M. to five P.M., for the use of the students, and others who wish to consult its treasures.

The faculty is composed of a dean and six professors, as follows:—

The Rev. EUGENE A. COIT, D.D., Dean.
The Rev. WILLIAM E. EIGENRODT, D.D., "Eugene A. Hoffman" Professor of Pastoral Theology.

The Rev. SAMUEL BUEL, D.D., Professor of Systematic Divinity, etc.

The Rev. RANDALL C. HALL, D.D., "Clement C. Moore" Professor of the Hebrew and Greek Languages.

The Rev. ANDREW OLIVER, D.D., Professor of Biblical Learning, etc.

The Rev. WILLIAM J. SEABURY, D.D., "Charles and Elizabeth Ludlow" Professor of Ecclesiastical Polity and Law.

The Rev. THOMAS RICHEY, D.D., "St. Mark's Church in the Boverie" Professor of Ecclesiastical History.

The Rev. FRANCIS T. RUSSELL, Instructor in Elocution.

The following distinguished men have filled its professorial chairs in the past,—Bishops Brownell, Hobart, B. T. Onderdonk, Whittingham, and Seymour; the Rev. Drs. Samuel H. Turner, Samuel F. Jarvis, Bird Wilson, John D. Ogilby, Benjamin I. Haight, Samuel R. Johnson, Milo Mahan, Samuel Seabury, William Walton, John Murray Forbes, and Francis Vinton, with Clement C. Moore, LL.D., and the Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck.

(3) THE BERKELEY DIVINITY SCHOOL, at Middletown, Conn.—This school takes its name from Dr. George Berkeley, who came to this country in his forty-fourth year, in 1728, with the hope of founding an American college, and who resided some two years at Newport, R.I. It was originally a department of Trinity College, Hartford; but in 1851 it was proposed to erect it into an independent institution. An act of incorporation was obtained for it from the Legislature of Connecticut; and with its own board of trustees it was located at Middletown, where it has since remained. The first class which graduated from it dates from 1850, and the number of its alumni now exceeds two hundred and fifty. Its patrons have so far endowed it, that it now maintains five professors, and has a library amounting to 17,000 volumes. Of course its instruction is Episcopal; but it would not deny its privileges to a sincere student of any denomination who desired to listen to the teaching given, and to enjoy its opportunities for reading and meditation. For religious services, its chapel, which is a very commodious and beautiful building, is open twice daily,—at nine A.M. and five P.M. On Sundays the Holy Communion is administered, and sermons are occasionally delivered by the professors. The parish church is hard by, and on Sunday the students frequently go there. There are professorships of doctrinal theology and the prayer-book, of church history, of the literature and interpretation of the Jewish Scriptures, of the literature and interpretation of the Christian Scriptures, of the Christian evidences and homiletics, of the Hebrew tongue, and of elocution. The students are expected, at regular intervals, to deliver written and extempore sermons. The period of study comprises between eight and nine months, with short recesses at Christmas and Easter. The school opens the second Thursday in September. Tuition and room-rent free. Aid is extended to those who need it, under terms made known on application to the dean.

T. W. COIT (Professor).

(4) THE DIVINITY SCHOOL OF THE PROTES-

TANT-EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN PHILADELPHIA.—This school is situated on Woodland Avenue and Fiftieth Street, just on the south-west edge of the city, less than three miles from the City Hall and the depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad; which are at Penn Square, in the centre of the city. It is conveniently reached either by the steam-cars, from the Pennsylvania depot, or by horse-cars, from Chestnut Street.

Its present buildings were erected in 1882. They are situated on an elevated plateau, commanding a view of the city and of the country. They occupy a lot of ground with an area of several acres, fronting on the avenue, and having a fine old oak-grove in the rear. They are of three stories, constructed of stone, consisting of a centre building and two wings. They are supplied with gas, and warmed by steam throughout, with grates also in most of the rooms. In one wing is the kitchen department with laundry attached, and a dining-room for the students, also a gymnasium and bowling-alleys. In the other wing there are accommodations for the dean and his family. There are also a reception-room, a reading-room, five or six convenient lecture-rooms, and rooms for forty students. The chapel is not yet built; but funds are already provided for its erection, and in the mean time a large and commodious room is fitted up for a chapel in the present buildings.

An informal training-school for candidates for the ministry had existed for two or three years before 1860, under the direction of the late Bishop Alonzo Potter. Upon the breaking-out of the Rebellion, and the consequent closing of the Episcopal seminary at Alexandria, Va., it was thought desirable to establish in Philadelphia a fully equipped theological seminary or divinity school. Funds were procured, professors were appointed, and in 1862 the school was incorporated.

There are five professors of as many departments, including the instructor in Hebrew; viz., of biblical learning, Rev. Dr. Hare; of systematic divinity, Rev. Dr. Goodwin; of ecclesiastical history, Rev. D. Butler; of homiletics and pastoral care, Rev. Dr. Mejer-Smith; and of the Hebrew language, Rev. Mr. Du Bois.

The school has had students from Canada, the West Indies, Liberia, and from almost all parts of the United States, though very few from the Southern States proper; which is quite natural, as of course none came from them during the war, and at its close the Alexandria seminary was reopened. Out of nearly three hundred students matriculated, its graduated alumni number not quite two hundred; of whom two are bishops, and two others have declined the episcopate. The number of its students, however, cannot be expected to be very large, owing to the multiplication of theological seminaries, in the Episcopal Church, in all quarters of the country; and, had the re-opening of the Alexandria seminary been anticipated, this school might, perhaps, never have been established.

The institution is well endowed. Three of its professorships have independent foundations, and it has already a very valuable library of some 8,000 volumes.

As to its ecclesiastical position, it is that of moderate Episcopacy and conservative Churchmanship. It is liberal and evangelical in its teaching, adhering to the standards of the church's doctrine, but committed to no particular school or party.

DANIEL R. GOODWIN (Professor).

(5) THE EPISCOPAL THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL OF MASSACHUSETTS, in Cambridge.—This institution was founded in 1867 by the gift of $100,000, by the late B. T. Reed of Boston. It was the result of an often expressed feeling, that there ought to be a seminary of the Episcopal Church in Cambridge, both to exert an influence in behalf of the ministry upon the many young men there, and also to embrace the advantages there offered for study. The school was incorporated at once, with a liberal charter, empowering it to confer degrees, and also prescribing for its government a Board of Trustees and a Board of Clerical and Lay Visitors. A staff of four professors was secured, with the late Rev. J. S. Stone, D.D., as dean; and the institution entered upon a career which has exceeded the hopes of its friends. So far, there are seventy-five alumni, from all parts of the country, and now at work in equally varied localities. The course of study covers three years, and embraces the branches prescribed by the canons of the church, but it is sought to study them in a more advanced manner than has been usual, and to take advantage of all progress in scholarship. In accordance with this, admission is restricted to bachelors of arts, or those who submit to an equivalent examination; and superior scholarship is rewarded by the degree of bachelor of divinity.

There is no organic connection with Harvard University; but the nearness of that institution brings manifest advantages, and the chapel of the school is the usual place of worship of such Episcopalian students as are in Cambridge on Sunday.

The success of the school has led to the reception of munificent gifts; as follows, St. John's Memorial Chapel, from the late R. M. Mason; Lawrence Hall (the dormitory, for forty students), from Amos A. Lawrence; Reed Hall (for library and class-rooms), from the founder; Burnham Hall (the refectory), from J. A. Burnham. Adding to these the original fund and a legacy of R. M. Mason, and also subscriptions for annual expenses, the total value of gifts, hitherto, exceeds $130,000. Besides this, the school has a reversionary interest in the estate of the founder, which will render it one of the most amply endowed seminaries in the land.

IV. Lutheran. (1) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE GENERAL SYNOD OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES, Gettysburg, Penn.—The founding of a theological seminary engaged the attention of the General Synod at its first convention in 1820. The realization of this effort was, however, not attained till a few years later, when Rev. S. S. Schmucker of New Market, Va., urged upon the Synod of Maryland and Virginia the enlargement of his private theological school into a general institution for the church. At the meeting of this body in 1825, he and the Revs. Charles P. Krauth and Benjamin Kurtz were appointed a committee to draft a plan for the immediate establishment of such an institution; and the action of this committee was the same year adopted, with some modifications, by the General Synod convened at Frederick, Md. The General Synod appointed the first board of directors, and elected the first professor, Rev. S. S. Schmucker. The right of electing professors was thenceforth vested exclusively in the board of directors, who are chosen by such synods, in connection with the General Synod, to patronize the seminary, and contribute to its support. An official connection with the General Synod is maintained, and this continues the only theological school sustaining such a relation.

The board at its first meeting selected Gettysburg, Penn., as the location; and Professor Schmucker was inaugurated, and active operations begun, in September, 1826. Although designed for the entire Lutheran Church in the United States, the seminary encountered strong prejudices and open hostility from the Lutherans not connected with the General Synod. It had consequently to struggle for years with formidable difficulties; and, in view of prevailing divisions, it has never commanded the support of the entire Lutheran community. The doctrinal basis recognizes the Augsburg Confession and the Smaller Catechism of Luther as "a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the word of God." The spirit of the institution has always been in substantial accord with the general type of American Christianity. Over six hundred students are enrolled among its alumni. The second professor, E. L. Hazelius, D.D., was elected in 1830. Since that time, H. I. Smith, D.D., C. P. Krauth, D.D., C. F. Schaeffer, D.D., J. A. Brown, D.D., LL.D., and M. Valentine, D.D., have been incumbents of the different chairs. The present faculty consists of C. A. Stork, D.D., C. A. Hay, D.D., E. J. Wolf, D.D., and J. G. Morris, D.D., LL.D. The library numbers 11,000 volumes. The endowment amounts to about $100,000, and the real estate is estimated at $50,000.

The Holman Lecture is a foundation, the income of which is devoted to an annual lecture on one of the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession. The Rice Lecture is a foundation providing for an annual lecture on "Methods of Ministerial Work." Special provision has always been made for indigent students, and scholarships covering the expenses of the entire course of three years are at the disposal of the faculty. A full History of this seminary, by Dr. J. G. MORRIS, is contained in vol. vi. of The Quarterly Review of the Evangelical Lutheran Church.
E. J. WOLF (Professor).

(2) CONCORDIA SEMINARY of St. Louis, Mo., is one of the institutions of the German Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, the largest Lutheran body in America. In it young men who have passed through a gymnasium (college), and are acquainted with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, are taught theology according to the Lutheran Confessions (Concordia of 1580). The school was founded toward the end of the year 1839 by a number of Lutheran theologians (among them Rev. C. F. W. Walther), in the midst of a settlement of German Lutherans that had emigrated the same year from Saxony in Germany. At first it comprised a gymnasium and a theological seminary, and in 1849 was removed to St. Louis. In the following year it was granted by the Lutheran congregations of Perry County and St. Louis, that had hitherto supported the same, to the aforesaid synod, which had been organized in 1847. In 1853 it was chartered by the Legislature of the State of Missouri. In 1861 the gymnasium was separated from the theological seminary, and removed to Fort Wayne, Ind., where it still flourishes; and a so-called practical seminary, owned by the synod at Fort Wayne, was removed to St. Louis, and combined with the Concordia Seminary. In 1875, however, the Practical Seminary was removed to Springfield, Ill. Up to the present time, about four hundred Lutheran ministers have in this institution (Concordia Seminary) received a thorough theological education, not including those of the Practical Seminary. The old building, erected during the years between 1850 and 1857, was taken down in 1882, and a new, large, splendid edifice erected, the dedication of which took place Sept. 9 and 10, 1883, in the presence of fifteen thousand people. Addresses were made in German, English, and Latin. The faculty at present consists of five professors and one assistant. Dr. C. F. W. Walther, the first theological professor since the removal of the institution to St. Louis, is still its venerable president. The languages used in the lectures are the Latin, German, and English. The regular course, requiring three years, embraces logic, metaphysics, encyclopædia and methodology, isagogics, hermeneutics, exegesis and cursory reading of the original text, dogmatics (including ethics and polemics), symbolics, church history (including history of doctrines, patristics, and archaeology), catechetics and homiletics with practical exercises, pastoral theology, reading of select works of the Fathers, of English classical and recent theological writers, debates in Latin and English. Tuition is free. The institution is entirely sustained by synod: the students also, if poor, are liberally supported by the congregations. The present number of students is 103. The library contains about 5,500 volumes, mostly theological works. M. GÜNTHER (Professor).

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH at Philadelphia.—In consequence of resolutions passed by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, at its meeting in Pottstown, Penn., Aug. 25, 1864, and at a special meeting held at Allentown, Penn., July 26 and 27, 1864, this seminary, after the appointment of a board of directors, and the election of the faculty (Rev. Drs. C. F. Schaeffer, W. J. Manu, C. P. Krauth, C. W. Schaeffer, G. F. Krotel), began operations Oct. 5, 1864, which since that time have been regularly continued. In the government of the seminary, other Lutheran synods, uniting with the Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States in the endowment and support of the institution, have a pro rata representation, a right of which the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of the State of New York now avails itself. The seminary has sent out up to this time more than two hundred graduates; whilst a considerable number of students of various denominations gratuitously received instruction without graduating. The character of this seminary is clearly indicated by the official declaration, "that this institution shall be devoted to the interests of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the United States, and that its doctrinal character shall be unreservedly and unalterably based on all the Confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church." Of like tenor is the affirmation demanded of the professors before entering upon their duties. Instruction is imparted through the medium of the English and German languages, the large field of labor providentially intrusted to the care of the Lutheran Church requiring at the present time both those languages in Pennsylvania and in distant parts. Those who apply for admission as students must have graduated at a college, or else have acquired in some literary institution an education of a similar character. The Rev. Dr. J. A. Seiss, pastor of the Church of the Holy Communion at Philadelphia, is president of the board of directors. The faculty consists at present of the Rev. Drs. C. W. Schaeffer (chairman), W. J. Mann, A. Spaeth, and H. E. Jacobs. Dr. Krauth died on Jan. 2, 1883. See the arts. SCHAEFFER, KRAUTH]. W. J. MANN (Professor).

V. Methodist. (1) GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. — This institution is a theological seminary, under the supervision and patronage of the Western Conferences of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. It is located at Evanston, Ill., ten miles north of Chicago. It was opened provisionally in 1856, but was regularly organized, under a charter from the Legislature of Illinois, in the year following. By the terms of its charter, its trustees are empowered to accept and hold trust-funds of any kind; and the real property of the institute is forever exempt from taxation. The professors elected in 1856 were the Rev. John Dempster, D.D., the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder, D.D., and the Rev. Henry Bannister, D.D. They were co-ordinate in rank, the senior in office acting as president of the faculty. Subsequently the Rev. Miner Raymond, D.D., the Rev. Francis D. Hemenway, D.D., the Rev. William X. Ninde, D.D., and the Rev. Henry B. Ridgaway, D.D., were added to the faculty. In 1879 Professor William X. Ninde, D.D., was elected president. The course of study is strictly biblical and theological, and continues three years. Instruction is largely by lectures, written and oral; but text-books as syllabus-work are in use. The institute confers the degree of bachelor of divinity upon graduates of colleges who complete its course. Others, who have not enjoyed a collegiate training, are admitted to its classes, and on the completion of the course are granted a diploma. The school is sustained chiefly by income from properties in the city of Chicago, bequeathed as a perpetual foundation by the late Mrs. Eliza Garrett, from whom its name is derived. Their present value is estimated at $300,000, yielding an income in 1883 of $25,200. Against this there is a mortgage-debt of $25,000, which is more than covered by subscriptions. The corporation own a fine educational building in Evanston, containing a chapel, library, lecture-rooms, and dormitories for the accommodation of one hundred students. Since the organization of the school, it has sent forth more than three hundred graduates, while nearly twelve hundred students have fully or partially shared its advantages. Far the larger part of those now surviving continue preaching the gospel, and are held in worthy estimation as alumni of the institution. Not a few have attained prominence in the church as preachers and pastors, foreign missionaries, and presidents and professors of colleges and seminaries. The catalogue for 1883 shows an attendance of a hundred and three, with a graduating-class of twenty-eight. The institute holds a general relation of sympathy with the Methodist colleges of the West, two of which — the North-western University of Evanston, Ill., and Chaddock College of Quincy, Ill. — have formally adopted it as their theological department.

(2) UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY (Va.) OF THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH. — Both Liberty Hall Academy in Lexington, Rockbridge, Va., and Hampden-Sidney College in Prince Edward, Va., were founded by the Presbyterians of that State, mainly for the purpose of rearing an educated ministry. The former still exists as Washington and Lee University, the latter as a well-endowed college. Its president was also teacher of the students of divinity. The seminary at Princeton having been founded in 1811, the synod of Virginia in 1812 reformed its theological school as a department of the college, with the Rev. Moses Hoge, the college-president, as its professor. Between that date and 1820, when he died, about thirty licentiates went from it into the ministry. Dr. Hoge was followed, as president of the college, by a layman (Jonathan P. Cushing, Esq.). The wants of the churches were rapidly increasing; hence the old Hanover presbytery resolved, under the advice of the great John Holt Rice, D.D., to create a seminary distinct from the college. Without buildings or endowments, he commenced his instructions with three students, Jan. 1, 1824. Funds were rapidly raised for endowments; and in 1826 the General Assembly took the seminary under its care, and its trustees took charge of the funds. In the autumn of the same year the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, with the consent of the next assembly, took the place of the Hanover presbytery in governing the seminary; and to commemorate this copartnership its name was changed to Union Seminary. At the premature and regretted death of Dr. Rice, in 1831, it had acquired buildings, a library, three professors, and forty-eight students. Dr. Rice was succeeded as president by Dr. George A. Baxter, from 1832 to 1841. The death of the founder, and the "Old and New School controversy," together with the great industrial depression of the country under oppressive Federal laws, gave a serious check to its prosperity. In 1841 Dr. Samuel B. Wilson succeeded as president of the seminary, and professor of systematic theology. In 1854 the endowment of a fourth chair was completed, and the designed organization of the seminary realized. Since then there have been four professors, — one of systematic, polemic, and pastoral theology; one of Hebrew and other Oriental languages and literature; one of ecclesiastical history and polity; one of biblical literature and New-Testament interpretation. The scheme of the seminary is thoroughly biblical. The Bible is the chief class-book in all departments, and every professor is required to expound some parts of it from the original.

The seminary is now governed jointly by the synods of Virginia and North Carolina, through a board of twenty-four trustees, but under the superior control of the General Assembly, to whom annual reports must be made, and which exercises a вето-power over the election of professors and over all changes in its constitution and plan. The property of the seminary consists of about forty acres of land, with good buildings for seventy-five students and four professors, a handsome chapel and a superior library-building, and endowments of $250,000 for the support of the institution and twenty-five scholarships. The library, which is unusually select, numbers 12,000 volumes.

In Ecclesiastical History and Polity.—Dr. STEPHEN TAYLOR, 1835–38; Dr. SAMUEL L. GRAHAM, 1838–51; Dr. ROBERT L. DABNEY, 1853–59; Dr. THOMAS E. PECK, 1860–.

In Hebrew Literature, etc.—HIRAM P. GOODRICH, D.D., 1830–39; SAMUEL L. GRAHAM, D.D., 1839–49; FRANCIS S. SAMPSON, D.D., 1849–54; BENJAMIN M. SMITH, D.D., 1854–.

In Biblical Literature and Non-Testament Interpretation.—WILLIAM J. HOGE, D.D., 1856–59; HENRY C. ALEXANDER, D.D., 1860–.

The seminary was also served in this department by the following gentlemen as tutors: Elisha Bullantine, Benjamin M. Smith, Francis S. Sampson, Dabney C. Harrison, and Thomas Wharey. The largest number of students ever collected in the seminary in one session was seventy-four: the number this session (1882–83) is fifty-six.

(5) COLUMBIA THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY. — The Presbyterian Theological Seminary whose seat is at Columbia, the capital of South Carolina, was established in the year 1828, under the corporate title "The Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia." When, several years later, the synod thus named was divided into the two synods of South Carolina and of Georgia, an equal share in its management was continued to each. In 1857 the synod of Alabama accepted a joint interest in its control, with the same rights and privileges as belonged to either of the others. These three ecclesiastical bodies were empowered to elect a board of directors, that should meet and act in common, under a written constitution similar to that of the seminary at Princeton; the professors being chosen, in the event of a vacancy, by the synods themselves in rotation. In 1863 the seminary was transferred to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America, which body (its legal title altered in 1865 so as to read the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States) still governs it; the single limitation

Including the fund for the endowment of professorships, legacies, scholarships, real estate, and library, the property of this institution at the date of the transfer was valued at the nominal sum of $278,000. The civil war, however, which closed in 1865, left the productive funds in a condition so disabled as to render necessary the inauguration of immediate efforts for their rehabilitation. Meanwhile the deficiency was in a large measure met by extensive and liberal contributions from the churches. At the present time (1883) this method of supply is discontinued, in view of the fact that an efficient re-endowment agency has succeeded in securing an income, which, being in a condition of constant increase, will serve for a competent support and for an enlarged usefulness. Happily, its fine buildings, and its noble library of about 20,000 volumes, escaped the ravages of war. In 1880 the seminary was closed, and its faculty disbanded, partly owing to a lack of funds, and partly to other causes. But in the fall of 1882 it was again opened, with three of its former professors and with the addition of two more; its students numbering about twenty-five. Many distinguished names have in the past graced the list of its instructors, notably that of the illustrious Dr. Thornwell, whose decease (in 1862) gave to the institution its severest blow, and that of the venerable Dr. Howe, who since 1831 continued to occupy the chair of Hebrew literature until his lamented death in 1883.

(7) THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY OF THE NORTH-WEST. — Since the opening for settlement of that vast region drained by the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers and their tributaries, the feeling has existed, that institutions of sacred learning should be established within this territory by which to supply an educated ministry for the evangelization of the rapidly increasing population. In response to this feeling, the New Albany Theological Seminary was founded. It was started first as an adjunct of Hanover College, Indiana, in the year 1830, but in 1840 was removed to New Albany, Ind., and for some years sustained by contiguous synods of the then Old-School branch of the Presbyterian Church. After a time it became apparent that the seminary was crippled by its proximity to similar institutions (though it had accomplished a great work by sending into the ministry of the church many able men); and its friends decided to suspend the enterprise at New Albany, and seek a more favorable location.

At the meeting of the General Assembly at Indianapolis in 1859, the Hon. CYRUS H. MCCORMICK of Chicago offered $100,000, to endow four professorships in a theological seminary to be located at Chicago. The assembly gratefully accepted the offer, and elected Rev. N. L. Rice, D.D., to the Cyrus H. McCormick chair of didactic and polemic theology, Rev. Willis Lord, D.D., to the chair of biblical and ecclesiastical history, Rev. L. J. Halsey, D.D., to the chair of pastoral theology, and Rev. W. M. Scott, D.D., to the chair of biblical literature and exegesis. Opened September, 1859, it has continued with varying fortune, until now (1883) it has an invested endowment-fund of about $210,000, and buildings (including dormitory, chapel, recitation-rooms, and three professors' houses) valued at $70,000. The land belonging to the institution, twenty-five acres, is situated in a portion of the city desirable for fine residences, and in the near future will greatly increase its income. Besides Mr. McCormick's donations, aggregating for all purposes $250,000, the seminary is indebted to many others for valuable services and liberal contributions. The institution received from New Albany a library of between 2,000 and 3,000 volumes, some of them old and rare. An invested library-fund, provided by the late Hanson K. Corning, Esq., of New York, secures an annual addition of valuable works. The library now contains over 10,000 volumes, including several large donations by bequests from deceased friends. There are at present, yielding income, thirteen scholarships wholly or partially endowed. While located at Hanover and New Albany, about a hundred and seventy-five students graduated from the institution; and, since the opening in Chicago, nearly two hundred have enjoyed its advantages. Twenty-seven were in attendance in 1882-83. Such ample pecuniary provision is made, that all the necessary expenses of needy students are fully met.

The professorships as now constituted are as follows:—

- Rev. L. J. HALSEY, D.D., LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Church Government and the Sacraments.
 Rev. THOMAS H. SKINNER, D.D., Cyrus H. McCormick Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology.
 Rev. WILLIS G. CRAIG, D.D., Professor of Biblical and Ecclesiastical History.
 Rev. D. C. MARQUIS, D.D., Professor of New-Testament Literature and Exegesis.
 Rev. HERRICK JOHNSON, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology.
 EDWARD L. CURTIS, A.B., Instructor in Old-Testament Literature and Exegesis.

Located in the heart of a territory unparalleled in fertility, with an ample equipment and liberal endowment, with a large and increasing constituency, with a vast field of labor open to its alumni, and with a learned, energetic, and devoted faculty, the Seminary of the North-west has before it, under God, a future of unexampled usefulness.

W. W. HARRIS.

(8) UNION THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, New York, was founded late in the year 1835. It grew out of a desire to provide adequate theological instruction for the rising ministry, in a central position, as free as possible from partisan prejudices, on a sound scriptural basis.

Origin.—For years previous to the great disruption of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, this great body of Christians had been deeply agitated by theological controversies and ecclesiastical strife. The schools of sacred learning were to some extent committed to partisan views of existing conflicts. It was thought that a theological seminary could be established in the city of New York, on an independent basis, not subject to the control of accidental majorities in the General Assembly, committed to no theological school in the church, and to no ecclesiastical party, and occupying ground on which good and faithful men of Presbyterian affinities could meet together, and raise up a sound and thoroughly furnished ministry for the church.

At a meeting of four ministers and five laymen, on the evening of Oct. 10, 1835, at No. 8 Bond Street, New York, it was determined "to attempt to establish a theological seminary in the city of New York." At a subsequent enlarged meeting, Nov. 9, $31,000 were subscribed. Two months later the subscription had been doubled. A constitution was adopted. Jan. 11, 1836, a large and highly responsible board of directors was chosen (whose first meeting was held a week later), and order was taken for an act of incorporation, which, after much delay, was obtained, March 27, 1839, from the Legislature of the State of New York. The government of the institution was vested in a self-perpetuating board of twenty-eight directors, one-half of whom to be laymen. It was provided in the charter, that all the advantages of the institution should be allowed to students of every denomination of Christians.

At the same time provision was made irrevocably, by the constitution, that every director should, on his election to office, solemnly promise to maintain while in office the plan and constitution of the seminary, the Westminster Confession of Faith, and the Presbyterian form of church government.

Every member of the faculty, it was also provided, should, on entering upon his professorship, and triennially thereafter, or when required by the board, make and subscribe, in the presence of the board, the following declaration:—

"I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice; and I do now, in the presence of God and the Directors of this Seminary, solemnly and sincerely receive and adopt the Westminster Confession of Faith as containing the system of doctrine taught in the Holy Scriptures. I do also, in like manner, approve of the Presbyterian Form of Government; and I do solemnly promise that I will not teach or inculcate any thing which shall appear to me to be subversive of the said system of doctrine, or of the principles of said Form of Government, so long as I shall continue to be a Professor in the Seminary."

Location.—The lease of a plot of ground, fronting on University Place, between Sixth and Eighth Streets, and extending through the block to Greene Street, one hundred by two hundred feet, belonging to the estate of The Sailor's Snug Harbor, subject to an annual ground-rent of $800, was purchased for $8,000. Four professors' houses were erected on Greene Street, and a commodious seminary building on University Place. The latter was completed and dedicated Dec. 12, 1838. Owing to the financial embarrassments of the institution, the houses on Greene Street were sold some four years later. Two of them have since been purchased, together with a house and lot adjoining, on the corner of Greene and Eighth Streets, to accommodate the students with dormitories. The seminary building has also been much enlarged, at a considerable expense.

Measures have now been taken for the removal of the seminary to a more eligible site on the west side of Park Avenue, between Sixty-ninth and Seventieth Streets, including the whole front on the avenue, and extending back on each of the streets a hundred and fifty feet. The buildings are now in the process of erection. They will include a fire-proof library edifice, a commodious chapel, and a large structure for lecture-halls, with a dormitory of six stories extending across the rear from street to street. They are to be of brick, with brown-stone trimmings, in the University Gothic style. The cost of the ground and buildings will considerably exceed half a million of dollars. The site is one of the most eligible in the city.

Library.—The nucleus of this unique collection of books was gathered by the Benedictine monks of Paderborn, in Germany, and was the growth of centuries. Large and valuable additions were made to it by the learned Dr. Leander Van Ess, until it numbered more than 13,000 volumes, including rare old copies of folio Bibles, polyglots, lexicons, concordances, commentaries of the early periods of the Reformation, the Latin and Greek Fathers, church histories, decrees of councils and popes, with a most valuable collection of Incunabula and Reformation tracts, all of which were purchased in bulk by the seminary in 1838.

Large and useful additions of the best modern theological publications, many of them from the private collections of the late Drs. Robinson, Sprague, Field, Marsh, Gillett, H. B. Smith, Adams, and others, have been made, together with the unique McAlpin collection of rare and interesting books and pamphlets relating to the Puritan divines, and the deistic, Trinitarian, and ecclesiastical controversies of the eighteenth century. The library comprises not less than 42,000 volumes, 10,000 pamphlets, and 165 manuscripts.

Funds.—For several years the institution was conducted under great embarrassments. The original subscriptions were soon exhausted in providing buildings and the payment of salaries. The treasury at one time was overdrawn to the amount of not less than $16,000. In 1843, $25,000 were obtained for the endowment of the theological chair, the first permanent fund. A further sum of $30,000 was received some five or six years later, by a bequest of Mr. James Roosevelt. In 1853 a further sum of $100,000 was obtained by a general subscription, a bequest of $20,000 by Mrs. Fassett of Philadelphia in 1851, and a subscription of $25,000 in 1855, to endow the professorship of ecclesiastical history. A further subscription of $100,000 was obtained in 1859, of $150,000 in 1865, and in 1871 of $300,000. In 1873, by the princely gift, by Mr. James Brown, of $300,000, the institution was put upon an admirable foundation, the original corps of professors was increased from three to seven, and the funds of professorships from $25,000 to $80,000 each.

The late Gov. Edwin D. Morgan proved himself a most munificent patron of the seminary by his gifts of $100,000 for the library, and $100,000 towards the new site, together with a noble bequest of $200,000. Large sums have also been contributed by the late John C. Baldwin, William E. Dodge, Anson G. Phelps, jun., Frederick Marquand, and others still in the land of the living; so that now the general endowment-fund exceeds $1,000,000, in addition to specific funds amounting to $157,000, and the buildings, which, it is expected, will be completed in 1884, without incumbrance.

Faculty.—The corps of instruction now consists of seven full professors in addition to one instructor. Several courses of lectures are also provided by permanent funds. Among the distinguished men who have filled the professorships are to be named, of those who have departed this life, the Rev. Drs. Henry White, Edward Robinson, Henry B. Smith, Thomas H. Skinner, and William Adams, all of precious memory. The present faculty is thus constituted:—

ROSWELL D. HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D., President, and Professor of Church History.

WILLIAM G. T. SHEDD, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Systematic Theology.

PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Sacred Literature.

GEORGE L. PRENTISS, D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology.

FRANCIS BROWN, A.M., Associate Professor of Biblical Philology.

Students.—The seminary has, almost from the start, ranked with the first in the land as to the number under instruction. More than 2,000 students have availed themselves of its privileges, of whom 1,330 have graduated in due course. Not less than 1,750 of the whole number are still serving in the gospel ministry, and 127 are reported as missionaries to the heathen.

Ecclesiastical Control.—The General Assembly, since the re-union in 1870, has an optional veto over the appointment of the professors, and receives from the board an annual exhibit of its condition. EDWIN F. HATFIELD.

VIII. Reformed (German). (1) REFORMED CHURCH THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, at Lancaster, Penn.—Though the need of a theological seminary for the Reformed (German) Church had long been felt, it was not until the year 1817 that definite action to supply the need was taken by the synod, and not until seven years later, that, after several abortive efforts, the institution was actually founded. At that time Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, had been resuscitated; and, as its friends deemed it advantageous to bring the contemplated seminary into some connection with the college, liberal offers of accommodation and assistance were made by its trustees to the synod of the Reformed Church in 1824. These were accepted; and the seminary was opened March 11, 1825, with Rev. Lewis Mayer as professor of theology, and five students in attendance. After an experience of four years and a half, Carlisle was felt to be an unsuitable place for the seminary; and in the fall of 1829 the institution was removed to York, Penn. In 1837 it found a new home in Mercersburg, Penn., the seat of Marshall College, which had grown out of the classical department organized at York in connection with the seminary. Subsequently Marshall College was united with Franklin College, and in the spring of 1853 transferred to Lancaster, Penn.; and in the fall of 1871, after a separation of eighteen years, the theological seminary followed. During the fifty-eight years of its existence the seminary has had in its service thirteen professors and tutors. The chair of systematic theology has had five incumbents, — Lewis Mayer, D.D., in office thirteen years; John W. Nevins, D.D., eleven; Bernard C. Wolff, D.D., ten; Henry Harbaugh, D.D., four; and E. V. Gerhart, D.D., fifteen. The chair of church history and exegesis, established 1829, has likewise had five incumbents, — Daniel Young, in office one year; Frederick A. Rauch, Ph.D., nine years; Philip Schaff, D.D., twenty-one, inclusive of two years not in actual service; E. E. Higbee, D.D., seven, including two years under appointment by the board of visitors; and Thomas G. Apple, D.D., twelve. In 1857 a theological tutorship was established; and during the twelve years of its actual existence (1861-73), there were three tutors. — William M. Reily, Ph.D., in office three years; Jacob B. Kerschner, A.M., seven; and F. A. Gast, D.D., two. In 1873 the tutorship was abolished, and the chair of Hebrew and Old-Testament theology established, which Professor Gast has occupied since May, 1874. The seminary since 1873 has been under the care of three synods, each of which is represented proportionably in a board of trustees, which holds and manages the property, and in a board of visitors, which supervises the instruction, and directs the internal affairs of the institution. The library numbers at the present time about 10,000 volumes, many of which, together with a large amount of money for the endowment-fund, were obtained in Germany in the early history of the institution by Rev. James Reily, who visited that country to solicit aid in behalf of the new seminary. For the external and internal history of the seminary, see the Mercersburg Review for January, 1876, Semi-Centennial Register, 1875, and the Tercentenary Monument, 1863. For the theology of the seminary, see art. MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY.

F. A. GAST (Professor).

(2) HEIDELBERG THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, a theological school of the Reformed Church in the United States (formerly the German Reformed Church) at Tiffin, O. This church (with 767 ministers and 106,556 communicants) has now four theological schools, founded in the following order: (1) Theological Seminary at Lancaster, Penn., organized in 1825; (2) Heidelberg Theological Seminary at Tiffin, O., organized in 1851; (3) Theological Seminary at Franklin, Shelby County, Wis.; and (4) Theological Department of Ursinus College at Collegeville, Penn.

Heidelberg Theological Seminary belongs to the Ohio synod of the Reformed Church, a body of 140 ministers and 18,897 communicant members. Various efforts had been made at an early date to found a theological school west of the Alleghenies to meet the urgent calls for ministers. Thus one was in operation for a year or two (in 1830) in Canton, O., under Dr. J. G. Büttner, a learned German scholar. Another one was in operation for a short time (in 1848) in Columbus, O., under Rev. A. P. Freeze. In 1850 the Ohio synod resolved to found Heidelberg College, at Tiffin, O., and in connection with it to establish a theological seminary. The first professor called was Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart (then of Cincinnati, O.), who formally opened the seminary in May, 1851, with two students. The seminary has been in uninterrupted operation since that time. For ten years (1851-61) it had but one professor to attend to the full course of study; namely, Dr. E. V. Gerhart from 1851 to 1855, and Dr. Moses Kieffer from 1855 to 1861. In 1861 a second professor was called, namely, Dr. Hermann Rust, then of Cincinnati. Since 1861 it has been under the care of two professors. The present incumbents are Rev. Dr. J. H. Good, president, and professor of dogmatical and practical theology (called in 1869), and Rev. Dr. Hermann Rust, professor of exegetical and historical theology (called in 1861). The plan of the institution includes four professorships. Its productive endowment at present is about $30,000. It has no buildings of its own. The recitations and lectures are held in a hall of the college-building. Both the seminary and the college are named Heidelberg, out of respect to the celebrated Heidelberg Catechism, which is the only creed or confession of this branch of the church.

From 1853 to 1883 this institution has graduated 195 theological students, of whom 152 are still living, and laboring in the ministry. About one-half of these officiate in both the English and German language. They are somewhat widely distributed, as will be seen from the following: in Ohio, 77; in Pennsylvania, 27; in Indiana, 16; in Illinois, 5; in Iowa, 7; in Wisconsin, 4; in New Jersey, 1; in Michigan, 4; in New York, 1; in Kansas, 4; in Nebraska, 2; in Minnesota, 2; in Colorado, 1; and 1 missionary in Japan.

The number of students in attendance each year varies from twelve to twenty. The field of the seminary is somewhat circumscribed. For fuller account of its history, see Sermon before Alumni Association in 1860, by Rev. I. H. KELLER, Dayton, O., 1860. J. H. GOOD (President).

(3) THE THEOLOGICAL DEPARTMENT OF URSINUS COLLEGE is an integral part of the institution. It was organized simultaneously with the founding and opening of the college in 1869-70, and is located in the same place (Freeland, Collegeville P.O., Montgomery County, Penn.), thirty miles by railroad north-west from Philadelphia. In its organization it corresponds with that of the theological department of Yale College and similar schools. Ecclesiastically and theologically it is based upon the principles, faith, and polity of the Reformed Church, as symbolically represented by the Heidelberg Catechism and cognate Confessions: indeed, firm adherence to these in their historical sense, and progressive development in true harmony therewith, is a distinctive characteristic of the school. Although under no formal synodical control, it is as amenable in all essential respects to the jurisdiction of the "Reformed Church in the United States" as any other institution of the church, and acknowledges such amenability.

In 1872 it was officially recognized by the General Synod of the church, convened in Cincinnati; and several years later the Eastern District Synod at Easton gave it a vote of recommendation.

The department is under the immediate charge of three professors, and the course of study prescribed conforms to the requirements of the constitution of the church with which it stands connected.

Since the opening of the department, about sixty young men have pursued their studies in it, of whom forty-four took a full course, and forty-five are engaged in the work of the ministry. At the present time (October, 1883) there are seventeen young men pursuing their studies in the institution, with the ministry in view; and a special effort is being made to improve the financial condition of the college. It is under the control of a board of directors, of whom three-fourths must be members of the Reformed Church, and eight of whom are ministers of said church.

(2) MEADVILLE THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL is situated in Meadville, Penn., on a hill east of the city, commanding a fine view of the surrounding country, and distinguished for its healthiness. Its origin dates from October, 1814, under the auspices of Professor Frederic Huidekoper, author of Judaism at Rome and other learned works, and his father, Hermann John Huidekoper, in a building purchased by the latter. It was chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1846, and has a board of trustees and a board of instruction. Its only doctrinal test for admission is a belief in the divine origin of Christianity. The Unitarians and Christian Connection co-operated in its establishment. The former denomination furnished the principal part of its funds. Students of various sects have graduated from the institution. Rev. Rufus P. Stebbins, D.D. (1814-56), Rev. Oliver Stearns, D.D. (1856-63), and Rev. Abiel A. Livermore, A.M. (1863-83), have been its presidents. Its endowment at the present date (1883) — aside from its real estate, valued at $30,000, and its library, worth $8,000 — is about $160,000, besides which the trustees hold a special trust of $23,000, founded by the late Joshua Brookes of New York, the income of which supplies libraries to settled ministers in the West. Its library numbers between 15,000 and 16,000 volumes and many hundreds of unbound pamphlets. The present Divinity Hall was erected in 1854, principally from the contributions of the Unitarian churches of New York and Brooklyn. There are four acres around it, given by Professor Huidekoper, who, with his family, has contributed largely, in money and services, to the school during its whole existence. A separate building, fire-proof, is about to be erected for the library. The institution is open to persons of whatever color, sex, or nationality; and beneficiary aid is extended to worthy students in need. Its curriculum of studies does not differ materially from that of other theological seminaries. Two resident professors and one instructor devote their entire time, and three non-resident professors a portion of their time, to teaching. The pupils vary in number from year to year, but there were twenty in attendance in 1882-83. The regular course of instruction occupies three years, but students can pursue a partial course of shorter duration. Between three and four hundred persons have received the benefits of the institution, and pulpits in the principal cities and towns of the Union are filled by its students.

A. A. LIVERMORE (President).

X. Universalist. TUFTS COLLEGE DIVINITY SCHOOL is a department of Tufts College. It was organized and opened for students in 1869. The late Silvanus Packard, the largest benefactor of Tufts College thus far, directed in his will that the trustees should establish a professorship of theology. The Rev. Thomas J. Sawyer, D.D., was chosen Packard professor. The trustees also decided to associate with him one other professor, and open a divinity school. The Rev. Charles H. Leonard, D.D., was chosen as his associate. At first the number of students was small; but it rapidly increased, rendering another teacher necessary. William G. Tousey, A.M., was appointed as an assistant, and very soon promoted to a professorship. The course of study as originally laid out embraced three years. The work of the school was carried on by the three professors above named until 1875. At that time it was decided to make the course of study four years for all who are not college graduates. On account of the additional work involved in this change, an instructorship was created, and the Rev. George T. Knight was chosen to fill it. Recently the instructorship has been changed to a professorship; and the Rev. George M. Harmon has also been appointed an assistant professor, making now five permanent teachers in the school. The course pursued is substantially the same as in other divinity schools of like grade, except that some literary training is given to non-graduates. The degree of bachelor of divinity is given to all students who satisfactorily complete the course. There is no charge for either tuition or room-rent. Students who are in needy circumstances receive aid from the Universalist General Convention, by way of loans, amounting to $180 per year. There are now nearly sixty graduates from the school, nearly all of whom are actively engaged in the clerical profession, and some of them occupying prominent and influential positions in the Universalist Church.

E. H. CAPEN (President).

THEOLOGUS, or THEOLOGAL, an officer of the Roman-Catholic Church. In its Canon 18 the Third Council of the Lateran (1179) ordered that a proper person should be appointed at each metropolitan church to give free instruction in theology to the clergy. For his service he was to be paid by the revenue of some benefice; but he was not a canon himself, and could at any time be dismissed if he did not give satisfaction. The Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215) confirmed the decree, extended it to the cathedral churches, and gave in its Canons 10 and 11 some further regulations. See Sammlung von alten und neuen theolog. Sachen, Leipzig, 1721, p. 968.

THEOLOGY (from θεός and λόγος). I. In the widest sense, the science of religion, or, more definitely, the science of the Christian religion as taught in the Bible, and carried on in the history of the church. It is usually divided into: (1) Exegetical theology, or biblical learning; (2) Historical theology, or church history; (3) Systematic or speculative theology; (4) Practical theology. See special arts, on those topics.

II. In the narrower sense, systematic theology, or, more particularly, dogmatics. This is again divided into: (1) Theology proper ("the doctrine of God"), in which are treated theistic and anti-theistic theories, the knowledge, nature, and attributes of God, the Trinity, the divine decrees, providence, and miracles; (2) Anthropology ("the doctrine of man"). in which division are treated the different questions relating to man, his origin, nature, original condition, the fall, and especially the doctrines of sin and free agency; (3) Christology ("the doctrine of the person and work of Christ as the God-man"); (4) Pneumatology ("the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, the third person in the Trinity, and his work"); (5) Soteriology ("the doctrine of salvation"), under which head are treated the plan of salvation, and the way in which his salvation is brought to man, vocation, regeneration, faith, justification, sanctification — some include under this head also the doctrine of the person of Christ and of the atonement; (6) Ecclesiology ("the doctrine of the church, the sacraments, and the means of grace"); (7) Eschatology ("the doctrine of the last things"), which includes the doctrines of the condition of the soul after death, the second coming of Christ, the resurrection, and the final judgment. See the separate arts. DOGMATICS, ELECTION, ESCHATOLOGY, JUSTIFICATION, CHRISTOLOGY, SOTERIOLOGY, etc.

THEOLOGY, Monumental. See MONUMENTAL THEOLOGY.

THEOLOGY, New-England. See NEW-ENGLAND THEOLOGY.

THEOLOGY, Speculative, denotes a certain method of treatment, not a particular part of the system. Its direct opposite is empiricism. The empirical theologian starts from the well-ascertained experiences of conscience and religious life in general, and reaches his general ideas by way of induction, never transgressing the boundaries of fully established facts. All empiricism is rationalistic. The speculative theologian starts from an intuition, and approaches reality by way of deduction, explaining the occurring facts by the theory assumed. All speculation is mystical.

Rationalism, however, is not always empirical; nor is mysticism always speculative. In the domain of mysticism, speculative theology has a problem of its own. As Christianity will not content itself by being one of the many religions existing, even not by being the most perfect one of them, but claims to be the absolute religion, the last and complete revelation of God, or as Christianity will not content itself with ruling the will of man, but also demands to rule his intellect, to the exclusion of any foreign or hostile principle, it cannot help coming into conflict with science, which proceeds, and must proceed, on another principle than that of authority. The problem of speculative theology, then, becomes to reconcile knowledge and faith, science and religion, natural civilization and Christianity; and it solves this problem by stripping the fact, scientific or religious, of its crude positivity, uncovering and seizing upon its informing idea, and demonstrating the ideal harmony which results from the discrepancies of reality.

The school of Alexandria presents the first striking instance of a speculative theology. In Alexandria, Christianity met with the Greek philosophy, the ripe fruit of Greek science; and it was as impossible for the one as for the other to avoid conflict. But the Alexandrian theologians succeeded in bringing about a reconciliation, or, rather, an amalgamation. They taught that besides faith (πίστις), the simple confidence in the facts of revelation, there is a deeper insight in the mysteries of revelation (γνῶσις), which unfolds the latent working of the λογος in the history of mankind before the incarnation in Christ, and unites Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity into one grand scheme of Divine Providence. None of those theologians — Clement, Origen, Athanasius, Gregory of Nyssa — has given a complete speculative system; but speculative views of peculiar grandeur and depth are scattered all through their writings; and by concentrating the interest on such doctrines as the origin of the world, the origin of evil, the Trinity, the personality of Christ, they gave the whole theology of the Eastern Church a decidedly speculative character. At first the Western Church proved hostile to this tendency. Irenæus and Tertullian considered the philosophers the true heresiarchs, and philosophy the fountain-head of all spiritual errors. Augustine, however, was a genius of rare speculative force. He combated the Manichæans with Platonic and Neo-Platonic ideas; Pelagianism, with profound expositions of the experimental doctrines of sin and grace; and he finally crushed Arianism by a speculative development of the doctrine of the Trinity. From him, and directly from the influence of the Greek Church, through the Areopagite and Scotus Erigena, a stream of speculation passed into the mediæval theology of the Western Church, which, though sometimes feeble enough, never disappeared altogether. Having mastered the logic of Aristotle, scholasticism was almost wholly occupied with the logical demonstration of the doctrines of the church; and, as a general rule, it was rather averse to speculation. Only the powerful protection of Charles the Bald saved Scotus Erigena from actual persecution, and several of his views were formally condemned by the synods of Valence (855) and Langres (859). Nevertheless, some of the greatest and most orthodox schoolmen felt the need of speculation. In his Monologium, Prosologium, and Cur Deus Homo, Anselm goes behind the authority of the doctrines to establish them on an a priori deduction. And in the writings, not only of the direct pupils of Scotus Erigena, Anselm of Bena, David of Dinanto, but also of the mystics, from the Victorines to Meister Eckart and Tauler, speculative ideas are met with as subtle as profound.

The Reformation had to be practical, or to fail; and consequently it had very little use for speculation. Nevertheless, Zwingli was a scholar and humanist before he became a Reformer: he had a philosophy before religion became his passion, and he felt the need of bringing these two sides of his spiritual character into perfect harmony. His De Providentia shows many traces of a genuine speculative power (see Sigwart: Ulrich Zwingli und Pius von Mirandula, 1855). Luther's combativeness also compelled him now and then to borrow from the schoolmen some speculative substruction for his ideas. Thus the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity is based on the nominalism of Occam (see Rettberg: Occam und Luther, in Studien und Kritiken, i., 1839; and Schultz: Luther's Ansicht, etc., in Brieger's Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte, iv., 1880). Even Melancthon, who in the beginning of his career was very hostile to scholasticism and philosophy in general, gave, later on, a profound speculative construction of the doctrine of the Trinity (see Herrlinger: Die Theologie Melancthons, 1879). Some gleams of speculation are also found in the works of Oslander, Schwenkfeld, Brenz, and Keckermann: but the successive periods of orthodoxy, pietism, and rationalism, were very unfavorable to speculative theology; and it died out almost completely, until re-awakened in the beginning of the present century by the startling development of philosophy under Kant and Hegel. Schleiermacher, though he based religion on feeling, — that is, on immediate consciousness as a primal fact of human nature, and thereby hoped to give religion a foundation of its own, independent of philosophy, — was, nevertheless, too much of a philosopher himself to carry out with rigid consistency an empirical principle; and at the same time the right wing of the Hegelian school — Daub. Marheineke, Goeschel, Rosenkranz, Erdmann, Schaller, and others — firmly asserted, that, in the formulas of the Hegelian metaphysics, they had found the key of the mysteries of Christianity, and were able to effect a thorough and final reconciliation between the doctrines of the Christian Church and the spirit of modern civilization. They did not succeed. After the first enthusiasm had gone, the world felt disappointed. But the impulse which speculative theology had received was, nevertheless, by no means spent. In Rothe, Martensen, Dörner, Biedermann, and others, it is still working, more cautiously perhaps, but also, it would seem, with a more intense force; and it has become pretty generally recognized, that speculation has become an almost indispensable element of systematic theology. "A theology," says Dörner, "whose last guaranty is the authority of the Church or of Scripture, must always feel embarrassed and anxious when that authority is assailed, even though the points attacked are of slight importance." All authority needs, in order to become truly authoritative to man, to be made part and parcel of his innermost consciousness; and to do that is the proper task of speculative theology.

THEONAS, or THEON, Bishop of Marmarica, in the Egyptian province of Cyrenaica, is mentioned in the synodal letter of Bishop Alexander (see ATHANASICS: Opera, edit. Montfaucon, i. p. 398) as an adherent of Arius. Indeed, he and his neighbor-bishop, Secundus of Ptolemais, were the only two Egyptian bishops who sided with Arius; and it is probable that their line of conduct was regulated by political rather than by theological reasons. At all events, they absolutely refused at the Council of Nicæa (325) to condemn Arius, and were consequently deposed and banished. All notices concerning Theonas are found collected in TILLEMONT: Mémoires, vi.

THEOPASCHITES (from θεός, "God," and πάσχω, "I suffer") is a by-name applied to such as accepted the formula, that, in the passion of Christ, "God had suffered and been crucified." The first traces of it are found in the letters of Isidore of Pelusium, and it played a prominent part in the Monophysite and Monothelite controversies.

THEOPHANES OF BYZANTIUM, the confessor; b. about 758; d. 816; not to be confounded with the historian of the same name who lived in the sixth century, and wrote the history of the Persian war (567–573). He was educated at the court of Constantine Copronymus, and held various high offices under Leo IV., but retired during the reign of Irene, and became monk in the monastery of Polychronium, near Sigirion, in Mysia Minor. Afterwards he built a monastery, Ager, in the vicinity, of which he became abbot himself. He was an ardent image-worshipper, for which reason he was dragged in chains to Constantinople by Leo the Armenian (813), and banished to the Island of Samothrace. His Chronographia is a chronicle, not very interesting, nor very reliable, of the events, secular as well as ecclesiastical, from Diocletian to Leo the Armenian. The best edition of it is that by CLASSEN, Bonn, 1839, 2 vols. GASS.

THEOPHANES, surnamed Cerameus, flourished in the first half of the eleventh century, and was bishop of Tauramenium, situated between Syracuse and Messina. Sixty-two homilies by him — written in Greek, which was still spoken at that time in his diocese, as in other parts of Sicily — were published by Scorsus, Paris, 1644.

THEOPHANY. After the analogy of the Greeks, especially the Platonists, who understood by θεοφάνεια the appearance of one or more gods, theologians apply the term to the revelations of God in the Old Testament, and to the incarnation of Christ as the revelation of God in the flesh, and especially at his birth, his baptism, and his second coming. The biblical conception of theophany may be thus stated. (1) By it is never to be understood an immediate revelation of the supermundane Deity himself (John i. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 16); for God reveals himself only in Christ (Matt. xi. 27), and therefore every theophany is really a christophany. (2) The theophany, as christophany, has three great stages of development, (a) The form of Old-Testament manifestation, (b) The incarnation of Christ, (c) Christ's second coming, which will be the completion of the theophany, the revelation of his "glory" (Tit. ii. 13). (3) The theophany or the christophany of the Old-Testament Scriptures is the epiphany of the future Christ. It was made in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7, etc.), or of the presence (Exod. xxxiii. 14), or the covenant (Mal. iii. 1). The pillar of cloud and of fire was the symbol of his presence: the appearance of the "glory" of God, which in rabbinical terminology was called the Shechinah, was his attribute. (4) The manifestation of God in his christological theophany begins with the miracle of hearing, or the voice of God, which is identical with the voice from heaven, but to be distinguished from the Bath Kol, and ends in the miracle of seeing. (5) The theophany as the objective form of revelation is always accompanied by a vision, and is thus distinguished from an ordinary historical event (2 Kings vi. 17; John xx. 12; Acts ix. 7, cf. xxii. 9, xii. 11). On the other hand, no vision is without a theophanic element, and is thus distinguished from purely subjective hallucination

(Isa. vi. 1; Dan.; Zech.; Acts x. 3). (6) The different forms of divine manifestation can be distinguished only by comparing the predominantly objective theophanic facts with those facts of the vision which are predominantly subjective. (7) The theophanic christophany in a marvellous manner embodies itself in the elements of nature and the life of the soul; is now revealed by the angels, and now by symbols (Gen. iii. 24; Exod. iv. 16; Ps. xviii. 10, civ. 4; Isa. lxi. 3; Mal. ii. 7), but particularly through the Urim and Thummim of the high priest. (8) In the life of Christ all the pre-Christian modes of theophany find a higher unity. In his personal life God himself was revealed. The whole universe was for him a theophanic environment by which his divine nature was attested; because his whole inner life was spent in a constant subjective vision, in which the contrast between ecstasy and the usual consciousness of worldly things did not exist.

THEOPHILANTHROPISTS. In September, 1796, during the reign of the Directory, a small pamphlet appeared in Paris, under the title Manuel des Theophilanthropes, by Chemin. The divine worship described in that book had originated as a kind of family worship. During the period when all religious service was positively prohibited, five house-fathers used to gather together their families for common prayer, singing of hymns in honor of God, and listening to moral and patriotic speeches. The basis of the whole organization was pure deism, the last trace left of true religion among the aberrations of atheism. As soon, however, as the pamphlet appeared, several men and women of unblemished character asked for admission to the assemblies. The first public meeting took place on Jan. 5, 1797, in a house in Rue St. Denis; and the persons present agreed upon assembling every Sunday, not because they considered that day in any particular respect sacred, but because it was the most convenient day of the week for the purpose. God, virtue, and the immortality of the soul, formed the three articles of the Theophilanthropist creed; and any one who agreed on those three points could become a member of the association, even though he belonged to some special sect with respect to the further details of his creed.

The movement met at first with great success. One of the members of the Directory, Reveillère Lepeaux, belonged to the association; and the Directory granted it the use of ten churches in Paris. The service it instituted was very simple. The walls of the churches were ornamented with some few moral maxims; the altar was a plain table covered with flowers or fruit; the ministering officer was any one who felt disposed; and the ceremonies were reduced to a minimum of forms. The Christian baptism became a mere presentation and naming of the child; the Christian wedding, a mere announcement of the civil marriage contracted, accompanied with congratulations and admonitions. New members were admitted after a short catechisation upon the three articles above mentioned. Over their dead they placed a tombstone with the inscription, "Death is the beginning of eternity." As the Theophilanthropists considered their religion the only true universal religion, because the only true natural religion, they were averse to all kinds of propaganda; for "it is unnecessary to make people Theophilanthropists, since they really are so by nature." But they took much care of the education of their children, and their instruction in good morals.

During the first and second years of their existence the Theophilanthropists formed associations also in the provinces. It was easy to predict, however, that a religion which had no roots in the history of the people, and could give no satisfaction to the deepest cravings of human nature, would not prosper for a long time; and indeed, by degrees, as the Christian feeling became reawakened in the French people, the Theophilanthropist movement died away. "What shall I do to restore my church?" exclaimed Reveillère Lepeaux. "Well, just hang yourself, and rise again the third day," Talleyrand replied. There is a difference between a "religion of rhetoric" and a "religion of facts," which, to his own detriment, he had overlooked. In 1802 the First Consul, Bonaparte, took their churches from the Theophilanthropists, and restored them to the Roman Catholics.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Alexandria (385-412), is known from his participation in the Origenistic controversy. Three letters by him, condemnatory of Origen, are still extant in a Latin translation by Jerome. GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., vii.

THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch (176-186), was educated in Paganism, but was converted to Christianity by the study of the Bible. He was a very able and prolific writer. His principal work, and the only one extant, is his Apology of Christianity, written in 180-181, and addressed to a Pagan friend, Autolytus. The best edition of it is that by Otto, Jena, 1861. His Commentary on the Gospels has probably been enlarged by a later hand. See THEODOR ZAHN: Der Evangeliencommentar des Theophilus von Antiochien, Erlangen, 1883 (in favor of the genuineness); and AD. HARNACK, in Trat. und Untersuchungen, i. Heft. 4, pp. 97-175 (against Zahn). See SCHAFF: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., New York, 1883, vol. ii. pp. 732 sqq.

THEOPHYLACT, a celebrated Greek exegete who flourished in the eleventh century, during the reign of Johannes Ducas, — not to be confounded with Theophylactus Simocatti, an Egyptian who flourished about 629, and wrote the history of the Emperor Mauritius. The exegete was a native of Eupus, in the Island of Eubœa; lived for some time in Constantinople as tutor to the imperial prince Constantinus Porphyrogeneta; was appointed archbishop of Achrida in Bulgaria, 1078; and died after 1107. He wrote commentaries on most of the books of the Bible, which, though generally keeping very close to the track of the elder Fathers, are still worth examining, and far surpass any thing of the kind produced at the same period in the Latin Church. A collected edition of his works appeared in Venice (1754-58), in three volumes. GASS.

THEOPNEUSTY. See INSPIRATION.

THEOSOPHY (from θεός, "God," and σοφία, "wisdom") is distinguished from mysticism, speculative theology, and other forms of philosophy and theology, to which it bears a certain resemblance, by its claims of direct divine inspiration, immediate divine revelation, and its want, more or less conspicuous, of dialectical exposition. It is found among all nations.—Hindus, Persians, Arabs, Greeks (the later Neo-Platonism), and Jews (Cabala),—and presents itself variously under the form of magic (Agrippa of Nettesheim, Paracelsus), or vision (Swedenborg, Saint Martin), or rapt contemplation (Jacob Boehme, Oettinger). See THOLUCK: Soufismus, Berlin, 1821; FÜRST: Die Jüdische Religionsphilosophie des Mittelalters, Leipzig, 1815; ROCHOLL: Beiträge zu einer Geschichte deutscher Theosophie, Berlin, 1856.

THEOTOKOS (Θεοτοκος, "God-bearing"), a term definitive of the expression that Christ was one person in two natures. It was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451) against Nestorianism. It declared that Mary was the mother of God in the sense that the human nature which he derived from her was most intimately united with deity, so that the person she bore was really divine. The word is now a favorite designation in the Greek Church for the Virgin Mary. See CHRISTOLOGY, p. 455.

THERAPEUTÆ (Θεραπευταί, "worshippers"), the name of a sect of ascetics allied to the Essenes, the Buddhists, and early Christian monks described in περί βίου θεωρητικού ("On a Contemplative Life." See Yonge's translation of Philo, Bohn's edition, vol. iv. 1-20). The treatise was formerly attributed to Philo; but it is now adjudged to be a Christian forgery of an ascetic origin, and the Therapeutæ to be creatures of the imagination. The grounds for this decision are solid. (1) The style of the treatise is not that of Philo. (2) If the book is his, why was the sect not mentioned in Quod omnis probus liber ("On the Virtuous being also Free"), where the Essenes are spoken of? (3) Why is the Greek philosophy despised, the Old Testament apparently neglected, and the word, "the law," so frequent in Philo, displaced by "the priestly law," peculiarities unlike Philo? If the sect ever existed, how comes it that neither Josephus, nor Pliny, nor any one else of antiquity, ever heard of them? This imaginary sect is described minutely. Its members were of both sexes; lived in separate cells, and only united in sabbath worship; had no support save what the charitable gave them; ate only one meal a day, and that exclusively bread and water. Unlike the Essenes, they revered the temple at Jerusalem and the priesthood. The location of the sect was near Alexandria, on the shores of the Mareotic Lake. THEREMIN, Ludwig Friedrich Franz, b. at Gramzow in Brandenburg, March 19, 1780; d. in Berlin, Sept. 26, 1846. He descended from a French family which had sought refuge in Prussia after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; studied theology at Halle and Geneva; was elected pastor of the French-Reformed congregation of Berlin in 1810; and appointed preacher to the court in 1814, and professor of homiletics at the university in 1839. He has a place in the history of homiletics, though he formed no school, and published Die Beredsamkeit eine Tugend, Berlin, 1814, 2d ed., 1837 (Eloquence a Virtue, translated by Professor W. G. T. Shedd, Andover, 1850, 3d ed., 1861), and Demosthenes und Massillon, 1845. He was also much appreciated as a preacher, and published ten volumes of sermons, besides several other books of devotion: Abendstunden, 1833-39, 3 vols., 6th ed., 1869.

THERESA, Ste., b. at Avila in Old Castile, March 28, 1515; d. at Alba de Liste, Oct. 15, 1582. She entered the monastery of the Carmelites at her native place in 1534, and began in 1561 on her great task of reforming the Carmelite order. For that purpose she founded at Avila a convent for the Barefooted Carmelites, also called the Theresians, and before she died she had founded seventeen such convents for nuns, and fifteen for monks. The first collected edition of her works, mystical and enthusiastic in their devotion, appeared at Salamanca, 1587; the last in Paris, 1847. There is a complete French translation, edited by Migne, Paris, 1840-46, 4 vols. Her life was written by RIBERA, Salamanca, 1590; BOUCHER, Paris, 1810, 2 vols.; PÖSL, Ratisbon, 1847; BOUX, Paris, 1865; and in English, by MARIA FRENCH, London, 1875. THESSALONIANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.

THESSALONICA, a city of Macedonia, at the north-east corner of the Thermaic Gulf. Its original name was Therna, or Thermé (Θέρμη), i.e., hot bath, so called from the hot salt-springs found about four miles from the present city. Its later name was probably given to it by Cassander, who rebuilt it in B.C. 315, and called it after his wife. It is now called Saloniki. Being well situated for commerce, it was a town of importance from very early times. It was taken from the Macedonians, and occupied by Athenians, about 432; restored soon after; repopled by Cassander, king of Macedonia, 315; became the great Macedonian naval station; surrendered to the Romans after the battle of Pydna, 168, and was made the capital of the second of the four divisions of Macedonia, or Macedonia Secunda, between the Strymon and the Axios; and when the four were reduced to one province, under the jurisdiction of a proconsul, it was the virtual metropolis, and there the proconsul lived, although not at first so called. There Cicero lived from April till November, 58, during his exile; and there the party of Pompey and the Senate had their headquarters during the first civil war, 49. It took the side of Octavius (Augustus) against Sextus Pompeius (42-39), and in reward was made a free city. At the opening of the Christian era it was the capital of the whole country between the Adriatic and the Black Sea, and "the chief station on the great Roman road, called the Via Egnatia, which connected Rome with the whole region to the north of the Ægean Sea." Before Constantinople was built, it was virtually the capital of Greece and Illyricum, as well as of Macedonia, and shared the trade of the Ægean with Ephesus and Corinth. In the middle of the third Christian century it was made a Roman "colony;" i.e., soldiers were permanently settled there in order to increase its strength as a bulwark against the Gothic hordes. In 390, in a sedition there, the prefect Botericius was murdered: in dreadful revenge, nearly seven thousand persons were massacred by Theodosius (see art.). From the fourth to the eighth century Thessalonica withstood many attacks from Goths and Slavs. On July 30, 904, it was taken by the Saracens; on Aug. 15, 1185, by the Normans of Sicily, and by the Turks in 1380; ceded to the Greek emperor Manuel, 1403; sold to the Venetians by Andronicus, and finally taken by the Turks from the Venetians, 150. The modern city has a population of eighty thousand, of whom thirty thousand are Jews, and ten thousand Greeks. Its commerce is extensive, and it retains its ancient importance.

The apostle Paul introduced Christianity into Thessalonica upon his second missionary journey, 51. He came with Silas and Timothy, preached for three Sundays in the synagogue there, and, as the result of the work, a church was gathered, principally composed, however, of Gentiles. Among the converts were Caius, Aristarchus, Secundus, and perhaps Jason (Acts xvii. 1-13, xx. 4, xxvii. 2; cf. Phil. iv. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 10). Paul wrote the Thessalonian Church two epistles from Corinth (close of year 52, or beginning of 53), which are the earliest of his preserved writings, "perhaps the earliest written records of Christianity" (Bishop Lightfoot). In striking proof of the minute accuracy of Luke, upon the arch of the Várdar gate, so called because it leads to the Várdar, or Axios, there occurs the word πολιταρχουντων (politarchs) as the designation of the seven magistrates of the city, a word unmentioned in ancient literature, yet the very word Luke employs to designate them (Acts xvii. 8, πολιτάρχας).

From Thessalonica the gospel spread quickly all around (1 Thess. i. 8). "During several centuries this city was the bulwark, not simply of the later Greek Empire, but of Oriental Christendom, and was largely instrumental in the conversion of the Slavonians and Bulgarians. Thus it received the designation of the 'Orthodox City'" (Howson). Its bishop baptized the Emperor Theodosius. Its see had well-nigh the dignity of a patriarchate; and it was because Leo III. (Isaurus) severed the trans-Adriatic provinces, which had been under its immediate jurisdiction, from the Roman see, that the division between the Latin and Greek was in great measure caused. Eustathius, metropolitan of Thessalonica (1175-94), was not only a man of great learning, as his invaluable commentary upon Homer proves, but also a true Christian and an able theologian. From 1205 to 1418 there were Latin archbishops in Thessalonica. At the present day it is the seat of a Greek metropolitan, and contains numerous churches and schools of different denominations. Many of the mosques were formerly churches.

THEU'DAS, a popular leader mentioned by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrin (Acts v. 36). He was not the Theudas mentioned by Josephus (Antiq., XX. 5, 1); because that Theudas rebelled under Cuspius Fadus, in A.D. 44, some ten years after Gamaliel's speech. Nor was he some obscure person, otherwise unknown; since it is unlikely that Gamaliel would, under the circumstances, allude to such a one. But in all likelihood he was the man called Matthias by Josephus (Antiq., XVII. 6, 2, and War, I. 33, 2); because Matthias is the transliteration of ματθίας, whose Greek translation is Ορθόδοξος, i.e., Orthodoxos, i.e., Θεοδόξος. This Matthias was an eloquent teacher, who headed a band in the days of Herod, and destroyed the Roman eagle set up by the king over the great gate of the temple. A. KÖLLER.

THEURGY (from θεοῦ ἔργον, "God's work"), a kind of magical science or art which enabled man to influence the will of the gods by means of purification and other sacramental acts. It developed in Alexandria, among the Neo-Platonists, and finally superseded there all philosophical and theological speculation, sinking down into the grossest superstition.

THIBET, Religion of. See BUDDHISM and LAMAISM.

THIETMAR, b. July 25, 976; d. Dec. 1, 1018; a Saxon of noble descent, related to the imperial house; was educated in the cloistral school of Magdeburg, and made bishop of Merseburg in 1009. He wrote a chronicle, of which especially the last four books, comprising the reign of Henry II. (1002-18), are of the greatest importance for the history of Germany. It was edited by Lapenberg, in Mon. Germ. Hist., vol. iii., and translated into German by Laurent, 1819.

THILO, Johann Karl, b. at Laugensalza in Thuringia, Nov. 28, 1794; d. at Halle, May 17, 1853. He was educated at Schulpforta, studied at Leipzig, began to lecture at Halle in 1819, and was in 1822 appointed professor of theology there. His Codex Apocryphus N. T. remained incomplete. The first volume, containing the apocryphal Gospels, appeared 1832, and was followed by Acta apostolorum Petri et Pauli in 1838, and Andreae et Matthiae in 1846. His Bibliotheca patrum Græcorum dogmatica also remained incomplete. Only one volume, containing the dogmatical works of Athanasius, appeared 1853.

THIRLWALL, Connop, a scholarly English bishop; was b. at Stepney, Middlesex, Feb. 11, 1797; d. at Bath, July 27, 1875. He displayed such remarkable precocity, that in 1809 he published, under his father's direction, a volume of essays and poems entitled Primætiæ. He was educated at the Charter House and Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated as senior chancellor's medallist, 1818, and became fellow and tutor; studied law, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1825. He took orders in 1828; became rector at Kirby-under-Dale, Yorkshire, and bishop of St. David's, 1840. He resigned his see in 1874. He was an active member of the Old-Testament Company on Bible Revision. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey, at the side of those of Grote. Bishop Thirlwall was an intimate friend of Julius Hare, and jointly with him translated two volumes of Niebuhr's History of Rome, 1828-31. He also published a translation of A Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, by Dr. F. Schleiermacher, with an original Introduction (1825). His principal literary work was a History of Greece, published at first in LARNER'S Cabinet Cyclopædia, 1835-40, and separately (revised edition, London, 1845-52, 8 vols.), and again, 1855, 8 vols. Grote (Preface to his History of Greece, 1846) says he would probably never have conceived of writing a history of Greece if Thirlwall's work had appeared a few years earlier. Thirlwall's letters, charges, etc., are collected under the title of Literary and Theological Remains, edited by Dean PEROWNE, London, 1875-76, 3 vols. See his Letters, 1881, 2 vols., and new edition of his Letters to a Friend, edited by Dean STANLEY, 1882.

THIRTY YEARS' WAR, The (1618-48), one of the fiercest and most protracted of wars, was so far forth a religious war, as at that time religion formed one of the principal elements of politics. But of how mixed a character the whole affair was, may be seen from the circumstance, that though Roman Catholics on the one side (headed by Austria, Spain, and Bavaria), and Protestants on the other side, under various leaders (Bohemia, Denmark, and Sweden), always formed the groundwork of the party position, Roman-Catholic powers, as, for instance, France, would at times ally themselves with the Protestants, and Protestant princes with the Roman Catholics, as, for instance, the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony.

The war began in Bohemia. In 1517 Ferdinand of Styria, a brother of the Emperor Matthias, a pupil of the Jesuits, and a fanatical enemy of Protestantism, was crowned king of Bohemia; and persecutions were immediately instituted against the Protestants. But the Protestants, under the leadership of Count Thurn, penetrated into the castle of Prague, threw the imperial commissioners out of the window (May 23, 1618), organized a general rising throughout the country, entered into alliance with Bethlen Gábor, prince of Transylvania, and the Evangelical Union in Germany; and as Matthias died on March 20, 1619, and Ferdinand shortly after succeeded him as emperor, they declared the Bohemian throne vacant, and offered it to the young elector-palatine, Friedrich V., a son-in-law of James I. of England. He accepted the offer, but was very unfortunate. The Protestant army was completely routed in the battle at the White Mountain, just outside the walls of Prague, Nov. 8, 1620, by Tilly, the commander of the imperial army, which chiefly consisted of the contingent of the Holy League; and Bohemia was speedily reduced to order; that is, more than thirty thousand families belonging to the Lutheran or the Reformed denomination were driven out of the country, and their property, valued at more than forty million crowns, was confiscated. Next year the Palatinate was invaded by a Spanish army under Spinola; and at the diet of Regensburg, March 6, 1623, Friedrich V. was put under the ban of the empire, and the Palatinate was given to Maximilian of Bavaria, James I. looking on in idleness. In 1625 the Protestant princes of Germany again rallied under the head of Christian IV., king of Denmark, a mediocrity of considerable dimensions, but of a rather coarse description; but he was utterly defeated in the battle at Lutter-am-Barenberge, Aug. 27, 1626, by Tilly. The Danish peninsula was flooded with imperial troops; and the peace of Lubeck, May 22, 1629, made an end of the direct participation of Denmark in the war.

In the latter part of June, 1630, Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, landed in the Island of Usedom; and in a very short time he conquered Pomerania and Mecklenburg. Gustavus Adolphus was a Christian hero, a great general, and a great statesman. The hope of conquest, of making the Baltic a Swedish sea, was, no doubt, one of his motives in taking up the cause of the Protestants in Germany; but his conviction of the justice of that cause was as surely another, and perhaps the stronger one. His army was a model of an army, infinitely superior in moral character to the armies of Tilly and Wallenstein. The Swedish soldiers of Gustavus Adolphus resembled the Ironsides of Cromwell. Tilly was defeated at Breitenfeld, Sept. 17, 1631, and on the Lech, April 15, 1632. In the latter battle he was killed; and his army, composed of mercenary rabble, disappeared like vapor in the air. But Ferdinand charged Wallenstein with the formation of a new army, and Wallenstein was generally considered the equal of Gustavus Adolphus as a general. They met at Lützen, Nov. 16, 1632. Wallenstein was defeated; but Gustavus Adolphus fell, and the emperor found breathing-room again. Though Wallenstein remained inactive in Bohemia, where he finally was assassinated at Eger, Feb. 25, 1634, the standard of the Swedish army rapidly sunk after the death of Gustavus Adolphus; and the Protestant army suffered a severe defeat at Nordlingen, Sept. 6, 1634, after which the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony deserted the Protestant cause, made peace with the emperor, and turned against the Swedes.

Nevertheless, the position of the emperor continued to be very critical, and his prospects of final success were very small. Richelieu, whose whole foreign policy turned upon the humiliation of the house of Austria as its true pivot, and who for that very reason had subsidized the Swedes from the very beginning, now took the army of Duke Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar into French service; and the war against Austria and her allies was carried on with a fierceness and cruelty hitherto unheard of. In 1616 no less than a hundred villages were burnt down in Bavaria, and the inhabitants driven away. And at the same time the Swedish general Torstenson developed an activity which seemed to threaten the very existence of the Hapsburg dynasty. He defeated one Austrian army under Piccolomini at Breitenfeld, Nov. 2, 1642, and another, under Hatzfeld, at Jankow, March 6, 1645; and he actually approached Vienna in order to form a connection with Prince Rakoczy of Transylvania, and lay siege to the city. The immediate danger drifted away by the somewhat peculiar proceedings of Rakoczy. But Austria was completely exhausted; and the peace of Westphalia (which art. sec.) Oct. 24, 1648, was as necessary to her as it was welcome to Germany, which lay prostrate, and cruelly devastated from one end to the other. THOLUCK, Friedrich August, D.D., an eminent German divine and pulpit orator; b. in Breslau, March 30, 1799; d. in Halle, June 10, 1877. Descended from very humble parentage, he first learned a trade, but by the assistance of friends attended the gymnasium of his native city, and the university of Berlin. When he left college, he delivered an address on The Superiority of the Oriental World over the Christian, which was chiefly a eulogy on Mohammedanism. But during his university course he was thoroughly converted from his pantheism and scepticism, under the influence of the lectures of Schleiermacher and Neander, and more especially by personal intercourse with Baron Ernst von Kottwitz, a member of the Moravian brotherhood, who combined high social standing and culture with a lovely type of piety. His character is finely described in the unnamed "patriarch" in Tholuck's Weiche des Zweiflers. (See Jacobi, Erinnerungen an B. v. K., Halle, 1852.) In 1821 he was graduated as licentiate of theology, and began to deliver lectures as privat-docent. In 1821 he was appointed extraordinary professor of Oriental literature, in the place of Dr. DeWette. In 1825 he made a literary journey to Holland and England, at the expense of the Prussian Government, and in 1826 was called to the university of Halle as ordinary professor of theology, in the place of Dr. Knapp, which he occupied to the time of his death, with the exception of a brief period (1827-28), which he spent in Rome as chaplain of the Prussian embassy on Capitol Hill, in intimate intercourse with Bunsen. In Halle he had at first to suffer a good deal of opposition and reproach from the prevailing rationalism of his colleagues (Gesenius and Wegscheider), but succeeded in effecting a radical change; and the whole theological faculty of Halle has since become decidedly evangelical. In Dec. 2, 1870, his friends prepared a surprise for him by the celebration of the semi-centennial jubilee of his professorship. The university and magistrato of Halle, delegates of several universities and of all schools of theology, took part in it; and his pupils in Europe and America founded a seminary adjoining his own home, for beneficial students of theology, as a perpetual memorial of his devotion to students. He was always in delicate health, but by strict temperance and great regularity of habits he managed to do an unusual amount of work till within the last years of his life. He was incessant in his lectures, preached regularly as university chaplain, and found time to write many books.

His principal works are as follows: Sin and Redemption, or the True Consecration of the Sceptic (Berlin, 1825, many times reprinted; translated into English by Ryland, with an Introduction by John Pye Smith; republished in Boston, 1854, under the title, Guido and Julius, or Sin and the Propitiator), in opposition to DeWette's Theology, or the Consecration of the Sceptic, 1825; Blüthen-sammlung aus der morgendlichen Mystik, 1825 (a collection of translations from the mystic poets of the East); Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (11th ed., 1812; twice translated into English, last by R. Menzies, Edinburgh, 1848, 2 vols.), the first exegetical fruit of the new evangelical theology; Commentary on the Gospel of John, 1826 (7th ed., 1857, translated into English by Kaufmann, 1836, and by Dr. C. P. Kranth, Philadelphia, 1859), less thorough and permanent, but more popular, and better adapted for students, than his other commentaries; Commentary on the Sermon on the Mount, 1833 (3d ed., 1841; translated into English by R. L. Brown, Edinburgh, 1860; new ed., 1869), his most learned, elaborate, and valuable exegetical production; Commentary on the Hebrews, 1836 (3d ed., 1850; translated by James Hamilton, Edinburgh, 1852); Commentary on the Psalms, 1843 (translated by Dr. Mombert, Edinburgh and Philadelphia, 1859); The Credibility of the Gospel History, 1837 (2d ed., 1858), a vindication of the Gospels against the mythical theory of Strauss; and Hours of Christian Devotion, 1840, 2 vols. (well translated by Rob. Menzies, Edinburgh and New York, 1875), containing several original hymns. In this book he pours out his fervent evangelical piety with all the charm of fresh enthusiasm. He was one of the most eloquent German preachers in his day, and published a series of university sermons (collected in 5 vols., 3d ed., Gotha, 1863-64, one volume being translated, Light from the Cross, Sermons on the Passion of our Lord, Philadelphia, 1858). He issued also two very interesting volumes of Miscellaneous Essays, 1839. His last works were contributions to German church history since the Reformation, derived in part from manuscript sources; namely, Lutherische Theologen Wittenbergs im 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852), Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrh. (Hamburg, 1852, 1854, in 2 vols.), and Geschichte des Rationalismus (part i. Berlin, 1865, never finished). A complete edition of his works appeared 1863-72, in 11 vols. He also republished the Commentaries of Calvin on the Gospels and Epistles, and his Institutio Christiana Religiosis, and made that great divine better known in Germany, although he himself was of Lutheran descent and predisposition. He conducted for several years a literary periodical, and contributed largely to the first edition of the Encyclopædie of Herzog, whom he recommended as editor to the publisher, having first himself declined the position.

Tholuck was one of the most fruitful and influential German theologians and authors during the second and third quarters of the nineteenth century, and better known in England and America than any other. He was original, fresh, brilliant, suggestive, eloquent, and full of poetry, wit, and humor. He cannot be classified with any school. He was influenced by Pietism, Moravianism, Schleiermacher, Neander, and even Hegel. His elastic mind was ever open to new light; but his heart was always right, and never shaken in faith and love to Christ. He had an extraordinary talent for languages, and could speak English, French, Italian, Greek, Arabic, and several other tongues, ancient and modern, almost like a native. In that line he was scarcely surpassed by Cardinal Mezzofanti, whom he met in Rome. His learning was extensive rather than thorough and exhaustive. He gathered honey from the literature of all ages, from the old Orient down to Goethe, but made it tributary to faith. He is one of the regenerators of German theology, leading it from the barren heath of rationalism to the green pastures of the Scriptures and the literature of the Reformation. His Commentaries broke a new path. His personal influence was as great and good as that exerted by his works, and yields only to that of Neander among his contemporaries. He was gifted with personal magnetism, and brilliant powers of conversation. Having no children, he devoted all his paternal affections to his students, and was nobly assisted by his second wife (a most lovely and refined Christian lady). He loved, as he said, candidates more than ministers, and students more than candidates, because he was more interested in the process of growth than in the result of growth. His life was a life with the young, fruitful in blessings. He was in the habit of taking long walks with two or three students every day from eleven to twelve, and from four to five; he invited them freely to his house and table, tried experiments on their minds, proposed perplexing questions, set them disputing on high problems, inspired and stimulated them in the pursuit of knowledge, virtue, and piety. He had great regard for individuality, aimed to arouse in every one the sense of his peculiar calling rather than to create a school. Like John the Baptist, he sent all away from him to a higher Master. His chief aim was to lead them to a humble faith in the Saviour, and to infuse into them that love which was the ruling passion of his heart. He adopted, as he says, Zinzendorf's motto, "I have but one passion, and that is He, and He alone." His lecture-room was truly a school of Christ. And herein lies his chief significance and merit. Thousands of students from different lands owe to him their spiritual life. To Americans he was especially attached, and a most useful guide in the labyrinth of German theology. He was very intimate with Dr. Edward Robinson, Dr. Charles Hodge (who studied at Halle in 1827, and was daily in his company), Dr. Henry B. Smith, Dr. Prentiss (who studied there in 1840), and Dr. Park of Andover. He called them "his American pets." I once met him promenading with a pious Canadian Methodist, and an American sceptic who never went to church, but worshipped God, as he said, in his own temple, under the blue skies, and basking in the light of the sun. "But," asked Tholuck smilingly, "what do you do when it rains?" He told me afterwards that this agnostic was seeking religion, and we must aid him. He often tried the wits of American students by curious questions: e.g., "Why did God make so many Chinese, and so few Yankees?" or, "How is Mr. Erlsenkörper" (Peabody, the philanthropist)? He was invited to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in 1873, and promised to the writer to come (with the humorous remark, "I am afraid of your American mobs, your hot cakes for breakfast, and especially of your kindness"). But his feeble health prevented him; and he sent one of his favorite pupils as his representative, with a modest sketch of his labors and the condition of theology in Germany. It is the last public document from his pen (except some letters), and gives a faithful idea of this lover of youth for Christ's sake.

LIT. — The biography of Tholuck was intrusted to his colleague, Professor Kähler, but has not yet appeared. The second edition of Herzog has not yet reached his name. Contributions are found in the following publications: THOLUCK'S Zweijler's Weihe in part autobiographical ("Guido" represents him; "Julius," his friend, Julius Müller); an autobiographical sketch by THOLUCK, with a paper by LEOP. WITTE, in the Proceedings of the Evangelical Alliance Conference of 1873, New York, 1874, pp. 85-89; an account of the semi-centennial jubilee of Tholuck, by Professor KÄHLER, in German, Halle, 1871, and in English by SCHAFF, with two letters from Tholuck, in the American Presbyterian Review for 1871, pp. 295-301. THOMAS THE APOSTLE was also known by the Greek equivalent Didymus, meaning twin. In the Gospels he is associated with Matthew (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15); in the Acts, with Philip (Acts i. 13). He was probably a Galilean, as the mention of his name with the other Galilean fishermen among the apostles (John xxi. 2) seems to indicate. According to the oldest tradition, he was born in Syrian Antioch, preached the gospel to the Parthians, and was buried at Edessa (Euseb., III. 1; Socrat., I. 19, etc.). According to later statements, he preached to the Medes and Persians, baptized the three kings [the wise men from the East]; and Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 25) speaks of his laboring in India, where a later tradition makes him suffer a martyr's death by being pierced to death by lances at the king's command. The Thomas Christians show his grave at Meliapur, India. His relics, according to the tradition of the Catholic Church, were removed to Edessa, and thence to Ortona, Italy. The Greek Church commemorates his memory June 3; the Latin Church, Dec. 21. The name "Thomas Christians," by which the old Christians of India were known, seems to confirm the tradition that Thomas labored in India; but this conclusion is denied by Philo and others. [See CHRISTIANS OF ST. THOMAS, and NESTORIANS.]

Two apocryphal works are associated with the name of Thomas. The Gospel according to Thomas [Evang. sec. Thomæ, edited by Tischendorf, who gives two Greek texts and a Latin translation, and by Dr. W. Wright in Syriac], and The Acts of Thomas (Acta Thomæ), edited by Thilo, Leipzig, 1823. Our authority for a characterization of Thomas is three passages in John's Gospel (xi. 16, xiv. 5, xx. 24). They present him as one whom a deep earnestness of spirit inclined to melancholy, and a desire of knowledge made a doubter. He is the representative, among the apostles, of the critical spirit. By the way of honest doubt and questioning, he arrived at an imperturbable and joyous conviction and faith. [See BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, for the legendary additions to his life. For a translation of the Gospel of Thomas, see B. HARRIS COWPER: The Apocryphal Gospels, London, 1867, pp. 118-170. At the appearance of Thilo's and Tischendorf's editions of the Greek Acts of Thomas, only five of the twelve divisions extant in Latin and Syriac versions existed in Greek. But in 1883 Max Bonnet published an edition of the twelve complete, from a Greek manuscript he discovered in the National Library in Paris (Acta Thomæ, Leipzig). The most exhaustive treatise upon the subject is LIPSIVS: Die Apokryphen Apostelgeschichten u. Apostellegenden, Braunschweig, 1883, vol. i. pp. 225-317.] J. P. LANGE.

THOMAS OF AQUINO (or Aquinas), the profoundest and keenest defender of the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in 1225 or 1227, in the castle of Rocca Sicca, near Aquino, a city not far from Naples; d. March 6, 1274, in the Cistercian convent of Fossa Nuova, near Terracina. I. Life.—Thomas, who was of noble birth, was placed in his fifth year under the monks of Monte Casino. In his tenth year he went to Naples; and in his sixteenth year, in spite of the opposition of his family, which was finally overcome by the intervention of Pope Innocent IV., he entered the Dominican order. In 1215 he was sent to Cologne to enjoy the instruction of Albertus Magnus, who directed his attention to Aristotle's philosophy and the writings of Dionysius the Areopagite. In 1218 he was made baccalaureate of theology in Paris, and the same year began to lecture on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, at Cologne. Returning to Paris, he taught there a large throng of students. Urban IV. repeatedly offered him high ecclesiastical preferment, which he in his humility declined. Under the pontificate of Clement IV. and till 1268, he taught in Rome, Bologna, and Paris. In 1272, in obedience to his order and the wish of King Charles, he made Naples the seat of his activity. The last years of his life were principally occupied with the completion of his great work, Summa theologiae. He died on his way to the church council at Lyons. In 1323 he was canonized by John XXII. If any one is entitled to this dignity by his life and works, Aquinas was. His piety, though monkish, was unfeigned; and he prepared himself for his writings, lectures, etc., by prayer. Louis IX. several times consulted him on matters of state. His industry, as his writings show, was intense. [Aquinas was declared a doctor of the church by Pius V. in 1567, and has a place with Augustine, Jerome, and Ambrose, among the most authoritative teachers of the church. Leo XIII., in an encyclical dated Aug. 4, 1879, recommended his works to the Catholic seminaries and theological faculties throughout the world, as a proper foundation of their religious and philosophical teaching, and particularly emphasized his political doctrines as conservative for society. The special title of this great theologian is the "Angelic Doctor," Doctor Angelicus.]

II. Theology.—In certain respects, Thomas of Aquino marks the culminating point of scholasticism. He sought to establish for the science of theology a position of superior dignity and importance over the science of philosophy, and, on the other hand, the harmony of the two sciences, by distinguishing in revelation the religious truths which can be excogitated by the use of reason from those which are only known by revelation. The doctrinal creed of the church, Thomas treats as absolute truth; but it is a remarkable fact, that he uses the arguments of the church-teachers only as of probable authority (Summa theol., i. qu. 1, art. 8). He refers more frequently to biblical texts than the other scholastics; but this practice does not purify his theology, but helps to confirm the church-doctrines. His exegetical principles were good; and he expressly commended the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, omnes sensus scripture fundantur super unum sensum literalem ex quo solo potest trahi argumentum, etc. (Summa, i. qu. 1, art. 10), but could not free himself from ecclesiastical authority. Thomas did not grant the ontological argument of Anselm for the existence of God. He gives several forms of the cosmological and teleological arguments, but says, that, while reason can prove that God exists, it cannot discover what his nature is. His fundamental conception of God is that of spiritual and active being. God is intelligence and will (intellectus et voluntas), the first cause. Thinking and willing are inseparable from his being. He is consequently forever returning to the idea of the absolute identity and simplicity of God. He employs all his speculative talent to explain the doctrine of the Trinity; and yet he declares that it is beyond the sphere of reason to discover the distinction of persons in the Godhead, and affirms that he who tries to prove the doctrine of the Trinity by the unaided reason derogates from faith: qui probare nititur Trinitatem personarum naturali ratione, fidei derogat (Summa, i. qu. 32, art. 1). Although Thomas did not, like his teacher Albertus Magnus, regard the world as an emanation from God, he refers its origin to God's active will, which is nothing more than his active intelligence, which, in turn, is only the essence of God working as the first cause. He is again and again forced to regard the world as a necessary product of the Divine Being, and inclines to the thesis of its eternal existence; so that he contents himself with saying, "It is credible that the world had a beginning, but neither demonstrable nor knowable: mundum incepisse credibile est, sed non demonstrabile et scibile" (Summa, i. qu. 46, art. 2). The doctrines of election and reprobation he considers in connection with the doctrine of providence. Every thing occurs under the Divine Providence, and serves a single and final end. Both reprobation and election are matters of divine decree; and the exact number of the reprobate, as well as of the elect, is determined in advance. Reprobation, however, consists not in a positive action on God's part, but in a letting-alone. God is not the cause of sin. He simply withholds his grace, and man falls by his own will. In opposition to the Arabic philosophers, Thomas insists upon the efficiency of second causes (Summa, i. qu. 105, art. 5), through which God works. He lays emphasis on the ability of the will to choose between two tendencies in the interest of the doctrines of guilt and merit.

Passing over to the creatures of God, Thomas dwells at length upon the subject of the angels, which he discusses with minute care and speculative skill. He teaches, with Augustine, that the original righteousness of Adam was a superadded gift. He spent special pains upon the elaboration of the doctrine of Christ's person and work. He affirms the meeting in Christ of the two absolutely opposite principles of human ignorance and imperfection, and divine omniscience and perfection. He departs in some details from the Anselmic doctrine of Christ's work, as when he denies the absolute necessity of the incarnation, and affirms that God might have redeemed man in some other way than by his Son. A human judge cannot release from punishment without expiation of guilt; but God, as the Supreme Being, can forgive without expiation, if he so chooses (Summa, iii. qu. 46, arts. 1, 2). The satisfaction of Christ removes all original guilt; and, by the application of his merit, the sinner secures freedom from and forgiveness of sin. Man's nature is corrupt, and grace alone enables him to reach eternal life. Thomas passes directly from the consideration of the work of Christ to the sacraments. The number of the sacraments had already been fixed at seven, but his treatment had a shaping influence upon the discussion of the subject in after-time. He proved the necessity of seven sacraments, and the immanence in them of a supernatural element of grace. His treatment of the Eucharist, penance, and ordination, is characteristic. He held to the change of the elements to the body and blood of Christ, justified the withholding of the cup from the laity with casuistical arguments, and spoke of the sacrifice of the mass, now as a "symbolical picture of the passion" (imago representativa passionis), now as a real sacrifice. It is noticeable, that, in his doctrine of the mass, he does not emphasize, as do his successors, the idea of sacrifice to the detriment of the sacramental idea. The subject of indulgences, Thomas handled at length; teaching that the efficacy of an indulgence does not depend upon the faith of the recipient, but upon the will and authority of the church, and extends to the dead as well as to the living (Summa, iii. qu. 71, art. 10). The discussion of eschatology follows the discussion of the sacraments. Thomas teaches the doctrines of purgatory and the intercession of saints. He treats the doctrines of the resurrection and future blessedness at length, and teaches that the body of the resurrection will in form be identical with the present body, even to the hair and the nails.

Thomas was not less great as a teacher of ethics than as a theologian. Neander has said, that, next to that of Aristotle, his is the most important name in the history of ethics (Wissensch. Abhandlungen, ed. Jacobi, p. 46). But both as a moralist and a theologian he was a true son of the church. His system is, as Baur says, only an echo of the doctrinal teaching of the church. In the spirit of the day he discussed many idle and useless questions with casuistical minuteness and far-fetched argumentation. But he was in this respect more moderate than his contemporaries. On the other hand, he discussed many important subjects with a depth and clearness of insight which make his views permanently interesting and valuable.

After the death of Aquinas, a conflict went on over his theology; Duns Scotus being the leader of the other school. The Dominicans were ranged on the side of Aquinas, whose followers were called Thomists; and the Franciscans on the side of Duns Scotus, whose followers were known as Scotists. The difference between the teachers was not in the doctrines they taught, but in their treatment of these doctrines. With Scotus, theology was a practical science; with Aquinas, a speculative science. The controversy lasted down to the eighteenth century; and the Franciscan De Rada mentions in his work, Controversiæ inter Thomam et Scotum (Cologne, 1620), no less than eighty-six points of difference between the two schools. The most important points of controversy were the cognoscibility of God, the distinction between the divine attributes, original sin, the merits of Christ, etc. On the subject of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, the two teachers held divergent views; Thomas denying it, Scotus asserting it. The Jesuits opposed Thomism, as Bellarmine's example proves; but it prevailed at the Spanish universities of Salamanca, Coimbra, and Alcalá. The Roman-Catholic Church cannot forget the most profound and penetrating defender of its doctrines until it renounces them; and the Protestant Church will not fail to share in the admiration of Thomas Aquinas so long as it continues to admire literary greatness.

LIT. — The principal works of Thomas on theology are his Commentary on Peter the Lombard's Sentences, a work of his earlier years, in which his own system is worked out; the Compendium theologiæ (incomplete); the Summa de veritate fidei catholicæ, or Adversus Gentiles, whose purpose was apologetic, to defend the creed of the church; and Summa totius theologiæ, the work of his ripe thought, which, however, breaks off at the doctrine of penance, and was completed in the fifteenth century, from the Commentary on the Lombard's Sentences. His exegetical works include some commentaries on the Old Testament, a commentary on the Pauline Epistles, and a valuable one on the Gospels (Aurea catena in Evangelia), containing excerpts from eighty church writers. Complete editions of the works of Aquinas have appeared at Rome, 1572, 17 vols. [1882 sqq., ed. Zigliara]; Antwerp, 1612; Paris, 1660, 23 vols.; Venice, 1787, 28 vols.; Parma, 1852-71, 25 vols. THOMAS OF CELANO, a native of Celano in Abruzzo Ulteriore; was appointed custos of the Minorite monasteries of Cologne, Mayence, Worms, and Spire, by Cæsarius of Spire, the first provincial of the Franciscan order in Germany, about 1221. Nothing more is known about him; but the authorship of the oldest biography of St. Francis of Assisi, and of the celebrated hymn, Dies ire, dies illa, is generally ascribed to him. With respect to the biography, there is nothing which positively contradicts his claims; though it is singular that Mark of Lisbon, in enumerating the twenty-five first and most noted pupils of St. Francis, does not mention Thomas, while the biography evidently is written by one who lived familiarly with the saint from an early date. With respect to the hymn, Bartholomew Albizzi of Pisa is the first who mentions him as the author, in Liber conformitatum (1385); and most of the other claimants or pretenders are absolutely impossible. PALMER.

THOMAS OF VILLANOVA, b. at Fuenlana, in the diocese of Leon, 1457; d. at Valencia, Nov. 8, 1555. He studied at Alcalá; entered the order of the Augustinian hermits in 1517; became the provincial of his order for Andalusia and Castile; confessor to Charles V., and in 1541 bishop of Valencia. In 1665 he was canonized by Alexander VII., Act. Sanct., Sept. 5. He published some sermons and a Commentary on the Canticles; published at Alcalá 1581, Brescia 1613, Cologne 1614, and Augsburg 1757. His life was written by Quevedo, and translated into French by Mainburg, Paris, 1666.

THOMASIN OF ZIRKLARIA, in Tyrol, flourished in the beginning of the thirteenth century, and wrote in 1215 Der wälsche Gast, a didactic poem, which inaugurated that long series of poems so interesting for the moral and religious history of the middle ages. Though it does not mention the Virgin, and says some sharp truths concerning the church, it is not polemical against the pope and the priests. It was first printed at Leipzig, 1852, ed. by H. Rückert. See L. Diestel, in Kücher Allgem. Monatsschrift, August, 1852.

He studied theology at Erlangen, Halle, and Berlin, and was appointed preacher at Nuremberg in 1829, and professor of systematic theology at Erlangen in 1842. His studies were principally occupied with the history of doctrines, and in that line he published Origines, Nuremberg, 1837, and Die christliche Dogmengeschichte, 1874-76, 2 vols.

THOMASSIN, Louis, b. at Aix, Aug. 28, 1619; d. in Paris, Dec. 21, 1697. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1632, taught for some time philosophy at Lyons, afterwards theology at Saumur and in the seminary of St. Magloire in Paris, until he in 1668 retired in order to devote his whole time to study. His first work was his Dissertationes in concilia generalia et particularia, 1672; but his principal work is his Ancienne et nouvelle discipline de l'église touchant les bénéfices et les bénéficiaires, 1678-79, 3 vols. fol., which he translated into Latin, and which is said to have made a very deep impression on Innocent XI.

THOMPSON, Joseph Parrish, D.D., LL.D., b. in Philadelphia, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, Aug. 7, 1819; was graduated at Yale, 1838; ordained October, 1840; pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Church in New York from 1845 till 1871, when, on account of ill health, he resigned, and went to Germany, and d. in Berlin, Sept. 20, 1879.

In 1843 he became associated with five other gentlemen in establishing and conducting The New-Englander. In 1848, in connection with Drs. Leonard Bacon, Joshua Leavitt, and Richard S. Storrs, he established The Independent, a weekly newspaper which at once became a leader of public thought on all matters affecting the welfare of the nation and the kingdom of Christ. For fourteen years a large measure of editorial responsibility for the paper devolved upon Dr. Thompson. Apart from this editorial work, he was a prolific writer of books, addresses, occasional pamphlets, and reviews. The list of his separate publications includes more than ninety titles; among them are, The Theology of Christ in his own Words (1870), The United States as a Nation (1877), and Church and State in the United States (1873), a work which was printed in German, French, Italian, and English.

During thirty-one years of pastoral work he recognized the paramount claims of the pulpit upon his best energies; and though he had unusual gifts as a platform speaker, and peculiar facility in adapting himself to his surroundings, he rarely ventured to appear in the pulpit without an elaborate written sermon. This conscientious fidelity in official work was rewarded with large success, and his congregation came to be one of the largest and most intellectual in the metropolis. At the same time he bore a conspicuous part in the missionary work of his denomination and in its local councils, as well as in movements to promote general philanthropy and reform.

No sketch of this period of his life would be complete which did not hold up to view the immense influence which he exerted by pen and voice in the pulpit, on the platform, and in every appropriate way, in the discussions which preceded the overthrow of slavery. At a time when slavery found apologists in Northern pulpits, when antislavery sentiments were unpopular to the last degree, when criticism of the fugitive-slave law exposed one to obloquy, when an appeal to a higher law was denounced even by the religious press, he had the nerve to do what many shrank from doing, and the pluck to carry out his convictions in speech and act. In all this he was untrammelled by ecclesiastical or political ties; and it is believed that few men of this generation have exerted a larger influence over thoughtful minds in the elucidation of principles and the application of those principles to the life of the nation. During the whole period of the civil war he labored with assiduity for the maintenance of national unity on principles of universal freedom. Unfortunately, these arduous labors, in connection with personal exposure while on a visit to the Union army as an officer of the Sanitary Commission, resulted in such physical prostration, that in 1871 he was compelled to resign his pastoral office, and seek repose abroad.

A visit to Egypt as long ago as 1853 had led him to take a deep interest in Egyptology, and to make extensive preparations for writing an elaborate work on the Life and Times of Moses. It was his hope that a residence in Berlin would enable him to carry out this design. He did not readily abandon it; but his temperament was such that he could never be indifferent to the living questions of the hour; and finding in Germany a state of things which seemed to call for a defence of American institutions, and an exposition of American ideas, he took up that line of work, and became, as Professor Dorner fitly said, "a living link" between the United States and Germany. Though a private citizen, without emolument or rank, his residence in Berlin brought him into intimate relations with statesmen and scholars. Year after year he was called on to make the annual "Thanksgiving" address in the American chapel. In 1873, in the dead of winter, he went to Thorn, on the confines of Germany, to represent the American Geographical Society at the four hundredth anniversary of the birth of Copernicus. In Berlin he made addresses commemorating Agassiz, Bryant, and Bayard Taylor. He regularly attended the meetings of the Association for the reform and codification of the Law of Nations, and contributed papers which were held in high esteem by jurists. Three years in succession he spoke on the Papacy and Protestantism in Glasgow, where the papers styled him "that fiery American from Berlin." Many of his addresses and papers were designed to show that difficulties which threatened the peace of Europe were to be overcome by following the American plan of separating Church and State. During the "centennial" year he vindicated his native land against European prejudices by a course of six philosophical lectures on American political history, which he delivered in Berlin, Florence, Dresden, Paris, and London. His personal influence secured the insertion, in the Berlin Treaty of 1878, of a clause favoring religious liberty. Among his last works was the preparation, for the Evangelical Alliance at Basle (1879), of a memorial in behalf of religious liberty in Austria. The paper was adopted; and the Alliance appointed a deputation of prominent men, of whom he was one, — the sole representative from the United States, — to wait on the Emperor of Austria, and invoke redress. On hearing of this result, he said, looking at his helpless arm, "This old hand has struck one more blow for liberty." Before the deputation could fulfil its mission, he died in Berlin, and was buried in the cemetery of the Jerusalem Church. EDWARD W. GILMAN.

THOMSON, Andrew, D.D., Scotch Presbyterian; b. at Sanguhar, Dumfriesshire, July 11, 1779; d. in Edinburgh, Feb. 9, 1831. He was graduated at the university of Edinburgh, and at his death was pastor of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. He made a memorable attack upon the British and Foreign Bible Society for circulating the Apocrypha. He "opposed the abuses of lay-patronage in the Church of Scotland, effectually denounced British colonial slavery and other evils, and did much to promote education, morality, and evangelical religion in Scotland" (Allibone). He published several volumes of sermons and lectures: for list, see ALLIBONE'S Dictionary, s. v. The memorial volume of Sermons and Sacramental Exhortations (Edinburgh, 1831, Boston, 1832) contains his memoir.

THOMSON, Edward, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Portsea, Eng., Oct. 12, 1810; d. at Wheeling, W. Va., March 22, 1870. He with his father came to America in 1818, and settled in Wooster, O., 1820. He was graduated in medicine at the university of Pennsylvania in 1829. Brought up a Baptist, he joined the Methodist Church, December, 1831, and was admitted to the Annual Conference in 1831. From 1838 to 1843 he had charge of the Norwalk Seminary, Ohio; from 1844 to 1846 he was editor of the Ladies' Repository; from 1846 to 1860, president of the Ohio Wesleyan University; and from 1860 to 1864, editor of the New-York Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected bishop, and in that capacity made an extensive tour through Europe and the East. Among his publications may be mentioned Educational Essays, new ed., Cincinnati, 1856; Moral and Religious Essays, 1856; Evidences of Revealed Religion; Our Oriental Missions, — India, China, and Bulgaria, 2 vols.

THOMSON, James, b. at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, Sept. 11, 1700; d. at Kew Lane, near Richmond, Aug. 27, 1748; studied at Edinburgh, and went to London 1724; held government posts, and was patronized by the Prince of Wales; wrote The Seasons, 1726-30; Liberty, 1735-36; The Castle of Indolence, 1748; several tragedies, etc. Memorable here for A Hymn on the Seasons and A Paraphrase on the Latter Part of the Sixth Chapter of St. Matthew. THORAH (the law). 1. The Feast of the Law. — On the evening of the eighth day, which concludes the feast of tabernacles, commences what is called the "Feast of the Rejoicing of the Law," — which fitly celebrates the termination of the year, — by reading of the law and the beginning of another cycle. Two of the richest men of the synagogue are chosen to perform the ceremonies connected with the festival. The first, called the "Bridegroom of the Law," after the singing by the cantor of a long Hebrew formula of address, reads Deut. xxxiii. 27-xxxiv. 12, the closing verses of the Pentateuch; the other, called the "Bridegroom of Genesis," after a similar introduction, reads Gen. i.-ii. 3. The two "bridegrooms" distribute alms and presents. The festival is of Babylonish origin.

2. The Writing of the Law-scrolls, being an honorable and important work, can only be intrusted to a grown-up and experienced man. The scrolls are made of parchment prepared expressly for the purpose by a Jew from the hide of a clean animal slaughtered by a Jew. It must not be so porous or thin as to allow the writing to show through. The leaves should be joined by gut-string from a clean animal; but silk may, if necessary, be used. If a thread breaks, it can be once joined; if it breaks again, it must be thrown aside. The leaves thus fastened together are rolled upon a wooden rod with wooden or silver handles. Each leaf has an upper margin not less than three fingers broad, and a lower not less than four, and a space between every two columns two fingers broad. No column must be wider than half the height of the leaf, nor have less than forty-eight, or more than sixty lines. No line must be longer than three four-syllable words, or have space for more than thirty letters. The leaf is lined before the writing begins. The ink is made of lampblack, oil, or grease, and pounded charcoal, with honey; and the mass is then thoroughly dried. The ink is prepared for use by being moistened with water colored by gall-nuts. The writing-instrument is a stylus. The sample to be copied must be fully correct. No word may be divided. The square character is the only one used. They must be placed equidistantly. The letters ק, ג, ד, ה, ו, ז, ח, ט must have each three little strokes; י, little points on the head; ך should have in it a double broken line, as if two "p's" were written one within the other. Where the sign ם stands, there must be a space left of three, where ם, of nine, letters; for these signs marked off the sections. At the close of the book there must be left a space of four lines. With particular care the sacred name "Jehovah" (יהוה) is to be written. Before beginning, the pen must be wiped, then dipped carefully in the ink, so that it may not blot. No word must the scribe speak while writing it and the next three words, not even if the king spoke to him. If in the copy a mistake is made, it must be corrected within thirty days: otherwise the copy cannot be used. If there are more than four mistakes on a leaf, it must be discarded. Every Jew must either write a roll, or have one written. If he inherits one, he cannot sell it, except for money to support himself during his studies, or to pay his wedding-expenses, or to buy his freedom. A thoroughly correct law-roll is the object of especial respect. So long as it is open, no one may spit, move out his foot, or turn his back. When it is carried by, all must stand. The bearer must assume the attitude of the profoundest reverence. It is defilement to touch the text with the naked finger: therefore a hand holding a silver stylus is used to trace the words with in the public reading. To pack up the rolls, and carry them upon beasts of burden, is forbidden: they must be carried by riders, and close to their hearts.

LEYRER.

THORN, The Conference of (Colloquium caritativum), took place in 1645. In Poland the attempt at reconciling the various Christian denominations was not altogether fruitless. The Bohemian Brethren and the Reformed entered into community with each other in 1555. A consensus was established between those two parties on the one side, and the Lutherans on the other, in 1570; and in 1573 the Pax Dissidentium, a kind of toleration act, became part of the Polish constitution. Nevertheless, the arrogance and intrigues of the Jesuits every now and then produced great irritation, and utterances of jealousy and rancor were by no means wanting. As now, the overwhelming majority of the population of Poland proper was Roman Catholic, while in the two greatest fiefs of the Polish crown (Courland and Prussia) the majority of the population was evangelical, it became to the king of Poland a problem of the greatest political moment to prevent an open and general outburst of discord. For this purpose, Ladislaus IV. invited twenty-eight representatives of each of the three Christian denominations found in his realm to meet at Thorn, and by a congress of three months' duration to try to come to some general agreement. The most prominent among the Roman-Catholic representatives were Bishop Georg Tyszkiewicz of Samogitia; the Jesuit, Gregory Schönhof; the Carmelite, Hieronymus Cyrus a. St. Hyacintho; and the former Protestant, Bartholomew Nigrinus, preacher in Dantzic; among the Reformed, Johann Bergius, court-preacher to the elector of Brandenburg; Fr. Reichel from Francfort-on-the-Oder; Amos Comenius, bishop of the Moravian Brethren; Johann Bythner, superintendent of Great Poland; and Zbigneus Gorayski, castellan of Culm: among the Lutherans, Hülsemann from Wittenberg; Calovius and Botsack from Dantzic; Georg Calixtus from Helmstädt; Mich. Behn from Königsberg; and Sig. Guldenstern, starost of Stettin. The conference opened Aug. 18, 1645, under the presidency of Prince Georg Ossolinski, chancellor of the Polish crown, and closed Nov. 21, same year. No result was arrived at. The Lutherans showed the same unmitigated hatred to the Reformed as to the Roman Catholics. They began with foul intriguing among themselves, in order to exclude Calixtus, whom they knew to be in favor of a union, from any active participation in the debate. They went on disturbing the business of the assembly with ridiculous questions of etiquette (who should sit on the front seats, — the Lutherans, or the Reformed; who should make the opening prayer, — a Lutheran, or a Reformed, etc.); but they were finally debarred from participating in the debate, as the other representatives chose to speak Polish, which the Lutheran theologians did not understand. The principal points of controversy between the Reformed and the Roman Catholics were the demand of the former to style themselves catholic, and the refusal of the latter to incorporate with the official acts of the conference the Confession which the Reformed had presented to the assembly, and which had been read in a general session, — the so-called Declaratio Thorunensis. The Roman Catholics were, as Schönhof happened to intimate, afraid that their own flock, by reading the Reformed Confession in the report, should find it too sensible, and lose something of their fanaticism. The assembly separated, however, with many courteous compliments: whence it has been called caritativum.

LIT. — The official Acta Convendus Thorunensis (Warsaw, 1646) are very defective. A better report is given in CALOVIVS, Historia syncretistica, though it is full of printing errors. The publication of the acts gave, of course, rise to some bitter controversies. There appeared a Calvinische Relation, of which Hulsemann wrote a Widerlegung; also Calixtus wrote a Widerlegung against Weller, Helmstädt, 1651. See HERING: Beiträge zur Geschichte der reformirten Kirche in Preussen, Berlin, 1787; KRASINSKI: History of the Reformation in Poland, Lond., 1812. HENKE.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, is supposed to have been born in 1598, but no satisfactory proof of this date can be found; nor is it known where he was first educated, it being certain, however, that he became a pensioner at Cambridge in 1613, and a Trinity-College scholar the following year. He was made canon of Lincoln in 1636; vicar of Claybrooke, Leicestershire, in 1639; rector of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1642; master of Sidney College in 1643. Being a staunch Churchman of the Anglo-Catholic type, he was ejected from his preferments during the civil wars, but restored to them at the Restoration. He, however, resigned them on being appointed a stall at Westminster Abbey in 1661. He published a Hebrew, Syriac, and Arabic lexicon in 1665, assisted Walton in the preparation of his Polyglot during the Commonwealth, and designed an edition of Origen, which he did not execute. He also entered into plans for preserving and restoring episcopal institutions in those unsettled times. He assisted at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and had a share in the revision of the Prayer-Book the same year, being then a member of convocation. He resumed his residence at Cambridge, in broken health, in 1662, and afterwards divided his time between the university and the abbey. The plague drove him from Cambridge in 1666; after which he vacated his fellowship, and died at Chiswick in 1672. He is best known by his writings, and must be regarded as the most learned, the most systematic, and the most powerful advocate of Anglo-Catholic theology and High-Church principles in the seventeenth century. His theological works, which include a number of treatises, have been collected in the Oxford edition of six volumes, 1844-57. This edition presents a model of editorship; being enriched with explanatory notes, which form a guide to the study of controversial theology in general, and not only as it appeared in Thorndike's day. The book which most succinctly unfolds his scheme is entitled An Epilogue to the Tragedy of the Church of England (1659), in which he treats of the principles of Christian truth, the covenant of grace, and the laws of the church. The covenant of grace is his central idea. He dwells upon the condition of the covenant as being baptism, the necessity of the covenant as arising out of original sin, the mediator of the covenant as the divine Christ, and the method of the covenant as an economy of grace. In the treatment of this branch, he brings out the Anglican doctrines of salvation as distinguished from those of Puritanism. His trains of thought are prolix and excursive, and his style is crabbed and unreadable. His works could never be popular, but they demand the attention of all who would be accomplished theological scholars [see STOUGHTON: Religion in England, 1881, 6 vols. (Index)]. JOHN STOUGHTON.

THORNTON, Robert H., D.D., an early, earnest, and laborious minister of the Canadian Presbyterian Church; b. in the parish of West Calder, Scotland, April, 1806; d. in Oshawa, Can., Feb. 11, 1875. He was descended from a godly ancestry. His father was an elder in the church, and his mother was a woman of singular piety. At the early age of fourteen he became the assistant of his elder brother, Patrick, as a teacher of a school in Falkirk, where, with great diligence and self-denial, he prosecuted his classical studies. He entered the university of Edinburgh well prepared, and took a high place in his classes. He obtained the warm commendation of the professors, specially of Professor Wilson, who characterizes him in a certificate as "a most able student." Attracted by the fame of Dr. Thomas Chalmers, he attended a session at St. Andrews. In 1829 he entered the Divinity Hall of the Secession Church in Glasgow, and for four years attended the lectures of Dr. Dick and Dr. Mitchell, nomina nobilissima. In 1833 he was licensed and ordained as a missionary to Canada. He began his labors in that province in July, 1833, along the north shore of Lake Ontario, a territory at that time wild, and sparsely settled. He was installed as pastor of a congregation in the township of Whitby, which formed the centre of his widely extended evangelistic and missionary circuit. His labors extended for fifty miles along the lake-shore, and as far northward as settlers were to be found. His labors were arduous and most abundant. He organized many stations which are now large and prosperous congregations. He was among the foremost in every good work, a fearless and vigorous advocate of temperance at a time when a man needed the courage of his convictions to withstand the reproaches of his friends and the assaults of the vile. His efforts in the cause of general education were second to few; and every movement for the social, intellectual, and civil improvement of society, found in him a ready and eloquent supporter. He lectured frequently and gratuitously in all sections of the country, and was for a time the able and efficient agent of the Bible Society. He held a prominent place in the esteem of the community, and was fully appreciated by the church, and his brethren in the ministry. He was for many years clerk of his presbytery, and occupied the moderator's chair of the synod. In 1859 the College of Princeton, N.J., conferred on him the honorary title of D.D., — an honor well bestowed.

After a most active and widely extended ministry of forty-two years, and a life of varied and valuable services as a citizen, patriot, and philanthropist, Dr. Thornton died of pneumonia, after a few days' illness. Thoroughly devoted to his life-work, happy in his family, revered by his congregation, honored by his brethren, he has left a stainless memory as a legacy to his children and to the church. His congregation erected a monument to his memory. The motto of his life, however, was "Prodesse quam conspici." WILLIAM ORMISTON.

THORNWELL, James Henley, D.D., LL.D., one of the most eminent of the divines, educators, and polemics which the South has produced; b. in Marlborough District, S.C., Dec. 9, 1812; d. at Charlotte, N.C., Aug. 1, 1862. To his mother, a woman of great intelligence, piety, and strength of character, he acknowledged his indebtedness, when in the zenith of his fame he spoke of her in a public address as one "who had taught him from his cradle the eternal principles of grace" as they were contained in the Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church.

Notwithstanding the hinderances of early poverty, he obtained the elements of a good education under the training of an excellent teacher, and soon displayed such original genius and capacity for acquisition as to attract the attention, and secure the patronage, of two noble men, whose honor it was to furnish him with every facility for the prosecution of his studies, and whose reward was in the distinction to which he attained as a scholar, professor, pastor, and theologian. While a student of South-Carolina College, Columbia, before his seventeenth birthday, his dialectic talent, his passionate love for the classics, and his devotion to metaphysical studies, united with an extraordinary power of abstraction and mental concentration, together with a capacity for long-continued application without rest or sleep, gave presage of the distinction he was afterwards to win on every arena to which duty summoned him.

It is a remarkable circumstance in his history, that with the knowledge of the fact fully before him that his generous patrons had destined him to the study of the law, neither of them at the time professors of religion, and not yet being a professor himself, he came to the unalterable decision, that, inasmuch as it was the duty of every one to devote his life to the glory of God and the good of man, he could best fulfil the end of his being by becoming a minister of the gospel. Three years after this he became a member of the church; and then, after spending about two years in the business of teaching, in the prosecution of his great design he went first to the theological seminary at Andover, Mass., but, without matriculating there, he repaired to Cambridge, where, in the divinity school of Harvard University, he commenced the study of Hebrew and biblical literature. But, finding the climate too cold for his constitution, after a few months' stay he returned to South Carolina.

He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Harmony in 1831. His first pastorate was in Lancaster, in the presbytery of Bethel.

In 1837 he was elected to a professorship in Columbia College, South Carolina. In 1839 he resigned his chair in that institution to become pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Columbia, but was recalled to the college in 1841, and remained connected with it as professor or president, with a few intervals of service elsewhere, for fifteen years.

At the close of 1855 he was transferred from the college to the theological seminary; and the beginning of 1858 found him, in what was perhaps the noblest sphere of his life, in the chair of didactic and polemic theology, and also editor of the Southern Quarterly Review.

Twice during his life Dr. Thornwell visited Europe. Ten times he represented his presbytery in the General Assembly; and he was moderator of the assembly [Old-School Branch] which met in Richmond, Va., in 1847.

It was at the assembly held in Rochester, N.Y. [1860], that the great debate between himself and the Rev. Charles Hodge, D.D., took place, on the subject of church boards.

Dr. Thornwell took a leading part in the organization of the Southern General Assembly in 1861. On the 1st of August, 1862, he died in Charlotte, N.C., where he had gone to meet his wounded son, then a soldier in the Confederate army. He was taken away in the meridian of his fame and usefulness, not yet having completed his fiftieth year, his last words being those of wonder and praise.

The collected writings of Dr. Thornwell, edited by Rev. James B. Adger, D.D., Richmond, 1871-73, are contained in four volumes, the first of which is entitled Theological; the second, Theological and Ethical; the third, Theological and Controversial; and the fourth, Ecclesiastical. See his Life and Letters, by B. M. PALMER, Richmond, 1875. MOSES D. HOGUE.

THREE-CHAPTER CONTROVERSY, The, was intimately connected with the Monophysite Controversy. Theodorus Ascidas, bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, a devoted Origenist, represented to the Emperor Justinian that many of the Monophysites might be won for the church if some action were taken against the chief representatives of the Antiochian (Nestorian) theology. The emperor issued an edict in 544 condemning the so-called "Three Chapters" which Theodore proposed, (1) the person and writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, (2) the writings of Theodoret in defence of Nestorius, and (3) the letter which Ibas was said to have written to the Persian Maris. Theodore had died at peace with the church, and Theodoret and Ibas had been expressly recognized as orthodox by the Council of Chalcedon (451). Thus the support of the "Three Chapters" implied a partial condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon. The Greek bishops yielded assent after a public resistance. Pope Vigilius wavered, but in 548 condemned the Three Chapters in the Judicatum, but at the same time insisted on the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. The Latin Church, however, tenaciously resisted the condemnation, and a synod of Carthage excluded Vigilius from church communion. Vigilius subsequently withdrew the Judicatum, refused to be present at the second Council of Constantinople (553), in which the Three-Chapter Controversy was considered, and in a decree of May 11, 553 (Constitutum de tribus capitulis), expressly protested against the condemnation of the "Three Chapters." The Council of Constantinople, however, followed the wishes of the emperor. The Greek churches accepted the decision confirming the condemnation of the articles. The Roman Church fell in, and in 559 the North African Church gave its assent. But the recognition of the authority of this council by Vigilius and Pelagius was the occasion of the separation of the churches of Northern Italy, with Aquileja and Milan at their head, from the Roman Church. The schism continued till the pontificate of Gregory the Great. The Latin Church takes very little notice of the fifth Œcumenical Council (Second Council of Constantinople).

THUGS (Hindi, Thugna, "to deceive"), an organized body of secret assassins and thieves, who for many years had been the terror of India. They were worshippers of the bloody goddess Kali, who presided over impure love and death. Roaming about through the country, they usually strangled their victims by a skilful use of the handkerchief. They devoted one-third of their plunder to their tutelary divinity. The administration of Lord William Bentinck (1828-35) succeeded in putting an end to their dreaded deeds. See Capt. SLEEMAN: Ramaseena, or a Vocabulary of the Peculiar Language used by the Thugs, 1836; MEADOWS TAYLOR: The Confessions of a Thug, London, 1858.

THUMMIM. See URIM and THUMMIM.

THURIBLE, THURIBULUM, or THYMIATE-RIUM, a vessel for burning incense, a censer, generally made of precious metal, in the form of a vase, with a pierced cover, and suspended in three chains for swinging. In this form, however, the thurible is not found until the twelfth century. The thuribles which Constantine presented to the churches of Rome, or Chosroes to the churches of Constantinople, must, by reason of their weight, have been stationary.

THURIFICATI. See LAPSED.

THYATIRA, a city of Asia Minor, on the northern border of Lydia, near the road from Pergamum to Sardis, which was about twenty-seven miles distant. The Lycus flows near it. Its early names were Pelopia, Semiramis, and Euhippia. Lydia, the seller of purple stuffs, who received Paul so kindly, came from Thyatira (Acts xvi. 11). Dyeing was apparently an extensive industry there, and the scarlet cloth now produced there is very famous. Lydia very likely belonged to the dyers' guild. She was probably helpful in the establishment of the church of Thyatira, if not the founder. This church was honored with one of the Epistles of Revelation (ii. 18-29). Some commentators explain "the woman Jezebel" as the sibil Sambatha, whose fane stood outside the walls. The modern city is called Ak-Hissar ("white castle"), and numbers some twenty thousand.

TIARA, a head-dress worn by the Pope on solemn occasions, consisting of a high cap of gold-cloth, encircled with three crowns, and provided, like the mitre, with two flaps hanging down the neck. The original tiara had only a golden circle along the nether brim. John XIII. (965) added the first crown; Boniface VIII. (1295), the second; and Benedict XIII. (1335), the third.

TIBERIAS, the modern Tuberieh, stands on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, at a point where the cliffs, generally surrounding the lake, retreat from the waters, and form an open plain. It was built by Herod Antipas, and named after the Roman Emperor Tiberius; and it was the capital of Galilee from that time till the reign of Herod Agrippa II., who removed the seat of government back to its old place at Sepphoris. As Herod Antipas was educated in Rome, the city he built was, with its palaces, theatres, gymnasiums, etc., more Roman than Jewish, and the strict orthodox Jews felt a kind of aversion to it. This may explain why Christ, who spent most of his time in Galilee, never visited the city, though perhaps, also, the fate of John the Baptist may have been the reason. The city is mentioned three times in the New Testament,—John vi. 1, 23, xxi. 1. During the war with Rome, it played, on account of its fortifications, quite an important part; and when, in the middle of the second century, it was the seat of the Sanhedrin, removed thither from Jamnia, it became one of the four holy cities of the Jews. At present it has some four thousand inhabitants, of whom about one-quarter are Jews, the rest Mohammedans and Christians. It stands at the northern end of the plain; but the ruins extend far away to the southern end, where are the famous warm baths which are mentioned by Pliny.

TIG'LATH-PILE'SER (Heb., תִּגְלַת פִּלְאֶסֶר, also תִּלְגַּת פִּלְנֶסֶר, תִּלְגַּת פִּלְנָסֶר, (Authorized Version, "Tiglath-Pileser"), LXX., Θαλαθ-φελλασάρ, Θαλαθφελλασάρ, Θελαθφελλασάρ, Θελαφαλ-λασάρ, Θαλᾶθ Φαλλασάρ, etc.; Assy., Tuklat-apal-êšarra, "(My) trust (is) the son of the house of favor," or "house of assembling;" apal-êšarra is probably a title of the god Adar, the second Assyrian king of that name, who reigned B.C. 745-727, and is identical with PUL (Heb., פּוּל; LXX., Φούλ, Φαλώξ, Φαλῶχ, Φονά),—see below,—is mentioned under one or other of these names in six passages of the Bible (2 Kings xv. 19, 29, xvi. 7-10; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26; 2 Chron. xxviii. 20), and as "Tuklat-apal-êšarra" in various Assyrian inscriptions.

The identity of Tiglath-pileser and Pul appears from the following grounds. (1) The Bible and the inscriptions agree in making Azariah of Judah and Menahem of Israel contemporaries. As the Assyrian king contemporary with both, the Bible names Pul; the inscriptions, Tiglath-pileser. (2) The inscriptions leave no room for Pul as a king distinct from Tiglath-pileser. The Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the successive years, and includes the kings, does not allude to him; and the hypothesis of a break in the list, resulting in the omission of his name, is groundless. Nor does Tiglath-pileser, whose inscriptions are numerous and full, ever allude to such a person as a rival or rebel. (3) Berossus, the Babylonian priest and historian (third century B.C.), says that Phul the Chaldean reigned before Sennacherib, and invaded Judæa. No mention is made of the name Tiglath-pileser. See Alex. Polyhistor in Euseb. Armen. Chron., I. 4. (4) Pôros (Πόρος), according to Ptolemy's Canon, became king of Babylon in 731. Pôr(os) can easily be the same with Pûl, as Persian inscriptions give Bâbiru for Bâbilu, Babylon, etc. The Assyrian inscriptions tell us that Tiglath-pileser, who called himself "King of Shumêr and Akkad" (i.e., Southern and Northern Babylonia), reduced the Babylonian princes to subjection in 731. (5) Ptolemy's Canon gives the name of another Babylonian ruler, Chinzîros (Χιζίρου), for the same year, 731, and puts it before that of Pôros. The inscriptions tell us that among the Babylonian princes who did homage to Tiglath-pileser in 731 was Ukinzôr. (6) The inscriptions tell us that Tiglath-pileser's successor ascended the Assyrian throne B.C. 727. Ptolemy's Canon gives 726 as the first year of Pôros' successor in Babylonia. These considerations make the identity of Pul with Tiglath-pileser a matter of the strongest historical probability. The name Pul was not unknown in Assyria, and was probably the private name of this king, who seems not to have been the son of his predecessor. The name Tiglath-pileser would then have been assumed on his ascending the throne.

The Bible makes the following statements about this king: (1) That he threatened the northern kingdom (Israel), and that Menahem the king gave him a thousand talents of silver to secure his favor and support (2 Kings xv. 19); (2) That in the days of Pekah, a usurper, the second successor of Menahem, he took Ijon, Abel-beth-maachah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, "all the land of Naphtali," "and carried them captive to Assyria" (2 Kings xv. 29; cf. 1 Chron. v. 6, 26); (3) That Ahaz, king of Judah, induced him by homage and presents to come to his aid against Syria and Israel; that he captured Damascus, carried the inhabitants away captive, and slew Rezin the king; and that Ahaz went to Damascus to meet him (2 Kings xvi. 7-10; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, which, however, says, "Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, came unto him [Ahaz], and distressed him, but strengthened him not"). These statements are partly explained, partly supplemented, by the inscriptions, from which we are enabled to give, with approximate accuracy, a sketch of Tiglath-pileser's reign. In B.C. 745, his first regnal year, he made a successful expedition to Babylonia. In 744 he was occupied in the countries east of Assyria. In 743 his forces were engaged, partly in Armenia, partly before the city of Arpad, in the land Chatti, west of the Euphrates, receiving tribute from the kings of Karkemish, Tyre, etc. The years 742-740 were occupied in the siege of Arpad. In 740 Hamath was punished for revolting to "Azariah of Judah," who was himself not molested. This agrees with what the Bible tells us of Azariah's formidable power. In 739 there was an expedition to the land of Ulluba and the city Birtu (on the Euphrates?). The conquered Hamathites were transported to Ulluba. In 738, besides other conquests, the king received tribute from Rezin of Damascus, Menahem of Israel (cf. 2 Kings xv. 19), Hiram of Tyre, and various rulers of Asia Minor, Phœnicia, and Arabia. The years 737-735 were spent in the East; but in 734 the king marched to Philistia (Philistia), taking in Phœnicia, Israel, Judah, Edom, Moab, and Ammon. Before this expedition, or in its early stages, must be placed the homage, gifts, and entreaties of Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 7, 8). Tiglath-pileser speaks, in one inscription, of receiving tribute from "Ja-u-cha-zi (Ahaz, 𐤏𐤃𐤐) of Judah." His account of the campaign of 734 (cf. 2 Kings xv. 29) supplements the biblical statement; for he tells us that he plundered the kingdom of Israel ("the land of the house of Omri"), and, killing Pekah the king, set Hoshea on the throne. This shows us what power was at work behind the conspiracy and usurpation of Hoshea (mentioned 2 Kings xv. 30). After this the Assyrian king turned toward Damascus, and besieged it for two years, finally capturing it, and putting Rezin to death (cf. 2 Kings xvi. 9). It must have been at this time that Ahaz visited him at Damascus (2 Kings xvi. 10). In 731 occurred the second expedition to Babylon, with the subjugation of Merodach-baladan (see art.) and Ukinzer (see above). 730-728 were spent in Assyria, where the king's death probably occurred in 727.

The only difficulty occasioned by the comparison of the biblical with the Assyrian accounts of this king is a chronological one. He reigned, according to the Eponym Canon (which is fixed by its mention of the solar eclipse of B.C. 763, and by its correspondence with Ptolemy's Canon), B.C. 745-727. But the received biblical chronology puts the death of his contemporary, Azariah, in B.C. 758, and that of Menahem B.C. 761. It also gives 739, and not 734, as the date of Pekah's death, putting the invasions of Judah by Pekah and Rezin in 742-741. The discrepancies are in part due to the same causes which we find operating in the previous century, in the times of Ahab, Jehu, and Shalmaneser II. (see SHALMANESER), but are connected in part with some special inaccuracies in the present text of that section of Kings with which we are here concerned. A solution of the difficulty cannot be attempted here; but it must be sought in the restoration of correct numbers in the Hebrew text, and not in a modification of the Assyrian dates, which are here self-consistent and well-attested.

FRANCIS BROWN.

TILLEMONT, Louis Sébastien, Le Nain de, a Roman-Catholic historian; b. in Paris, Nov. 30, 1637; d. there Jan. 10, 1698. He was educated in Port-Royal, shared the views and fortunes of the Jansenists, and was consecrated priest in 1676. [He took his name from the town of Tillemont, near Paris, where he was rector.] He devoted much time to historical studies, and, after furnishing biographies for editions of several of the Fathers, published the first volume of his larger work, Histoire des Empereurs et des autres princes qui ont régné durant les six premiers siècles de l'Eglise, des persécutions qu'ils ont faites aux chrétiens, etc., 1690. He published three more volumes of this work during his life. Two posthumous volumes were added. His principal work was the Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique des six premiers siècles. The first three volumes were published at Paris, 1694. Thirteen others followed [till 1712] after the author's death, bringing the history down to 513. This was the first church history based upon conscientious researches published in France up to that time. It consists for the most part of quotations from the Fathers, arranged in chronological order. The author's own remarks are included in brackets, or consigned to the foot of the page as notes. Tillemont's labors do not satisfy the present generation of scholarship, but were valuable for their minuteness and care. C. SCHMIDT.

TILLOTSON, John, b. at Sowerby in Yorkshire, October, 1630; son of a clothier, who was a zealous Puritan; studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where Puritan principles were inculcated, and where he shared the same room with Francis Holcroft, one of the subsequently ejected clergy. But Tillotson did not imbibe Puritan doctrines: he rather leaned in what was called the "Latitudinarian" direction. The Cambridge school of divines, including Cudworth, More, Smith, Wilkins, and others, manifested a bias of that kind; and they probably exerted an influence over the future archbishop. Chillingworth, through his writings, is also said to have moulded Tillotson's opinions. Yet he appeared on the Presbyterian side at the famous Savoy Conference, but was too young to take any important part in that assembly. How, when, or where, he was ordained is a mystery; but he was a preacher in 1661, and was offered the church of St. Mary Aldermanbury in 1662, when Edmund Calamy was deprived of it. After submitting to the Act of Uniformity, he was appointed to the rectory of Kedington, Suffolk, and soon afterwards preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He began as an author in 1664, by publishing a sermon on The Wisdom of being Religious, and another in 1666, on The Rule of Faith. It was as a preacher, and the author of sermons, that he became most distinguished; his plain, almost colloquial style, free from learned quotations, artificial arrangement, and endless subdivisions, making him popular with the middle classes, whilst his good sense and cultured mind made him acceptable, also, with the learned. Dryden even was under literary obligations to Tillotson; and high praise has been bestowed on him by Taine, the French critic. He was a thorough Protestant, and at home in the Popish controversy, and appealed to reason as well as revelation in support of his opinions. He showed a strong Erastian tincture in a book entitled The Protestant Religion vindicated from the Charge of Singularity and Novelty, in which production he curiously said that "no man is at liberty to affront the established religion of a nation, though it be false." This brought him into trouble with many of his friends, and he soon retreated from such a strange position. He was a Whig in politics, opposed to the despotism of the Stuarts, and an advocate of ecclesiastical comprehension. He attended Lord William Russell on the scaffold, and hailed with joy the Revolution of 1688: after this he took part in the ecclesiastical commission for revising the Prayer-Book. Not without high preferment before, for he was dean successively of Canterbury and St. Paul's, he rose to the primacy of all England in 1691, where he endured many insults from the Nonjurors. Stricken with palsy, he died Nov. 22, 1694.

JOHN STOUTON.

TIMOTHY, the friend and co-laborer of Paul, was the son of a heathen father and a Jewish mother named Eunice (Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 5). His home seems to have been at Lystra, where he enjoyed the pious instructions of his mother and grandmother Lois (2 Tim. i. 5), and was probably converted at Paul's visit on his first missionary journey. Paul frequently calls him his child (1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2, etc.). At the time of his conversion he must have been very young; for Paul exhorts him, years afterwards, to let no man despise his youth (1 Tim. iv. 12), and to flee youthful lusts (2 Tim. ii. 22).

When the apostle visited Lystra on his second missionary journey, he heard the best reports of Timothy, and determined to take him with him as a companion. He was probably ordained at that time (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), and circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). Timothy accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey to Macedonia, as it would seem from Acts xvi. 1-3, and as far as Berea (Acts xvii. 14, 15), where, with Silas, he remained behind for a time, while Paul went on to Athens. He afterwards met Paul at Athens, whence he was despatched on a mission to the church in Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 2). Having accomplished his mission, he met Paul again at Corinth (Acts xviii. 1, 6), and took part with him in the proclamation of the gospel there (2 Cor. i. 19). We meet Timothy again on Paul's third missionary journey at Ephesus (Acts xix.). He was despatched thence on an important mission to Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 17), and was in Corinth, or thought to be there, when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was written (1 Cor. xvi. 10, 11). He was sent by the apostle, in company with Erastus, to Macedonia (Acts xix. 22), was with him when the Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written (2 Cor. i. 1), and accompanied him back to Asia from Corinth (Acts xx. 5).

We have no other notices of Timothy till Paul's first imprisonment, when we find him with the apostle at Rome (Col. i. 1; Phil. i. 1; Philem. 1). The remaining facts of his life are drawn from the pastoral epistles and Heb. xiii. 23. After Paul's first Roman imprisonment, Timothy seems to have moved from Philippi (Phil. ii. 19-23) to Ephesus. In his first letter to Timothy, Paul urges him to oppose false theological and ascetic tendencies in the Ephesian Church (1 Tim. i. 3 sqq.). Timothy himself seems to have given way to the false theology and asceticism (1 Tim. iv. 7, 8, v. 23, etc.). Paul expresses in this epistle the hope that he might visit Timothy at Ephesus. He seems not to have realized his expectations; and from his second imprisonment at Rome, and in the near prospect of death, he wrote the Second Epistle to Timothy, who was still at Ephesus (2 Tim. i. 18, iv. 12, 13). The earnest admonitions of this document (2 Tim. i. 8, 13, ii. 3, iv. 1, 2, 5, etc.) seem to indicate that Timothy had departed somewhat from his early faith; but the cordial invitation for him to come to Rome attests Paul's unchanged affection. If Hebrews was written after Paul's death, and by Luke, which seems probable, then Timothy complied with the apostle's wish, and shared with him a part of the second Roman imprisonment (Heb. xiii. 23).

According to tradition (EUSEB. iii. 4; Const. Apost. vii. 46; NICENORUS: Hist. Eccl. iii. 11), Timothy was the first bishop of Ephesus, and suffered a martyr's death under Domitian. For his life, see the commentaries on 1 and 2 Timothy.

TINDAL, Matthew, a distinguished English deist; was b. at Beer Ferrers, Devonshire, about 1657; d. in London, Aug. 16, 1733. He studied at Lincoln and Exeter colleges, Oxford, took his degree in 1676, and was made fellow of All-Souls. Under James II. he joined the Roman-Catholic Church, but returned to the Church of England soon after. His principal work, — Christianity as Old as the Creation, or the Gospel a Replication of the Law of Nature, — which appeared in 1730, when the author was seventy years old, marks the culminating point of the deist controversy. The second volume of this work was withheld by Bishop Gibson, to whom the author had intrusted the manuscript. "It has not the force of style or the weight of thought which could secure a permanent place in literature," says Leslie Stephen (History of English Thought, i. 135). It asserts that none of the real truths of Christianity required a revelation. The law of God is unalterable and perfect, and was communicated to the first members of the human family. He attacked the religion of the Old Testament, ridiculed the command of circumcision and sacrifices as implying a low and unworthy conception of God, and laid great stress upon the inconsistencies of the patriarchs, the wars of extermination, etc. Conybeare, James Foster, Leland, and others attacked Tindal's work; and it was to it, more than to any other, that Bishop Butler's Analogy was meant to be a reply. Tindal's other works are, The Rights of the Christian Church Asserted, an attack upon High-Church assumptions (1706), and some pamphlets. See LECHLER: Deismus; FARRAR: Critical History of Free Thought, London and New York, 1863 (lect. iv.); LESLIE STEPHEN: History of English Thought, 2d ed., New York, 1881, 2 vols. (i. pp. 134-163).

TISCHENDORF, Lobegott (Ænotheus) Friedrich Constantin, b. Jan. 18, 1815, at Lengenfeld in Saxony; d. Dec. 7, 1874, at Leipzig. Tischendorf was the ninth child of his father, who, by birth a Thuringian, served as village physician and apothecary at Lengenfeld in the Saxon Vogtland. Leaving the village school in 1829, he entered the gymnasium at Plauen, and in 1834, at Easter, aged nineteen, he was matriculated at the university of Leipzig. At school he had been remarkable for his diligence and for his poetical gifts, and the evidences of both have been seen by the writer in the school-records. He was known among his fellow-pupils as somewhat reserved, and as by no means unconscious of his own merits. The influence of Gottfried Hermann and of Georg Benedikt Winer<sup>1</sup> inspired classical and sacred research at that time in the university of Leipzig, and found in Tischendorf a ready disciple. In the autumn of 1836 he took a prize medal for an essay upon the Doctrine of the Apostle Paul as to the Value of Christ's Death as a Satisfaction, and this essay was published in 1837. This, his first scientific publication, was followed at Christmas by a collection of poems which showed no little evidence of a fine imaginative faculty; but his lyric talents were put into the shade by his work upon texts, and he rarely did more in later years than write an occasional verse at a birthday or other family festival. Easter, 1838, brought him a second prize medal for an essay upon Christ the Bread of Life; and he became a doctor of philosophy. Teaching at a school near Leipzig, for his future father-in-law, Pastor Zehme of Gross-Stadteln, he made a brief journey through Southern Germany and Switzerland, visiting also Strassburg, and then, returning to Leipzig, he began to prepare an edition of the Greek New Testament. It should be distinctly observed, that Tischendorf appears to have made Lachmann his guide for the line of his work, not merely in so far as he followed, to a certain extent, Lachmann's example in discarding the so-called textus receptus, but even in particular points. We need only refer to the first striking success of Tischendorf, — the publication of the Parisian palimpsest, the Codex Ephraemi, and then to his edition of the Codex Claromontanus, the publication of both of which Lachmann had called for in 1830, declaring that Parisian scholars could win immortal honors by it. The young German did what Paris failed to do. Lachmann, however, spoke most slightly of Tischendorf's first New Testament; and Tischendorf seems, only a short time before his death, to have recovered that impartial balance of mind necessary to do full justice to his great predecessor.

Reaching the opening of his academical career with his habilitation as privatdozent, in October, 1840, and issuing his first Greek New Testament with the date 1841, he left in the same month for Paris, where he remained until January, 1843, save a visit to Holland in the autumn of 1841, and to England at the close of the summer of 1842. At Paris, not to mention a Protestant and a Catholic edition of the Greek New Testament, or his collations of Philo and of the sixtieth book of the Basilicas, his chief work was the deciphering the above-mentioned Codex Ephraemi, a biblical manuscript which had been erased, and re-written with the works of Ephraem Syrus. Tischendorf did not spoil the manuscript with chemicals: that was done by the librarians while he was a school-boy at Plauen. From Paris he sped to Rome, only delaying at Basel to collate E<sup>67</sup>; and he remained in Italy about a year, working diligently at the uncial manuscripts of the Bible. But the best one, the Codex Vaticanus, was denied to him, because Mai had an edition under way; and it was only after the personal intervention of the Pope that he received permission to use it for three hours each, on two days, and to make a facsimile. He looked, however, with eagerness towards the East, and was so fortunate as to succeed in his plans for a journey thither.

On March 12, 1844, he sailed from Livorno for Alexandria, whence he proceeded to Cairo; and after examining the manuscripts in the Cairo monastery of Mount Sinai, and visiting the Coptic monasteries of the Libyan Desert, he started for Sinai on May 12, and reached it by the 24th, remaining until June 1. Here he discovered the forty-three leaves of the Codex Frederico-Augustanus, now at Leipzig, which are a part of the famous Codex Sinaiticus: the leaves of it that he was not allowed to bring with him were the incitement to his later Eastern journeys. With a glance at Palestine, Constantinople, and Patmos, he passed through Vienna and Munich, and reached Leipzig in January, 1845, well supplied with treasures. He married Miss Angelika Zehme on Sept. 18, 1845. During this and the next few years he published the Old-Testament part of the Codex Ephraemi, the facsimile of the Codex Frederico-Augustanus, the Monumenta Sacra Inedita, with fragments of seven New-Testament manuscripts, his two volumes of travels in the East, and the Codex Palatinus. He visited London, Paris, and Oxford again in 1849, and in the same year published a new edition of the Greek New Testament, with increased critical apparatus. The year 1850 dates the edition of the Codex Amiatinus, and his ordinary honorary professorship, and his edition of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament; while the next year saw the issue of his essay upon the origin and use of the Apocryphal Gospels, of his edition of the Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, and of his Synopsis of the Gospels; and in 1852 the Codex Claromontanus appeared.

His second Eastern journey, in 1853, failed in its chief intention, namely, the recovery of the rest of the leaves of the Codex Friderico-Augustanus, but supplied him with a number of manuscripts in various languages, which now adorn the shelves of the libraries at Oxford, London, St. Petersburg, and Leipzig. The holidays of 1854, 1855, and 1856, were used for collations at Wolfenbüttel and Hamburg, at London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and at Munich, St. Gallen, and Zürich. A new collection of his Monumenta Sacra Inedita appeared in 1855, and this ran into a series not yet completed. A famous controversy took place, in the following year, about the forgeries of a sharp Greek named Simonides, who tried to sell his productions as old manuscripts. Simonides was arrested at Leipzig on Feb. 1. The large amount of material gathered together during these years was presented in a compact form, in his "seventh larger critical edition" of the Greek New Testament, which began to appear in 1856, and was completed at Christmas in 1858. Up to that date no edition had offered such a mass of valuable various readings.

After long effort, Tischendorf succeeded in gaining from the Russian Government the necessary pecuniary support, and the scarcely less valuable moral support, of the Russian emperor, for a new Eastern journey; and he left Leipzig on Jan. 5, 1859, reaching Sinai on the 31st. He searched in vain for the desired leaves. But on the afternoon of Feb. 4 the steward of the monastery called his attention to a manuscript which he had laid away; and to Tischendorf's joy it proved not merely to contain the leaves left behind in 1844, but also a large number of other leaves, containing the New Testament, Barnabas, and part of Hermas. Tischendorf, almost beside himself with joy and thankfulness, spent much of the night in copying the then unique Barnabas, completing it and the fragment of Hermas before he left the monastery on Feb. 7. The prior had gone to Cairo, where Tischendorf found him on the 11th; and at his order a sheik brought the manuscript to Cairo by Feb. 23. Aided by two Germans, he copied it quire by quire, as it was loaned to him. After many delays incident to the election of a new archbishop, he received permission to carry the original to Europe to edit it, and, if the monastery so decided, to give it to the emperor. This year (1859) is the date of Tischendorf's ordinary or full professorship. The Codex Sinaiticus appeared in four large folio volumes in 1862; the New-Testament part, in a quarto volume, in 1863, and somewhat modified, in octavo, in 1865.

The following years were broken by journeys to England, to Italy, and to St. Petersburg. In 1865 appeared the first edition of his work upon the date of the Gospels: When were our Gospels written? and this was speedily replaced by new editions; while Danish, Dutch, English, French, Italian, Russian, Swedish, and Turkish translations scattered the book abroad. He published in 1867 an edition of the New-Testament part of the Codex Vaticanus, and an appendix to the Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, and Alexandrinus. During this time, however, beginning with 1864, he had been issuing the "eighth larger critical edition" of his Greek New Testament; and the last part of the text with the critical apparatus appeared in 1872. He was filled with plans for a new journey to the East, and he had prepared already for a voyage to America to attend the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York; but upon May 5, 1873, he was disabled by a stroke of apoplexy, and never recovered sufficient power to work again. He died on Dec. 7, 1874, and was buried in the new cemetery at Leipzig. Five of his eight children are daughters; the eldest son, Paul Andreas, is second dragoman in the German embassy at Constantinople; the second, Johannes, is a lawyer, at present attached to the Imperial Law Office at Berlin; the third, Immanuel, is a physician, at present assisting a professor at Kiel.

Tischendorf was a man of unusual mental ability and diligence. His services to biblical students cannot easily be over-estimated and will be more and more gratefully acknowledged as the increase of distance in time removes the observer from the influence of that prejudice against him due to his estimate of himself. His editions of the New Testament, culminating in the eighth, are very valuable for the text presented, and still more for the vast amount of material which they place at the disposal of the student of the text; and the comparative agreement of Tregelles and of Westcott and Hort with him shows that his critical judgment was of a high order. A list of his works may be found in the writer's article in Biblioth. Sacra (And., January, 1876, pp. 183-193), and in the Prolegomena to his N. T. Gr. ed. VIII. crit. mai., now approaching completion (Leipzig, 1887, pp. 7-22). CASPAR RENÉ GREGORY.

TITHES. Down to the seventeenth century it was generally held that all tithes, without exception, had been introduced by the Church on the basis of the Mosaic law, and had only been confirmed and extended by the State. The investigations, however, of Selden, Hugo Grotius, and others, proved that tithes (decima) were also known to the Roman law, and had in many cases been introduced from it into the economical organization of the mediæval state. Any one who obtained a part of the public land (ager publicus) in a conquered country paid a tenth of the revenue he derived from it as a rent to the State, and generally he transferred this system of rent to the colonists he settled on the soil. Nevertheless, when speaking of tithes as part of the ecclesiastical organization, they had, no doubt, their origin chiefly in the Church, which, again, had borrowed the institution from the Synagogue.

It was an old custom, older than Moses, to offer up one-tenth of one's income as a sacrifice to God (Gen. xiv. 20). Moses himself ordered (Num. xviii. 21) that the Levites should be paid for their service in the sanctuary from the tithes which were paid by the other Israelites, and which, properly speaking, belonged to Jehovah (Lev. xxvii. 30-33), and that one-tenth of those tithes should be set apart for the Aaronic priests. After the exile, these prescripts, as the Mosaic law in general, were enforced with the greatest strictness, and from the Synagogue the whole arrangement was transferred to the Church. When the epistles of the apostles never mention tithes, the reason is simply, that in their time the voluntary offerings of the members still sufficed for the wants of the church. But complaints arose as soon as the zeal began to grow lukewarm (Cyprian: De unitate ecclesiæ, 23). In the East, all soon agreed in demanding the introduction of tithes in accordance with the prescripts of the Old Testament (comp. Constit. Apostol., ii. 25, 35, vii. 29, viii. 30; Can. Apostol. 4, 5), and in the West, Jerome and Augustine spoke in favor of the same idea. It was recommended by the Second Council of Tours, 567 (Hardouin: Coll. Concil., iii. 368), and commanded, under penalty of excommunication, by the Second Council of Macon, 585 (Bruno: Concil. Matiscon., ii. 5). Even the confessional was used to enforce the decree. Not to pay tithes was represented as a sin (see Penitentialē Theodori, in Wasserschleben; Bussordnungen, Halle, 1851). During the Carolingian age the institution became firmly established in the Frankish Empire; that is, in France and Germany. Charlemagne imposed it upon even the newly converted Saxons (see Capitulare Pauli-bridun. of 785). At the same time tithes were introduced in England, first in Mercia by Offa, and then throughout the Saxon dominion by Ethelwolf. In Portugal and Denmark they were introduced in the eleventh century; in Sweden, in the thirteenth.

Partly on account of the different origin, and partly under the influence of social circumstances, there soon developed different kinds of tithes. There are secular and ecclesiastical tithes (decimæ seculares, or ecclesiasticæ); the former having been established for some secular purpose, the latter for the benefit of the Church. There are also lay and clerical tithes (decimæ laicales, or clericales); the former being in the possession of a layman, the latter in the possession of a clergyman. By freedom of buying and selling, it was quite natural that secular tithes should come into the possession of clergymen, and ecclesiastical tithes into the possession of laymen; though the latter kind of proprietorship was never recognized by the Church. Gregory VII. spoke of laymen's holding ecclesiastical tithes as a crime, and later popes repeated the idea. There are finally personal and real tithes (decimæ personales, or reales); the former paid from the income of some profession or trade, the latter from the income of some kind of real estate. The latter are again divided into decimæ prediales, from grain, wine, fruit, and other products of the soil, and decimæ animalium, from the products of the flock and the poultry-yard: this division, however, is nearly identical with that into decimæ majores and decimæ minores. With the Reformation the tithing-system was not immediately abolished: on the contrary, in most places it was retained for the support of the evangelical Church, as it had been established for the support of the Roman-Catholic Church. Luther spoke in favor of it (see Werke, edition Walch, x. 1006, and xvii. 46, 85). Even the peasants, during the peasant wars, were willing to pay tithes (see Oechsle: Geschichte des Bauernkriegs, Heilbronn, 1830). Nevertheless, in course of time there arose a strong opposition to the system, partly from reasons of political economy, and partly from antipathy to the Church; and in France it was entirely swept away by a decree of the National Assembly of 1789. In other countries, tithes were not absolutely abolished, but commuted into a fixed annual sum of money, — a form which in some cases has found favor with even the Roman curia. TITHES AMONG THE HEBREWS (תִּשְׁבּוּת, dekāth, "a tenth"). Not only the Hebrews, but other ancient peoples, devoted the tenth part of their produce, cattle, or booty, to sacred purposes. The Phœnicians and Carthaginians sent to the Tyrian Hercules yearly a tithe (Diod. Sic. xx. 14); the Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod., i. 89), as also the Greeks (especially to Apollo) and the Romans (to Hercules) applied a tenth to the gods. These, however, were voluntary rather than obligatory offerings. The Mosaic law of tithes was not an innovation, but a confirmation of a patriarchal practice. The earliest instances of tithes in the Old Testament are Abraham's offering of a tenth of the spoil to Melchisedec (Gen. xiv. 20), and Jacob's devotion of a tenth of his property (Gen. xxviii. 22). The tithed objects consisted of the fruits of the ground and cattle. The cattle were selected by the practice of having them pass under the rod (Lev. xxvii. 32); the tenth one being set apart, no matter whether it were bad or good, blemished or unblemished. The Talmud ordains that only the cattle born during the year, and not those that were bought, or received as presents, were to be tithed, and that, unless ten animals were born, there should be no offering. According to the Talmud, the sheep were tithed as they passed out of an enclosure, the tenth being touched with a rod steeped in vermilion. The alleged contradiction of the rules in Deuteronomy to those of Leviticus and Numbers cannot be made out. If Deuteronomy only prescribes vegetable tithes, and enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company, these injunctions are to be regarded as a development of the previous rules (Winer); or the omission of reference to the tithal feast in Leviticus and Numbers is to be looked upon as due to the fact that its existence was taken for granted by them (Michaelis, Hengstenberg, Keil, etc.).

The principal tithal rules are as follows. (1) The tenth part of the fruits of the earth and cattle were given to the Levites, who received it as a compensation for their want of an inheritance, and might eat it at their several places of abode (Num. xviii. 21). (2) The Levites must give one-tenth part of this tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 26): this latter portion after the exile (Neh. x. 38), and perhaps before (2 Chron. xxxi. 12), had to be delivered at Jerusalem. (3) A second tenth was eaten at the tabernacle, at a joyous feast (Deut. xiv. 22 sq.); the offerers, if they were ceremonially clean, and the Levites, joining therein. In case the distance was so great as to make the transportation of the tenth part inexpedient, it might be converted into money, and the money used again in the purchase of the necessary vegetables and meat for the feast (Deut. xiv. 25, 26). (4) Every third year this tithal feast was celebrated by the people at their homes (Deut. xxvi. 12); the Levites, stranger, fatherless, and widows being invited thereto.

The tithes were considerably neglected after the exile (Neh. xiii. 10; Mal. iii. 8, 10); and, at the later period of Roman rule, high priests often laid violent hands on the priestly tithes (Joseph., Ant. XX. 8, 8; 9, 2). The Pharisees, on the other hand, insisted upon the tithal rules as conditions of righteousness, and entered upon a casuistical and minute application of them. Our Lord refers to their particular care in this regard (Matt. xxiii. 23).

TITTMANN, Johann August Heinrich, a distinguished German theologian of moderate rationalistic tendencies; was b. in Langensalza, Aug. 1, 1773; d. in Leipzig, Dec. 30, 1831. He studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was made professor of theology at the latter university. His principal works were, Institutio symbolica ad sententiam eccles. evangel., 1811, Ueber Supranaturalismus, Rationalismus u. Atheismus, 1816, and an edition of the Symbolical Books, 1817.

TITULAR BISHOP, same as Bishop in partibus. See EPISCOPUS IN PARTIBUS.

TITUS, the "fellow-helper" of Paul; a Gentile (Gal. ii. 3); was probably one of Paul's converts (Tit. i. 4), but was never circumcised (Gal. ii. 3). He is not mentioned in the Acts, and first appears in connection with the apostle on his journey to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1-3). We next find him at Ephesus during Paul's third missionary journey. Paul sent him thence, with a companion, on a mission to Corinth (2 Cor. vii. 14, xii. 18). After meeting Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 6), he was sent again to Corinth (2 Cor. viii. 6, 16-24). Our next information about Titus is found in Paul's Epistle to him. At the time the apostle wrote, Titus was in Crete (Tit. i. 5), where the apostle had left him after his release from the first Roman imprisonment. Titus was with Paul in the second Roman imprisonment, and left him to go to Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10). According to tradition (Euseb., III. 4; Constitutiones Apostolicæ, vii. 46; Hieronymus on Tit. ii. 7; Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii.), Titus died as Bishop of Crete. A. KÖHLER.

TITUS, Bishop of Bostra in Arabia; a distinguished opponent of Manichæism; d., according to Jerome, in the reign of Valens. Nothing further is known of his personal history than that he came into a personal conflict with Julian the Apostate, who in a letter to him accused him of exciting the Christians to acts of violence against the heathen. This letter, which falls in the year 362, was written from Antioch. The great reputation of Titus in the early church rests upon his work against the Manichæans. Jerome mentions it twice, and speaks of its author as one of the most important church-writers of his time (Ep. 70, 4, ed. Villarsi). Sozomen (iii. 14) likewise speaks of him as one of the most distinguished men of his day. In this work, Titus denies the conceivability of two beginnings, admits the distinction of good and evil only in the moral sphere, denies that death is an evil for the good, and starts from the general proposition of Plato concerning the beauty of the world. The three books which are preserved of this work were originally known only by the Latin translation of Turrrianus, but have since been edited from a Greek manuscript at Hamburg, in the Thesaurus Canisii, and by Gallandi, in his Bibliotheca, v. 269 sqq. The Commentary on Luke and the Oratio in ramos, edited by Gallandi, and ascribed to him, are probably spurious. See TILLEMONT: Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire ecclésiastique, BAUR: *D. TOBLER, Titus, b. at Stein in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, June 25, 1806; d. Jan. 21, 1871, in Munich. He studied medicine at Zurich and Vienna, and undertook for medical purposes a journey in Palestine (1835-36): Lustreise im Morgenland, Zurich, 1839. Having become interested in the geographical and topographical investigations of the Holy Land, he made three more journeys to Palestine, the first in 1845; and as the literary results of this journey appeared, Bethlehem, St. Gall, 1849; Plan of Jerusalem, 1850; Golgotha, 1851; Die Siloahquelle und der Ölberg, 1852; Denkblätter aus Jerusalem, 1853 (2d ed., 1856); Topographie von Jerusalem und seinen Umgebungen, Berlin, 1853-54, 2 vols. After the second he published Planographie von Jerusalem, Gotha, 1858, and Dritte Wanderung nach Palästina, Gotha, 1859. In 1865 he undertook his last journey to Palestine, and published his Nazareth, Berlin, 1868. See also his Bibliographia Geographica Palestine, Leipzig, 1867, Palestinae Descriptiones ex Sæculo iv., v., et vi., Leipzig, 1869, and ex Sæculo viii., ix., xii., et xv., Leipzig, 1874. His life was written by Heim, Zürich, 1879.

TODD, Henry John, Church of England; b. about 1763; d. at Stettrington, Yorkshire, Dec. 24, 1845. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1786; rector in London; keeper of manuscripts at Lambeth Palace, 1803; rector of Stettrington, 1820; prebendary of York, 1830; archdeacon of Cleveland, 1832; and queen's chaplain. He edited Milton (1801), Spenser (1805), Johnson's Dictionary (1814); wrote Some Accounts of the Deans of Canterbury, Canterbury, 1793; Vindication of our Authorized Translation and Translators of the Bible, London, 1819; Memoirs of Rt. Rev. Brian Walton, 1821, 2 vols.; Life of Archbishop Cranmer, 1831, 2 vols.; Authentic Account of our Authorized Translation of the Bible, 1835.

TODD, James Henthorn, D.D., Irish Church; b. at Dublin, April 23, 1805; d. at Silveracre, Rathfarnham, near Dublin, June 28, 1869. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1825; fellow, 1831; Donnellan lecturer, 1838 and 1841; regius-professor of Hebrew, 1849; librarian to the University, 1852; precentor of St. Patrick's, 1861; and president of the Royal Irish Academy for five years. He wrote two courses of Donnellan lectures, viz., On the Prophecies relating to Antichrist in the Writings of Daniel and St. Paul, Dublin, 1840, ditto, in the Apocalypse of St. John, 1846; Historical Memoirs of the Successors of St. Patrick and Archbishops of Armagh, 1861, 2 vols.; Memoir of St. Patrick's Life and Mission, 1863; edited some of Wielik's writings (see literature under that art.), and greatly distinguished himself as an Irish antiquary.

TODD, John, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9, 1800; d. at Pittsfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1822; studied four years at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor in Groton, Mass., 1827 to 1833, Northampton to 1836, First Congregational Church, Philadelphia, to 1842, and Pittsfield, to 1872. He offered prayer at the driving of the last spike of the Central Pacific Railroad. He was a man of national reputation, and the author of many excellent and widely circulated books, among which may be mentioned Lectures to Children, Northampton, 1831 and 1858, 2 series (translated into French, German, Greek, etc., printed in raised letters for the blind, and used as a school-book for the liberated slaves in Sierra Leone); Student's Manual, 1835, new English edition, London, 1877; Index Rerum, 1835 (prepared for noting books read); Sabbath-school Teacher, 1836; Simple Sketches, Pittsfield, 1843, 2 vols.; Future Punishment, New York, 1863; Hints and Thoughts for Christians, 1867; Woman's Rights, 1867; The Sunset-land, or the Great Pacific Slope, 1870. A collected edition of his books appeared in London, 1853, later edition, 1879. See John Todd, the Story of his Life told mainly by Himself, New York, 1876.

TOLAND, John, a distinguished English deist; was b. near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 30, 1669; d. at Putney, March 11, 1722. He was born of Roman-Catholic parentage (was charged with being the illegitimate son of a priest), changed his original name, Janus Junius, at school, and became a Protestant at the age of sixteen. He studied at the universities of Glasgow, Edinburgh (where he graduated M.A., 1690), and Leyden, where he studied theology with a view to becoming a dissenting minister. He spent several years at Oxford, and in 1696 published his principal work, Christianity not Mysterious (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1702), which made a great sensation. The conclusions of the book are not very distinct; but the author defines that to be "mysterious" which is "above," not "contrary to," reason, and declares that Christianity contains nothing "mysterious" (that is, not before revealed). He declares himself a good Christian and a good Churchman. The book was burnt by the hangman at Dublin on Sept. 11, 1797, Toland being in the city at the time. "The Irish Parliament," says South, "to their immortal honor, sent him packing, and, without the help of a fagot, soon made the kingdom too hot for him." From this time on, he led a Bohemian life, flitting between London and the Continent; wrote some political pamphlets favoring the claims of the house of Brunswick; spent some time at Berlin in a semi-official position, and died a pensioner of Lord Molesworth. He defended his Christianity not Mysterious, in an Apology for Mr. Toland, London, 1697, and Vindicius liberius, London, 1702. He published an edition of Milton's Works, Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous, with a Life, London, 1697, 1698, 3 vols.; Amputor, or a Defence of Milton's Life, 1699 (construed into an attack upon the canon); Tetradymus, 1720; Impartial History of Servetus, 1724, etc. An historical account of his life and writings appeared in 1722, and a Life by HUNDLESTONE, Montrose, 1814. His Posthumous Works were published, London, 1726, in 2 vols., with a Life by DES MAIZEAUX. See LELAND: Dist. Writers; LUCHEER: Drismus; A. S. FARRAR: Critical History of Free Thought (lect. iv.); STEPHEN: History of English Thought, etc. (i. 101 sqq.).

TOLEDO, Councils of. The old Spanish city of Toledo (Toletum), on the Tagus, [forty-two miles south-west of Madrid, with a population to-day of eighteen thousand, and still the seat of an archbishop], early became the seat of a bishopric, and was the scene of numerous church synods. The First Council was called by Bishop Patronus, or Petruinus, of Toledo, in 400. With eighteen other bishops, he passed twenty canons against the Priscillianists. A second council was probably held there in 447, in obedience to the demand of Pope Leo the Great, that the Spanish bishops should take further measures against the Priscillianists. The bishops of four provinces constructed a creed in Toledo, in which it is to be noticed that the phrase, "proceeding from the Father and the Son" (a patri filioque procedens), occurs. In the eighteen anathemas that are appended to it are found the best materials for the knowledge of the doctrines of the Priscillianists. The Roman dominion in Spain was overthrown in the latter part of the fifth century by the West Goths, who ruled for fifty years from Toulouse as the seat of power. They were zealous Arians, but did not institute severe persecutions against the Catholics. The Second Council of Toledo (synod. Toletana II.) was held in 531 (or 527), and passed five unimportant canons. In 531 the king of the West Goths took up his residence in Toledo. This change gave to the city great importance as a civil and ecclesiastical centre. In 551 or 582 the Arian King Leuwigild held a synod of the Arian bishops in the city to take measures for the conversion of the Catholics. But the Goths, instead of converting the Catholics, were themselves converted; the Catholic bishops having full control of the people who were Catholics, and never ceasing to denounce the Gothic rulers as foreigners, barbarians, heretics, etc. King Reccared entered the Catholic Church in 589, and in the same year called the celebrated Third Council of Toledo. After three days of fasting and prayer, the assembly held its first sitting May 8, being opened by the king, who used in his address the phrase, procedit a patre et a filio ("proceedeth from the Father and the Son"). He announced, as the reason for his having convened the synod, his desire to lay down a confession of his orthodoxy. He pronounced the anathema over Arius, and expressed his acceptance of the creeds of Nicæa, Constantinople (with the addition of the statement, "proceeding from the Father and the Son"), and Chalcedon. The Goths who took part in the synod condemned Arianism in twenty-three articles. The synod also passed twenty-three articles bearing upon the administration of the church and social evils. These were signed by the king, sixty-four bishops, and seven episcopal substitutes. Leander of Seville closed the proceedings with an address.

The Fourth Council of Toledo (two local councils having been held in 597 and 610) was called by King Siseland, and convened Dec. 5, 633. Sixty-four bishops were present, and Isidore of Seville acted as president. The king, who had dethroned his predecessor Suintila, threw himself prostrate before the bishops, and with tears begged their intercession with God for himself. The synod passed seventy-five articles confirming the rights of the king, pronouncing eternal excommunication upon all who engaged in rebellion against the throne, etc. The Fifth Council of Toledo convened in 636, at the command of the King Chintila, who sought thereby to confirm his power. The Sixth Council of Toledo was summoned by the same king, in 638. Fifty-two bishops were present. All crimes against the king were declared punishable with eternal damnation. The Seventh Council of Toledo was held in 646, under Chindaswinth, who had risen to the throne by violence. In the collections of the acts of the councils, decrees about the offices of arch-deacon, presbyter, sacristan, etc., are attributed to this council, which have no connection with it whatever. The Eighth Council of Toledo was opened by King Receswinth, on Dec. 16, 653. Fifty-two bishops, twelve abbots, sixteen knights, and ten episcopal vicars, were present. The council re-affirmed the sacredness of the oath of fealty to the king, and took measures against the Jews and heretics. The Ninth Council of Toledo convened Nov. 2, 655, transacted no important business. The Tenth Council met in 556, and established the celebration of the feast of the Annunciation of Mary on Dec. 18. The Eleventh Council of Toledo was called by King Wamba in 675, took measures against the licentiousness of the priests, and recommended them to study the Bible assiduously. In 681 Erwig, who had come to the throne by intrigue, called the Twelfth Council of Toledo, in order to have his claims to power confirmed by the hierarchy. New measures were determined upon for the suppression of the remainders of heathenism. The Thirteenth Council of Toledo, consisting of forty-eight bishops, twenty-seven episcopal substitutes, several abbots, and twenty-six civil lords, was convened Nov. 4, 653. Again all are threatened with an endless anathema who make any attempt upon the person of the king or queen. At the Fourteenth Council, in 684, Monothelitism and Apollinarianism were condemned. The Fifteenth Council was held in St. Peter's and St. Paul's Church, 688, with sixty-one bishops present, and refused to change the expression voluntas genuit voluntatem of the preceding synod, which Benedict II. had condemned. It also defended, as against the Pope, the proposition that in Christ there were three substances or natures. The Sixteenth Council of Toledo was convened May 2, 693, with fifty-nine bishops present. The licentiousness of the priests (sodomy, etc.), and the worship of trees, stones, etc., were condemned; and it was ordered that every day of the year (Good Friday excepted) mass should be celebrated in every church for the king and his family. The Seventeenth Council was opened Nov. 9, 694; the occasion for it being a conspiracy against the king, in which the Jews were said to have had the principal part. It was ordered that the Jews should be deprived of their property, and with their wives and children put under the protection of Christians as slaves: Jewish maidens were to marry Christian men; and Jewish men, Christian maidens. The Eighteenth and last Council of Toledo was held probably in 701. Its decrees are lost. Soon after its adjournment the kingdom of the West Goths succumbed to the Mohammedans, and for several centuries the Spanish Church had no opportunity to hold synods.

Looking over the history of the councils of Toledo, we find that the right was conceded to the king of calling and opening the synods, and authorizing their decrees. Civil affairs were adjudicated as well as ecclesiastical matters, and the prime occasion of many of the synods was the settlement of some question concerning the crown. The synods had become parliaments. The metropolitan of Toledo secured great power, but was not regarded as the primate of the Spanish Church. See CENNI: De antiq. eccles. Hispaniæ; HEFFEL: Conciliengeschichte; [GAMS: Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, 1862 sqq.] ALBRECHT VOGEL.

TOLEDOTH JESHU (תלדות ישו, "generations [i.e., history] of Jesus"), a Jewish apocryphon of the middle age, made up of "fragmentary Talmudic legends," which pretends to be a life of Jesus, but is in reality a clumsy and stupid fiction. Its author is unknown. Luther shows up the book in his usual vigorous style in his Schem Hamphoras. There are two widely different recensions of it. Wagenseil published a Latin translation of one in his Tela Ignea Satanae, Altdorf, 1681; and Huldreich of the other, in his Historia Jeschue Nazareni a Juda is blasphemè corrupta, Leyden, 1705. According to the first, Jesus was born B.C. 106-79; according to the second, B.C. 70-4. TOLET, Francis, a learned Jesuit writer upon ethics and casuistry, and exegete; was b. in Cordova, Oct. 12, or Nov. 10, 1532; d. at Rome, Sept. 14, 1596. After studying at Salamanca, he became professor there of philosophy, and was transferred to Rome, where he acted in the same capacity. A succession of popes held him in the highest esteem, and employed him in diplomatic offices. Clement VIII. made him cardinal, he being the first Jesuit to receive this honor. Six-tus V. and Clement VIII. appointed him one of the laborers upon the new edition of the Vulgate. Among Tolet's numerous commentaries and philosophical works are Introd. in dialecticam Aristotelis, Rome, 1561; Instructio sacerdotum de septem peccatis mortalibus, Rome, 1601, which was translated into French and Spanish, and has frequently appeared under the title Summa casuum conscientie.

TOMBES, John, b. at Beaudley, Worcestershire, 1603; d. at Salisbury, May 22, 1676. He was graduated M.A. at Oxford, 1624; entered holy orders; soon became famous for his preaching, especially among the Puritans, and was successively lecturer at St. Martin's, Oxford, preacher at Worcester, 1630, shortly afterwards at Leominster (Lemster), and 1641 at Bristol; master of the Temple, London, 1647; preacher at Beaudley, 1647. In Beaudley he had for his near neighbor Richard Baxter at Kidderminster. Each had his numerous admirers, many of whom made a long journey each week to hear his favorite. Between Tombes and Baxter there was incessant controversy, especially upon infant baptism and church polity. In 1653 Tombes was appointed one of the friers for the approbation of public ministers, and removed to London. In 1658 he married a rich widow, and retired from pastoral duties. He conformed at the Restoration, and lived out his days in quietness and prosperity. He was a vigorous, learned, and unwearied opponent of infant baptism. He had public debates upon this topic with Baxter and others, and wrote numerous treatises upon it. For a list of his writings and further account of the man, see Wood: Athen. Oxon. (ed. Bliss), iii. 1062-1067. Of his writings may be mentioned, Two treatises and an appendix to them concerning Infant Baptism, London, 1645; Apology for two treatises, 1646; Anti-pædobaptism, 1652, 1654, 1657, 3 parts; Seplensheba, or the oath-book, 1662; Saints no smiters, shewing the doctrine of Fifth-Monarchy men to be antichristian, 1664; Emmanuel, concerning the two natures in Christ, 1669; Animalversiones in librum G. Bulli, Harmonia apostolica, 1676.

TOMLINE, George, D.D., Church of England; b. at Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, Oct. 9, 1750; d. at Winchester, Nov. 14, 1827. Graduated at Cambridge, he was successively rector of Corwen (1782), prebend of St Peter's, Westminster (1784), rector of Sudbury-cum-Offord, Suffolk (1785), bishop of Lincoln, with the deanery of St. Paul's (January, 1787), and finally bishop of Winchester (July, 1820). His family name was Petyman, but he changed his own name to Tomline in order to inherit a considerable fortune. He left two hundred thousand pounds. He is best known by his Elements of Christian Theology, London, 1799, 2 vols. (14th ed., 1843; vol. i. separately printed as Introduction to the Study of the Bible; new ed., 1876); Refutation of the Charge of Calvinism against the Church of England, 1811; Memoirs of Pitt, 1821.

TONQUES, Gift of, a phenomenon of the apostolic age, technically known as the "glossolalia." It first showed itself in Jerusalem, upon Pentecost (Acts ii. 4), but was repeated in other places (x. 46, xix. 6; 1 Cor. xii., xiv.). Paul, in the passages last cited, gives a full description of it. But it has been questioned whether the "glossolalia" of Pentecost was identical with that at Casarea, Ephesus, and Corinth. The true view seems to be that it was; viz., an "act of worship, and not of teaching. With only a slight difference in the medium of interpretation, it was at once internally interpreted and applied by the Holy Spirit himself to those hearers who believed and were converted, to each in his own vernacular dialect; while in Corinth the interpretation was made either by the speaker in tongues, or by one endowed with the gift of interpretation." It was not a speaking in foreign languages; for, as a matter of fact, only Greek and Hebrew were requisite for the apostles' work, and these they already knew. It had nothing to do directly with the spread of the gospel. It was an act of self-devotion, emotional rather than intellectual, excited rather than calm. If one was not in a similar condition, the glossolalia was like the incoherent talk of a drunken man.

How long the phenomenon lasted, it is impossible to say, but probably not longer than the apostolic age. In later times analogies have been found for it in the "speaking in tongues" of the Camisards, Prophets of the Cevennes, early Quakers and Methodists, Mormons, "Läsare" in Sweden (1841-43), converts in the Irish revival of 1859, and particularly in the Catholic Apostolic (Irvingite) Church.

Other explanations of the glossolalia are: (1) It was a mistake of the narrators there was no such phenomenon — this is the rationalistic explanation; (2) It was a mistake of the hearers, they only imagined it; (3) It was speaking in archaic and foreign forms of speech; (4) It was the language of heaven or of paradise; (5) It was a permanent miraculous endowment with a knowledge of those foreign tongues in which the apostles were to preach the gospel; (6) It was a temporary speaking in foreign languages, and ended with the Day of Pentecost.

See Lit. in SCHAFF: History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., N.Y., vol. i., 1882, p. 221, and his note Glossolalia, pp. 231-242.

TONSURE, The, denotes the practice of the Roman-Catholic and Greek churches, by which a portion of the skull of the priests is shaven. It precedes the consecration to clerical orders, and is a specific mark of distinction between the clergy and the laity (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 6). He who has once received the tonsure must always retain it. It may be conferred upon candidates in their seventh year, but in this case they may not exercise spiritual functions till they are fourteen years old (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 3). The tonsure is regarded as a symbol of Christ's crown of thorns, the regal dignity of the priesthood, and the renunciation of the world, and is sometimes based upon Acts xxi. 24, 26, 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15. It is held that Paul and Peter practised it. It is an historical fact, that, in the fourth century, neither monks nor priests practised the tonsure [so also Wetzer and Welte]. The cutting of the beard, and hair of the head, was forbidden by the Council of Carthage (398); and Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xliv., says that the Christian priest was not to appear with shorn head, lest he be confounded with the priests of Isis and Serapis, and other heathen divinities. The custom of cutting the hair at first prevailed among the penitent, and was taken up by the monks in the fifth century. They shaved the hair down to the skin; and this practice was considered symbolical of penitence. From the sixth century on, the priests followed the practice. Three principal styles of tonsure have prevailed. The Roman tonsure consists of the shaving of the entire skull, except a ring of hair extending all around the head. According to tradition, Peter's tonsure was of this kind. The synod of Toledo, in 633, decreed this style for Spain. The extent of the shaven part was gradually diminished; but the synod of Placentia (1388) ordered that it should be at least four fingers broad. The Greek tonsure, also called "the tonsure of Paul," consists in shaving the fore-part of the skull entirely bare. The Keltic or British tonsure, called also "the tonsure of James or Simon Magnus," consists in shaving the head bare in front of a line drawn across the skull from ear to ear. [The style of the tonsure formed a subject of most violent controversy in England after the arrival of Augustine and his monks, until the final victory of the Roman type of Christianity over the old Keltic Church in the eighth century.]

The tonsure is conferred by the bishops, cardinal priests, and abbots (Conc. Trid., xxiii. 10). The Pope may also vest the right in priests. [See BEDE: Historia Ecclesiastica, iv. 1; MARTÈNE: De antiq. eccl. rit.; art. "Tonsur," in WETZER U. WELTE.] NEUDECKER.

TOPLADY, Augustus Montague, was b. at Farnham in Surrey, Nov. 1, 1740; and d. in London, Aug. 11, 1778. He was "awakened" in a barn in Ireland, 1755, and "led into a full and clear view of the doctrines of grace," 1758. He was ordained 1762, and was vicar of Broad Hem-bury, Devonshire, from 1765 till his death. He published The Church of England vindicated from the Charge of Arminianism (1771, 2 vols.) and some sermons, besides many articles in the Gospel Magazine. His works appeared in six volumes, 1825. They are filled with the most advanced doctrine and the most conscientiously acrimonious controversy.

His intellect was precocious. In 1759, at the age of nineteen, he issued in Dublin Poems on Sacred Subjects, pp. 156. His later hymns add to these but one-third of their bulk, but include his most important compositions. No reliable edition of his entire verses existed prior to that of D. Sedgwick, 1860. His Psalms and Hymns, 1776, contained but few of his own.

As to Toplady's talent and earnestness there are not two opinions. Montgomery's remark, that "he evidently kindled his poetic torch at that of his contemporary, Charles Wesley," means merely that he could not be insensible to Wesley's example and influence. So similar were their gifts, that their hymns can be distinguished only by the dominant emotionalism of one, and the severer doctrinal tone of the other. Agreeing in every thing else, difference of opinion as to the Decrees made and kept them the worst of friends. "Mr. John Wesley," said Toplady in a sermon, "is the only opponent I ever had whom I chastised with a studious disregard to ceremony. . . I only gave him the whip, when he deserved a scorpion." "They have defended their dear Decrees," retorted Wesley in his

Arminian Magazine, "with arguments worthy of Bedlam, and language worthy of Billingsgate." Yet Toplady took near half his collection from these "blind Arminians," and has frequently received credit for some of their best. His own poetry was better than his polemic, and has often "a peculiarly ethereal spirit." Some of his hymns are heavily weighted with divinity; but his "Rock of Ages" is one of the best and most popular hymns in any language. For sketch, see Bishop RYLE: Christian Leaders of a Hundred Years Ago, London, 1869.

F. M. BIRD.

TORQUEMADA (TURRECREMATA), the name of two distinguished Spanish ecclesiastics. — I. Juan de, b. in Valladolid, 1388, educated there and in Paris; was appointed (1431) by Eugenius IV. "master of the holy palace," sent by him to the Council of Basel, and made cardinal in 1439. He wrote De conceptione deiparæ Mariæ, libri viii. (Rome, 1547, ed. with preface and notes, by Dr. E. B. Pusey, Lond., 1869, etc.), and died at Rome, Sept. 26, 1468. See LEDERER: Der spanische Cardinal Johann von Torquemada, sein Leben u. seine Schriften, Freiburg-im-Br., 1879. — II. Thomas de, the famous inquisitor, was b. at Valladolid, 1420; d. at Avila, Sept. 16, 1498. He belonged to the order of St. Dominic, and gave himself up wholly to the organization of the Spanish Inquisition, and overcame the scruples of Isabella. It was at the request of Ferdinand and herself that the "Holy Office" of the Inquisition was created by Sixtus IV., Nov. 1, 1478. When this Pope determined to appoint an inquisitor-general, the appointment fell on Torquemada (1482). The laws and methods of the Spanish Inquisition were his work. The laws appeared in Madrid, 1576, with the title Copilacion de las instrucciones del officio de la santa inquisicion, hechas por el muy reverendo senior Fray Thomas de Torquemada, etc. It was due largely to him that the large sum offered by the Jews was not accepted by Ferdinand, and that they were expelled from Spain in 1492. Torquemada's name has become synonymous with cold-blooded cruelty. LONGFELLOW has a fine poem on the subject; and PRES-COTT has given a picture of him in his Ferdinand and Isabella. See INQUISITION.

TORREY, Joseph, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Rowley, Mass., Feb. 2, 1797; d. at Burlington, Vt., Nov. 26, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; pastor at Royalton, Vt., 1819-27; professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Vermont, 1827-42; and of intellectual and moral philosophy from 1842 till his death. He was president of the university from 1863 to 1865. He edited the Remains of President James Marsh, 1843, the Select Sermons of President Worthington Smith, 1861, prefacing each volume with a carefully prepared Memoir; wrote A Theory of Fine Art (lectures, New York, 1874); but his greatest service was his masterly translation of Neander's General History of the Christian Religion and Church, Boston, 12th ed., 1881, 5 vols., with model index volume.

TOSSANUS, Petrus (Pierre Toussaint), b. at Saint-Laurent, Lorraine, in 1499; d. at Mûmpelgard in 1573. He studied theology at Cologne, Basel, Paris, and Rome, and was made a canon at the Cathedral of Metz. But, when the persecutions against the Protestants began, he fled to Basel, and formally embraced the Reformation. Two attempts he made to propagate his views in France (at Metz and in Paris) ended with imprisonment; but in 1539 he was by the Duke of Wurtemberg made superintendent of Mumpelgard, where he introduced the Reformation, not without great difficulties, however, as he was a Calvinist, and the duke a Lutheran.

TOULMIN, Joshua, D.D., English Unitarian; b. in London, May 11, 1740; d. at Birmingham, July 23, 1815. He was a Baptist minister at Taunton, 1765; but, becoming a Unitarian, he was one of Dr. Priestley's successors at Birmingham. He was the author of several books, of which may be mentioned, Memoirs of Faustus Socinus, London, 1777; Review of Life of John Biddle, 1789; History of the Town of Taunton, Taunton, 1791; Biographical Tribute to Dr. Priestley, London, 1801; Memoirs of Samuel Bourne, 1809; Historical View of the Protestant Dissenters in England under King William, 1814; and edited, with Life, NEAL'S History of the Puritans, 1794-97, 5 vols., the basis of all subsequent editions.

TOULOUSE, Synods of. Many ecclesiastical councils have been held in Toulouse, some of which are important. At the suggestion of Louis, a synod was convened in Toulouse, probably in 829. The decrees are lost. One was held in 883 to adjust the complaint which Jews had made to King Carlmann, of being abused by clergy and laity. One in 1056, summoned by Pope Victor II., consisted of eighteen bishops, and passed thirteen canons forbidding simony, insisting upon the rule of celibacy, and placing the age of ordination to priests' orders at thirty, and to deacons' orders at twenty-five. The synod of 1118 was concerned with the inception of a crusade against the Moors in Spain. The synod which Pope Calixtus II. presided over in person reiterated the laws against simony, confirmed the right of the bishops to tithes, etc. The synod of 1161, at which the kings of France and England, and legates of Pope Alexander III. and his rival, Victor III., were present, declared Alexander pope, and pronounced excommunication upon Victor. The synod of 1219 forbade the conferment of offices upon heretics, and forbade all work upon church-festival days which are mentioned by name.

The synod of 1229, in the pontificate of Gregory IX., is important. It obligated archbishops and bishops, or priests, and two or three laymen, to bind themselves by oath to search out heretics, and bring them to punishment. A heretic's house was to be destroyed. Penitent heretics were to be obliged to wear a cross on their right and left side, and might not receive an office until the Pope or his legate should attest the purity of his faith. All men of fourteen years and over, and all women of twelve years and over, were to be required to deny all connection with heresy and heretics. This oath was to be repeated every two years. Laymen were also forbidden the possession of the Old and New Testament; and the suppression of vernacular translations was especially commended. In 1590 a Council of Toulouse declared the Tridentine Decrees binding, and took up various subjects, such as relics, the consecration of churches, oratories, the administration of hospitals, etc. As late as 1850 a provincial synod was held at Toulouse, under the presidency of Archbishop d'Astros, which declared against the tendencies of modern thought, indifference, socialism, etc. See HARDUIN, MANSI, etc.; [and for a sketch of Toulouse's religious history, VINCENT: In the Shadow of the Pyrenees, New York, 1883, pp. 211-232.] NEUDECKER.

TOURNEMINE, René Joseph, b. at Rennes, April 26, 1661; d. in Paris, March 16, 1735. He was educated by the Jesuits; entered their order, taught theology and philosophy in several of their houses, and was in 1695 placed at the head of the Journal de Trévoux, which he conducted till 1718 with great moderation and tact. He also published in 1719 an excellent edition of the Brevi expositio sensus literalis totius scripturæ (Cologne, 1630, 2 vols.) of the Jesuit Menochius (b. at Padua, 1576; d. at Rome, Feb. 4, 1655); but his principal work, Traité sur le Deïsme, remained unfinished. See Journal de Trévoux, September, 1735.

TOURS, Synods of. The first synod of Tours of which any account has been preserved convened in 461, passed thirteen canons re-affirming the decrees of former synods, forbidding priests to whom the privilege of marriage was accorded to marry widows, pronouncing excommunication upon priests who renounced their orders, etc. The synod of 567 met with the consent of King Charibert, and passed twenty-seven canons regulating matters of church-discipline. The synod of 813 was convened by the order of Charlemagne, and passed fifty-one canons defining the duties of bishops, putting the ordination of priests in their thirtieth year, regulating the relation of nuns and monks, forbidding markets on Sunday, etc. The canons close with a profession of absolute submission to Charlemagne. Another synod was held at the time the remains of St. Martin were conveyed from Auxerre to Tours,—either in 912 or 887. The synod of 942 is barely mentioned, and that of 1055 was convened with reference to the views of Berengar concerning the Lord's Supper, which had been condemned as heretical. Berengar on that occasion renounced his views.

In 1060 the cardinal legate Stephen convened a synod at Tours, which concerned itself with the purchase and sale of church-offices, the licentiousness and concubinage of the clergy, etc. The council of 1096 was occupied with the release of King Philip of France from the ban of the church, and with the preparation for the first crusade. In 1163 Pope Alexander III. presided in person over a synod at Toulouse which excommunicated the antipope, Victor IV., and recognized his own claims. The synods of 1236 and 1282 were concerned with matters of church-discipline. The important synod of 1510 took up the violent conflict which was then raging between Louis XI. of France and the belligerent Pope Julius II. The chancellor of Louis opened the council with complaints against the Pope, and in the king's name presented several questions to the assembled dignitaries bearing upon the relations of states to the papal see. The first of these was whether the Pope might carry on war against princes who with their lands acknowledge allegiance to the church. The synod answered that the Pope had no right to begin any such war. A second question concerned the right of a prince with whom the Pope was at war to enter the Pope's dominion, in case of certain abuses; and this the synod likewise answered in the affirmative. A provincial council was also held at Tours in 1583, to confirm and take measures to carry out the Tridentine Decrees. See HARDUIN, MANSI. NEUDECKER.

TOWIANSKI, Andreas, Polish mystic; b. at Antoszwinec, Lithuania, Jan. 1, 1799; d. at Zürich, Switzerland, May 13, 1878. From 1818 to 1826 he practised law at Wilna; in 1835 became a convert of St. Simon at Paris; and on Sept. 27, 1841, he began the public proclamation of his revolutionary views, which called for a total upheaval of society and a new arrangement. The Polish poet Mickiewicz was one of his followers. See SEMENKA: T. et sa doctrine, Paris, 1850; and MICKIEWICZ: L'église officielle et le Messianisme, 1842-43, 2 vols.

TOWNLEY, James, D.D., English Wesleyan; b. in Manchester, May 11, 1774; d. at Ramsgate, Dec. 12, 1833. After a good school education he became a local preacher at the age of nineteen, and was from 1796 to 1832 a regular minister. In 1827 he was appointed general secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. He presided at the conference at Sheffield, 1829, and again at the Irish conference, 1830. He was, next to Dr. Clarke, the most learned man among his brethren in all biblical matters, and wrote, among other works of less value, the excellent Illustrations of Biblical Literature, exhibiting the History and Fate of the Sacred Writings, from the Earliest Period to the Present Century, including Biographical Notices of Translators and Other Eminent Biblical Scholars (London, 1821, 3 vols.; New York, 1842, 2 vols.), and translated pt. iii. 26-49 of Maimonides' Reasons of the Laws of Moses, with Notes, Dissertations, and Life (1827).

TOWNSON, Thomas, D.D., Church of England; b. at Much Lees, Essex, 1715; d. at Richmond, April 15, 1792. He was a fellow of Magdalen College; and, after filling various appointments, he was made archdeacon of Richmond, 1780. In 1778 he published at Oxford his most admired work, Discourses on the Four Gospels, chiefly with regard to the Peculiar Design of Each and the Order and Places in which they were written. His Works, ed. by Ralph Churton, with an account of the author, appeared in London, 1810, 2 vols.

TRACHONITIS is mentioned only once in Scripture (Luke iii. 1), where the expression, "the Trachonite region," seems to include, besides the province of Trachonitis, parts of Auranitis, Gaulanitis, and Batanea. It was bounded north by Damascus, and east by Gaulanitis. By Augustus it was taken from Zenodorus, and given to Herod the Great, from whom it devolved upon Philip. After the beginning of the second century the name does not occur any more in history.

TRACTARIANISM, the name of a remarkable movement in the Established Church of England, due to the so-called Tracts for the Times, a series of pamphlets published at Oxford from 1833 to 1841. The leaders of the movement were all Oxford men, and members of Oriel. They were John Keble, John Henry Newman, Richard Hurrell Froude, Hugh John Rose, Arthur Philip Perceval, Frederick William Faber, William Palmer, Edward Bouverie Pusey, and Isaac Williams.

The series consisted of ninety tracts, of which Newman wrote twenty-four, and Keble also a goodly number. The movement was essentially a revival of mediæval ecclesiasticism and scholasticism, in protest to evangelicalism, and to that political liberalism which abolished the Test Act in 1828, and ten of the Irish bishoprics in 1833, whose occupants had voted against the Reform Bill of 1831. The way was prepared for the movement by John Keble's Christian Year, 1827. Its real founder was Hugh James Rose. Its start was given by A. P. Perceval's Christian Peace-Offering, 1828. The object of this book was to show that the Anglican and Roman churches were essentially agreed. Then came Froude, who argued that the existing Roman Church had departed from the primitive faith, and so, in a less degree, had the Anglican Church, but that the teachings of the latter admitted of construction in the sense of the primitive church. He therefore urged the claims of celibacy, fasting, relics, and monasticism. But, as the tendency of the political movements of their time was directly against such a return of the middle age, the little coterie at Oxford published The Churchman's Manual (1833), in which they made prominent the three points of the idea of the church, the importance of the sacraments, and the significance of the priesthood. On July 14, 1833, Keble preached an assize sermon upon National Apostasy, from 1 Sam. xii. 23. This sermon Newman regarded as the actual start of the movement. Upon July 25-29, 1833, Rose, Froude, Keble, Newman, Palmer, and Perceval held a conference at Haddenham, to revise the Manual, and devise a plan of action. It was then agreed that the two points to be aimed at were the maintenance of the doctrine of apostolic succession, and the preservation of the Prayer-Book from Socinian alteration. In September, Keble drew up the programme of the party; and on Sept. 9, 1833, the first Tract for the Times (designed to indoctrinate the laity in Catholic theology and polity) appeared, and the coterie, through their connection with the series of Tracts, received the name "Tractarians," as the writers or compilers of the tracts themselves, and as the indorsers of the sentiments advocated. The first tract was by Newman, entitled Thoughts on the Ministerial Commission. The Churchman's Manual had been sent to all the Scottish bishops, and approved by them, while the Archbishop of Canterbury did not object to its publication. And the first tracts also found a warm reception. They were looked upon as valuable allies in the defence of the Established Church against the insidious attacks of the Liberals. By November, 1835, seventy of them had appeared. The first sixty-six consist of extracts from the Fathers, Beveridge, Bull, Cosin, and Wilson, with a few original tracts. The succeeding twenty-four are longer, and more elaborate. They make altogether six volumes. But the movement was by no means a peaceful progress. In March, 1844, the Christian Observer, an Evangelical newspaper, decried it as Romanistic. Newman, in Tracts 38 and 41 (Via media), denied the charge. In 1836 the Tractarians vigorously opposed the appointment of Renn Dickson Hampden, D.D., principal of St. Mary's Hall, Oxford, to the regius-professorship of divinity, on the ground of his latitudinarian principles. A great pamphlet war was thus opened; but the Tractarians were defeated. In 1837 the Rome-ward tendency of the movement more plainly manifested itself, especially in Isaac Williams's tract (No. 80), On Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge. It advocated a revival of the disciplina arcani of the Ante-Nicene Church, i.e., the ideas that there were doctrines which should not be publicly taught; and that the Bible should not be promiscuously circulated. Keble's tracts were in similar strain. The effect of such writing was twofold, — the public was dismayed, and certain members of the Tractarian party avowed their intention to become Romanists. In 1838 the Library of the Fathers (see PATRISTICS) was started by the Tractarians, and in 1840 the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, which contained old High-Church writers of the Church of England who more or less sympathized with the views of the Tractarians. But so decided was the setting of the tide towards Rome, that Newman made a vigorous effort to turn it by his famous tract (No. 90), Remarks on Certain Passages in the Thirty-nine Articles, in which he endeavored to show how it was possible to interpret the Thirty-nine Articles in the interest of Catholicism. He maintained that "the sixth and twentieth articles, on Holy Scripture and the authority of the Church, were not inconsistent with the Anglo-Catholic idea; that the true rule of faith is not in Scripture alone, but in apostolic tradition; that Art. XI., on justification by faith only, did not exclude the doctrine of baptismal justification, and of justification by works as well; that Arts. XIX. and XXI., on the Catholic Church and general councils, did not mean that the true church is not infallible, but that the idea of express supernatural privilege, that councils properly called shall not err, lies beyond the scope of these articles, or at any rate beside their determination; that Art. XXII., on purgatory, pardons, images, relics, and invocation of saints, only condemned the Romish doctrine concerning them, not any other doctrine on these subjects, consequently not the Anglo-Catholic; that Art. XXV. did not deny that confirmation, penance, orders, matrimony, and extreme unction, were sacraments, but only that they were not sacraments in the same sense as baptism and the Lord's Supper; that Art. XXXIII. only condemned gross views of transubstantiation, not the mysterious presence of the body of Christ. The articles on masses and clerical celibacy were in like manner explained away" (Stoughton). The tract appeared in March, 1841: Newman acknowledged on the 16th. The violent controversy which the tract occasioned led to the "discontinuance" of the series.

The tract, although nominally an attempt to dissuade from Rome, was denounced as in reality leading towards it. Then came a sifting of the party. Those who were content to stay in the Church of England drew all the closer together. They were such men as Pusey, Williams, Keble, and Perceval. But soon the movement swept away from this middle position such leading spirits as Newman and Faber in 1845, and Manning in 1851. Before 1853 not less than four hundred clergymen and laity had become Roman Catholics. They were "chiefly impressible undergraduates, young ladies, and young ladies' curates" (Blunt). But the action of the Roman Church (October, 1850), in distributing England into twelve bishoprics, while it rendered that church more attractive, at the same time aroused the strong Protestant feeling, and doubtless checked many from going to Rome. For the present state of the tractarian movement, see art. RITUALISM.

Tractarian Doctrine. — The fundamental doctrines concern the sacrament of the Eucharist, which is declared to be the means of salvation, and the church with the apostolical succession, which is the divinely appointed channel of saving grace through the Eucharist. Baptism regenerates, yet the baptized can fall from grace. In the Eucharist, the bread and wine truly, but in a heavenly and spiritual manner, become the body and blood of Christ; and the worthy communicant receives the same to his spiritual welfare and salvation, but the unworthy to judgment. Because of the real presence of Christ, it is right to bow at the consecration of the elements; for one adores, not the elements, but Christ who is present in them. As regards the church as the means of salvation, founded by Christ, and perpetuated by the apostolical succession, she is the only channel of grace in Christ, because she is the only dispenser of the means of grace, the only protector and witness to the truth, and the highest authority in matters of faith and life. As channel of the means of salvation, she constitutes the communion of saints. She is one — holy, catholic, and apostolic in origin and teaching. The three marks of the true church are apostolicity (through apostolical succession securing the validity, the sacraments, and the power of the keys), catholicity (through Scripture and tradition securing truth in doctrine and life), and autonomy (absolute independence of external authority in matters of faith and practice). By apostolical succession was meant that Jesus gave his spirit to the apostles, and they to those upon whom they laid their hands, who, in turn, possessed the power to impart the gift; and so it has come down to our day. With this idea is connected that of the priesthood as the necessary and unique mediators between Christ and the congregation, and so a sharp line is drawn between clergy and laity. The true church thus constituted is not an ideal, but a reality, an external and visible organization. The true visible church is the communion of saints, in which the Word is preached in its purity, the sacraments administered according to Christ's ordinance, and discipline rightfully maintained. The invisible church is the household of God, in heaven and earth. The Rule of Faith is the Holy Scriptures and the Catholic tradition together.

As a theological school, Tractarianism is modern scholasticism. The realistic tendency of Tractarianism is plain. Justification, it teaches, is a real impartation of spiritual life through the sacraments; the true church is real, objective; truth is really objectively given; the gift of the Holy Spirit is really transmitted through the apostolical succession; Christ is really present in the Eucharist, so also in worship. The external must have a real meaning: it must express some idea. A change was therefore made in the accessories of worship. Everywhere beauty in architecture, in vestments, in music (vocal and instrumental), was insisted upon, with the result of striking improvement. Enormous sums have been spent in these directions. Cathedrals have been restored, religious houses have been erected, and the appointments of the sanctuary multiplied and refined.

And Tractarianism powerfully affected the religious life of thousands. The church was to be served by organizations for religious and philanthropic action, and these have sprung into existence. The influence of doctrine upon life was emphasized; daily duties were explained and enforced; and so the movement proved a great good to the community. But it has also been a fruitful source of secession to Rome, and has produced an agnostic and rationalistic re-action in the Church of England.

TRACT SOCIETIES, Religious. I. Great Britain.—The maintenance and diffusion of religious opinion by means of pamphlets or tractates is a habit older than the invention of printing; and perhaps John Wiclif was the greatest tract-writer that ever lived. But it has been reserved to modern times to make full use of the same method as a means of evangelization; and tract societies are now recognized by all churches as among their most effective instruments for good. Among the pioneers in this work, a foremost place must be given to HANNAH MORE, whose Cheap Repository tracts, towards the close of the eighteenth century, circulated by hundreds of thousands, served greatly to counteract the influence of the irreligious, anti-social, cheap literature which at that time was diffused, chiefly by hawkers, throughout Great Britain. The Book Society for promoting Religious Knowledge among the Poor had been formed as long back as 1750. But a new departure was taken in this direction in 1799 by the formation of the Religious Tract Society in London, chiefly through the influence of the Rev. George Burder of Coventry and his coadjutors; the Rev. Joseph Hughes of Battersea being the first secretary. The object set forth in the first minute was "to form a society for the purpose of printing and distributing religious tracts." The first meeting was held in Surrey Chapel, the Rev. Rowland Hill himself exerting much influence in the establishment of the society. Two principles from the first were recognized: first, that there is a common Christian faith, in the expression and enforcement of which all evangelical believers may unite, irrespective of ecclesiastical or doctrinal distinctions; and, secondly, that this faith may be set forth in so brief a compass and so simple a way, that even the smallest tract may contain the essentials of saving truth. A third principle, no less important than these two, had to await full recognition until a later day, — that the great verities of religion may rightly be associated with every topic of human thought and interest; the Christianity of the Bible thus becoming the animating spirit of a various, instructive, and ennobling literature. At the outset, the production of tracts was the only aim; and the value of the method, as well as the appropriateness and interest of the first publications issued, led to a speedy enlargement of the work beyond the anticipations of its early promoters. The tracts of the society were issued by thousands, and obtained that place in the esteem of Christian workers generally which they have ever since retained. Nor was the testimony given to the real unity of Christ's church less valuable. Very early in the history of the society it was adopted as a fundamental rule, that its managers should be taken in equal numbers from the Church of England and from the ranks of Non-conformity. The experience of more than eighty years has shown that it is not only possible, but easy, for all to labor together in this work, without any compromise of individual opinions, or any entanglement in doctrinal or ecclesiastical dispute; and no Christians are excluded from the society, but such as exclude themselves, on the one hand by a rigid churchmanship, or on the other by a rationalism which seems to ignore important principles of evangelical truth. Nor has this comprehensiveness been evinced only in one special work. It was in the committee room of the Religious Tract Society, at the close of the year 1802, that the BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY was originated, and on Tuesday, Feb. 1, 1803, that its rules were finally adopted; the diffusion of the streams thus naturally leading to the fountain-head. From the first, the two societies have labored together in brotherly union for the evangelization of the world.

The Tracts of the society, in accordance with its name and first design, claim the chief place in our notice of its publications. These are of immense variety in style and form, adapted to every class of readers, old and young. Every tract, before adoption by the society, is submitted to the whole committee, and decided on by vote. It is held as essential that every tract should set forth the way of salvation, by the atonement of Christ, and through the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart. And, further, it is required that the narratives in these tracts should be literally true. Fiction, it is held, has its becoming place in literature; but a tract, to win the highest usefulness, should deal with real personages and actual experiences. Of the tracts produced under these conditions, there are now about 3,200 on the society's catalogue, from the single-page handbill to the important series of Present-day Tracts, in which some of the foremost scholars and thinkers of the day have employed their pens for the defence of the Christian faith. The tract circulation in the year 1882-83, in the English language alone, amounted to 33,249,800.

But, as has been already intimated, the work of the society now extends far beyond the production of tracts. The publication of Books was very gradually introduced, and the earliest attempts in this direction seem to have been to popularize the standard works of "Puritan" divinity. Through the ind-fatigable energy of Mr. George Stokes, a gentleman of fortune (founder, in 1840, of the well-known Parker Society), who long gave his editorial services to the society, the chief practical and experimental works of the English Reformers, and of their great successors in the seventeenth century, were issued, mostly in an abridged form. To the writings of Wiclif, Tyndale, Latimer, Becon, and many more who took part in the struggle against papal domination, were added the choicest works of Baxter, Howe, Owen, Flavel, Sibbes, Charnock, and a host of others, mostly abbreviated to suit the taste or the leisure of modern times. These writings had for a while a very large circulation, and contributed not a little to sustain among thoughtful readers the relish for the old English Protestant theology. Other publishers have since taken up the work, and the fashion of abridgments has passed away; so that in a great measure this part of the society's labor has been superseded. Besides preparing these editions, Mr. Stokes also wrote a considerable number of manuals on biblical history and antiquities in a form suited to young people and Sunday-school teachers; entering thus upon a wide field, which has since been largely occupied. Among the larger works of this period was also a Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, compiled from Henry, Scott, and other writers, and in some measure combining the characteristics of both of the commentators named. To this have from time to time been added other important works of biblical exposition, notably Leighton on St. Peter, and the American commentaries of Hodge on the Epistle to the Romans, and of Barnes on the Gospels (abridged). But the great work of the society in this special direction has been the Annotated Paragraph Bible, which after several years of careful preparation, enlisting the services of many eminent biblical critics of the day, appeared in 1851 under the direction of the late Mr. Joseph Gurney, treasurer of the society, who, besides providing all expenses of editorship, had the stereotype plates prepared at his own cost. This work has stood the test of thirty-two years; and, notwithstanding the more recent appearance of several important commentaries on Scripture, it still holds a high place in the esteem of competent judges. Bible dictionaries and concordances have also been issued by the society for many years, with companions and helps of different kinds, among which may be mentioned the Bible Handbook, by Dr. Angus, and the Handbook to the Grammar of the Greek Testament, by the author of the present article. In modern practical and devotional Christian literature, the work that has achieved the largest circulation, and probably the most extended usefulness, has been James's Anxious Enquirer; the society having circulated no fewer than 815,000 copies of this book in its several editions. Pike's Persuasive to Early Piety may also be mentioned as having formerly been very popular as a gift to the young. In the year 1849 the committee resolved to offer prizes to workmen for the best essays on sabbath observance. There were numerous competitors, and much was thus effected in awakening Christian thoughtfulness in our land in reference to a very important part of practical godliness. Prizes were also offered in 1850 for essays on the condition of the working-classes; the winner of the first prize, by an essay entitled The Glory and the Shame of Britain,—Mr. Henry Dunckley, now of Manchester,—has since won for himself a foremost place in the ranks of English journalism.

The range of the society's publications has been gradually widened beyond that of exclusively religious teaching. Books "on common subjects written in a religious spirit," to adopt the phrase of Dr. Arnold, have been multiplied. Foremost among these in utility has been the Educational Series, including the well-known Handbooks of the English Language and of English Literature, by Dr. Angus; also Histories of England, Greece, and Rome, with a system of Universal Geography. For some years a sixpenny Monthly Volume treated, in a popular but thoroughly competent way, many great questions of philosophy, science, and history. These were truly "small books on great subjects," and have had an important share in the education of many. Biographies published by the society have been very numerous, both of the saints and heroes of the church, and of many in humbler positions, whose example it seemed well to preserve. The lives of Tyndale and of Latimer, by the late Robert Demaus, rank among the highest in this class of literature; and it may be that almost as much real usefulness has been achieved by Legh Richmond's Annals of the Poor, or the unpretending memoir of Harlan Page.

Books of a yet more popular class have been published by the society in great abundance. The Pilgrim's Progress has been issued in sixty-five languages, mainly by the society's aid. For many years the kindly humor of "Old Humphrey"—the "Christian Elia," as he was called by the late Dr. James Hamilton—irradiated many a little volume, both for younger and for elder readers. The name of this charming author was George Mogridge. He died in 1851, at the age of sixty-seven. A long array of juvenile publications, from Mrs. Sherwood's Little Henry and his Bearer, down to the last boys' story by Mr. G. E. Sargent, or pathetic tale by "Hesba Stretton," provides reading for every taste. Of Jessie's First Prayer, by the last-named writer, the sale has amounted to 837,500 copies, inclusive of a penny edition recently published. Christy's Old Organ, by Mrs. Walton, is also well known on both sides of the Atlantic, and has been remarkably useful to many readers. The illustrations of this class of books, and of others published by the society of late years, have been, in their finish and artistic merit, a striking contrast to those contained in its earlier volumes. The highest resources of the wood-engraver's art are now called into requisition; and, in a special series of Pen and Pencil Pictures from many lands, the descriptive and the artistic portions vie with each other in the care with which they have been elaborated. The Harvest of a Quiet Eye, and other works of poetic, meditative musing, by the same author, may also be mentioned, for the beauty and finish of their pictorial illustrations.

The Periodicals of the society have also become a very important part of its work. The first was The Child's Companion, begun in 1821, and still teaching its attractive lessons to generation after generation of little ones. The Weekly Visitor (commenced in 1825) for many years sought to combine useful information with Christian teaching; but in 1852 the same work was undertaken by The Leisure Hour, with a higher standard of literary merit. The Sunday at Home attempts for the Lord's Day what The Leisure Hour strives to do for the week. In 1879 The Boy's Own Paper was started as a weekly journal, followed by The Girl's Own Paper in 1880. Intended at the outset to convey healthful moral and religious teaching, with a due admixture of the attractive and amusing, so as to supersede as far as possible the frivolous and often debasing literature offered to our young people, the success of these periodicals has surpassed the highest expectations of their promoters, and English-speaking boys and girls throughout the whole world welcome them as their own magazines. The circulation of the two together now amounts to about 350,000 of each number. The Tract Magazine and The Cottager and Artisan are also published by the society.

There are now in all some 10,000 separate publications on the catalogue of the society; and taking into account the books, tracts, and periodicals, with illustrated cards, texts, and the like, the total issues of the year 1882-83 have amounted to a total of 79,379,350; being by far the largest number in any year of the society's existence.

The Religious Tract Society is also a great MISSIONARY INSTITUTION. For the furtherance of its highest purposes, the committee make every week large grants of tracts to distributors at home and abroad, either altogether gratuitously, or at a considerable reduction in price. One circumstance that contributes no little to its usefulness is, that it has at its back, so to speak, a vast army of Christian men and women who are voluntarily engaged in circulating its publications, often accompanying the silent message with the living voice, and so in a twofold manner acting the part of evangelists. Part of the constant work of the committee is to second and assist their efforts. Tracts are supplied in unstinted numbers for missionary efforts of every kind, for hospital and workhouse visitation, for emigrant and other ships, for soldiers on service abroad, and for settlers in our colonies all over the world. To a great extent, also, the circulation of the books published by the society is aided by the plans of the committee. Thus all pastors, and missionaries of all denominations, are permitted, in the first year of their ministry, to purchase these publications at a greatly reduced price. School and district libraries are furnished at a large reduction, and great facilities for purchase are allowed to Sunday-school teachers. In the efforts also to diffuse a Christian literature in foreign languages, the society is continually active, having representatives or correspondents in every country of Europe, and in all the chief mission-fields of the East and West. It publishes, or aids the publication of, tracts, books, and periodicals in as many as one hundred and sixty-six languages and dialects, and is, in fact, an auxiliary to every Protestant missionary society. The methods by which it acts are very various. Large money grants are made in aid of the publication-work of many missions. Gifts of printing-paper are voted for periodicals; electrotype illustrations are also freely given, or supplied at a low price; and grants of publications are made for gratuitous distribution. The societies and missions thus aided are naturally, for the most part, English; but those of the United States and of Germany to a large extent share also in the benefit. Important societies at Paris, Toulouse, Basle, Berlin, Hamburg, Gernsbach (Black Forest), Stockholm, Kristiania, and other places, carry on their several plans of publication and distribution; the London Tract Society being in various ways the helper of all.

To meet these varied claims, the society has to rely, first upon its benevolent income; the money it receives from subscriptions, donations, legacies, and collections, being applied, without any deduction whatever, to the missionary work of the society. But these furnish less than half what is actually expended, the remainder being supplied from trade profits after the payment of all expenses. The benevolent income for the year 1882-83 has amounted to £14,824 sterling, to which sum £25,574 have been added from the profits on sales, and £11,403 from the part payments of the individuals and societies receiving grants; making a grand total of £51,801 spent in the missionary work of the society.

These details respecting one institution, the largest of the kind in Great Britain, will illustrate the working of other societies that have a similar end in view, but work either in denominational channels, or in a more restricted way. The SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE, founded in 1698, is wholly connected with the Church of England, and publishes yearly a vast amount of popular literature, reporting an issue, for the year 1881-82, of 8,525,091. The Wesleyans and the Baptists have also special organizations for tract-work. Christian workers connected with Mildmay Park in London, and various sections of Plymouth Brethren, publish many tracts. The Monthly Tract Society (founded 1837), and the Weekly Tract Society (1847), publish and issue each a tract periodically, to subscribers and others, chiefly through the post. The Pure Literature Society (1851) prepares and circulates lists of books judged suitable for reading and distribution. And, in addition to all these, the private ventures of able tract-writers make no inconsiderable addition to this class of literature; the Rt. Rev. Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool, and the Rev. P. B. Power, being especially noteworthy. In Scotland, the Scottish Tract and Book Society devotes itself rather to distribution than to publication, employing a large number of colportors with marked success; while the Stirling Tracts, at first prepared and printed by the private enterprise of the late Mr. Peter Drummond, a wealthy seed-merchant in that town, but now conducted by a committee, and entitled "The Stirling Tract Enterprise," are circulated by millions. A Dublin Tract and Book Repository was, until lately, carried on with a special view to Ireland; but the work for that country is now chiefly in the hands of the London and Scottish societies. Many publishers in England and Scotland find it remunerative to publish "leaflets" — miniature tracts — or single hymns, chiefly for enclosure in letters. A vast circulation is thus secured in the correspondence of relatives and friends, and much good is accomplished in a quiet way, of which no statistics can be given. The power of the press, indeed, only begins to be understood as a means of counteracting error, of diffusing truth, and, in the largest sense of the phrase, of preaching Christ's gospel.

The Jubilee Memorial Volume of the Religious Tract Society, by Mr. William Jones (London, 8vo, 1850), contains in full detail the history of this institution for the first fifty years of its existence, and abounds in valuable information respecting the methods and results of tract-distribution in the earlier days of the enterprise. It is still the standard volume on the subject. The yearly reports of the various societies mentioned above must be studied to complete the details, and to bring them down to the present time.

[There are also tract societies supported by all branches of the Protestant Church in Paris, Lausanne, Toulouse, Brussels, Geneva, and other Continental cities.]

S. G. GREEN, D.D.

(Secretary Religious Tract Society, London).

II. United States.—The word "tract" was used by old English writers as nearly equivalent to "treatise," and was often applied to volumes, as well as to pamphlets of a few pages only, and on any subject,—scientific, political, reformatory, etc. The Scriptures themselves are a series of tracts. In our own time, though the word "tract" may still cover the same extent of meaning, in common parlance it is understood to denote a short religious appeal or pamphlet; and tract societies are voluntary associations of Christians to publish and circulate religious tracts, volumes included.

The importance of adding to the influence of spoken truth the permanent effectiveness of the printed page was early felt by Christians. What a good book can do, and how its influence may germinate and perpetuate itself, is well shown in the familiar history of Baxter's conversion, aided by reading Dr. Gibbs's book, The Bruised Reed, and Baxter's instrumentality in the conversion of Doddridge, by whose Rise and Progress Wilberforce was led to the truth, into which his Practical Piety, in turn, guided Legh Richmond, the author of tracts that have brought multitudes to Christ. It was evident that much good might be wrought by short, condensed, earnest, and striking tracts; and efforts were early made by individuals to furnish these cheaply in such forms and numbers that they could be widely diffused; and the wisdom of associated efforts to this end was soon apparent. Hence sprang up various local tract societies, as in New England, Albany, Philadelphia, and Baltimore. One of the first of these was The Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, Boston, 1803. The Connecticut Religious Tract Society, Hartford, was formed in 1807; The Vermont Religious Tract Society, in 1808. In 1812 The New-York Religious Tract Society arose, and in 1811 The New-England Tract Society, Andover, which was afterwards transferred to Boston, and in 1823 changed its name to The American Tract Society. But the friends of this form of Christian activity were ere long convinced that it could only be carried on prudently and effectively by a national association centrally located, and securing the confidence and support of evangelical Christians of all denominations. Hence originated, in May, 1825, THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY, New York; the Christians of this city leading off in the organization, and the society at Boston and the Christian public joining it. A building was provided for the manufacture and sale of its publications, and the tracts of the Boston society were transferred to New York. The movement gained general approval, and rapidly expanded, and took rank with the Bible Society among the chief undenominational Christian charities of the nation.

After two years, volumes began to be published in addition to unbound tracts. Handbills, leaflets, children's tracts, illustrated cards, wall-rolls, etc., followed in quick succession; publications in German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Welsh, and Dutch; publications for all ages and classes, and treating upon all ordinary phases of truth and duty, to meet every variety of religious want. In 1813 the publication of periodicals commenced, the number increasing at intervals to supply the sabbath school and the family, in English and in German. Many of these various publications were beautifully illustrated; and in excellence of contents, and attractiveness of style, were unsurpassed by any, and a stimulus and model to many.

For the circulation of its publications, the Society has depositories in Boston, Philadelphia, Rochester, Cincinnati, Chicago, and San Francisco, supplied from the Tract House at New York, and sold at uniform prices. It sells also largely through the trade. So far as its means allow, it furnishes its publications gratuitously, or at reduced prices, in aid of ministers, life-members, missionaries, chaplains, and lay Christians engaged in efforts to reform and save; and these go to soldiers and sailors, to freedmen and immigrants, to hospitals, prisons, and asylums, to poor sabbath schools, to the destitute and neglected in our cities and on our wide frontiers. In many places it has employed the services of local auxiliaries, for systematic tract-distribution, by voluntary Christians making a monthly visit to each house, or canvassing the whole region, to leave a well-chosen volume by sale or gift in each family. For the vast population outside of church care it has employed numerous colporters, going from house to house, supplying some of its publications to all, if possible, by sale or grant, conversing with the families, holding meetings for prayer, and organizing sabbath schools. This system of union missionary colportage this Society originated for this country, sending godly and faithful men to the destitute wherever found,—on our vast and rapidly-advancing frontiers, to the freedmen and to the immigrants. The wisdom, necessity, and efficiency of the plan, are so evident, that the Christian public recognized it as an essential part of national evangelization. It rapidly expanded, and has accomplished a vast work that could not have been done by any church organization. In its forty-two years it has performed the equivalent of some 5,500 years' labor for one man, has made 12,800,000 family visits, has sold or granted 14,600,000 volumes, and led to the organization of very many sabbath schools and churches.

For the direction of its operations, the Society has an executive committee composed of a publishing, distributing, and finance committee of six members each; and the undenominational character of its issues and all its work is assured by the election of men representing at least six different denominations, whose action in the publishing committee must be unanimous. There are three secretaries (each at the head of a distinct department), a treasurer, a business-agent, editors, and a depository. The Tract House is furnished with all facilities for composing, stereotyping, printing, binding, and issuing its books, tracts, and papers, including tens of thousands of stereotype-plates and engravings. The whole cost of the manufacture of its issues and of the administration of its business is defrayed by the sales. But for its benevolent work of grants and colportage, it is dependent on its friends; and to this work all gifts and legacies not donated for special purposes are devoted without abatement. These "benevolent" moneys are the voluntary annual gifts of its friends, in many cases coming regularly and unsolicited; in others it is found necessary to call upon them individually, or by public appeals in each church, and subsequent collections, — a service requiring the employment of several district secretaries, or collecting agents, who are also, in some of the fields, superintendents of colportage.

The foreign work of the Society is mainly carried on by the aid of missionaries at seventy different stations in the nominally Christian, Mohammedan, and heathen world. At the principal mission-centres, committees are formed, each member representing one of the several denominations there laboring, and these prepare and recommend the tracts proper for publication by this Society; and to these undenominational and soul-saving books the annual grants of the Society are devoted. These grants are everywhere highly prized. They have amounted in fifty-eight years (1883) to $616,000, besides many thousands in engravings, books, and other helps. Many valuable books also have been printed at the Tract House for the sole use of foreign missions, — in Armenian, Hawaiian, Zulu, Grebo, etc. The Society has printed more or less, at home and abroad, in 146 languages and dialects, and at foreign stations 4,340 different publications, including 694 volumes, — a work which has borne a very considerable part in conquering heathendom for Christ.

The issues of the Society from its home presses, — numbering 6,671, of which 1,181 are volumes, — have amounted in fifty-eight years to nearly 29,000,000 volumes and 400,000,000 tracts.

Of its periodicals, which are now seven in number, — The Illustrated Christian Weekly and Deutscher Volksfreund, The American Messenger and its companion family monthly in German, and two monthly and one weekly children's papers, finely illustrated, — the total issue for one year is about 4,500,000 copies.

The American Tract Society, Boston, in 1858 resumed for some years its separate organization and work, chiefly for greater freedom of action respecting slavery, but since 1878 again co-operates with the National Society. The Western Tract and Book Society of Cincinnati also co-operates with the Society at New York. W. W. RAND, D.D.

TRADITION. It is a fact, that, for a long time, oral tradition was the only source from which the Christian faith drew its living waters. Congregations were founded in foreign countries, among foreign people; but paper and ink had nothing to do with the affair. Independent of the fragmentary notices from the hands of the apostles, which circulated among the congregations, but made no claims on completeness, either with respect to history or doctrine (John xxi. 25), the fulness of the faith lived on from mouth to mouth. It was oral tradition which linked an Ignatius, a Papias, a Polycarp, to the apostolical church; and yet their testimony was accepted without doubt as authoritative. There soon came a time, however, when the state of affairs began to change. When the voices of the apostles and of the disciples of the apostles grew silent, and the proofs of the genuineness of tradition demanded some power of discrimination, while at the same time an idea sprang up of the overwhelming grandeur of the part which Christianity was destined to play on earth, it was quite natural that tradition should retire to the background, and more prominence be given to the written documents from the apostolical age. When, about 200, the canon was fixed, it seemed probable, that, within a short time, the writings of the New Testament should become not only the best guaranteed, but even the sole legitimate, source of Christian knowledge.

But just at that very moment circumstances gave to tradition a new significance. Christianity, not yet politically established, but fighting its way through the antagonism of Paganism, had to encounter its first and most formidable rival, Gnosticism. It was the pretensions of the Gnostics which had compelled the Christian Church to fix her canon; and it was now discovered that the apostolical writings, upon which also the Gnostics proposed to take their stand, were insufficient to decide the contest, since they could be interpreted in one way by the catholics and in another by the heretics. In this emergency, tradition was caught at as a saving remedy. Irenæus says, "About the single passages of Scripture there can be different opinions, but not about the totality of its contents, that which the apostles have deposited in the church as the fulness of all truth, and which has been preserved in the church by the succession of bishops." Tertullian goes still farther, transferring the idea of prescription from the material to the spiritual, from the legal to the religious sphere. As the heretics, he says, reject some of the books of Scripture, and distort the rest by their false interpretation, the first question is, From whom originated the Scriptures, for whom were they intended, by whom have they been preserved, etc.? The answer must be, From the Christians, for the Christians, by the Christians, etc. Consequently, where we find Christian faith and Christian life, there we may seek for the true Scriptures and their true interpretation; while the heretics, by the very law of prescription, are excluded from forming any legitimate opinion. Thus, in the tradition of the sedes apostolica, people believed they had found an unconquerable weapon against all heresy, not yet surmising that in reality they had found a magical formula by which anything could be conjured up from the obscurity of the apostolical age, even though all scriptural testimony were lacking.

It took some time, however, before the idea became clearly defined, and attained full practical power. Although, in the congregations of Asia Minor and Greece, there existed a living apostolical tradition, besides the written testimonies of Paul and John, it must not be understood that any one — even not Tertullian, though he recommended such a measure — ever sent messengers to Ephesus, Corinth, Philippi, and Thessalonica, to ask what the apostles had orally taught concerning subordinationism or modalism. On the contrary, Tertullian, in whose interest it certainly lay to argue from tradition, in his work De præscriptione, drew all his arguments, not from the general doctrine of his church, but from the books of the New Testament; and Irenæus, who actually addressed the faithful of his time for advice to Ephesus and Smyrna on the one side, and Rome on the other, made in the Easter controversy the humiliating experience, that the apostolical traditions of those congregations contradicted each other. A tradition with the true characteristic of antiquitas — that is, well-authenticated connection with the source — had become an impossibility. A new characteristic of what was true tradition had to be adopted, namely, that of universitas; that is, universal acceptance throughout the church. But even thus difficulties arose. Cyprian, who invented the theory of the collected episcopacy as the true representative of the church, could not agree with his brother bishop of Rome concerning the validity of heretical baptism, and fell back upon the dangerous proposition that tradition without truth was only an old error. For a long time the state was one of transition, fermentation, and confusion.

Under these circumstances the Arian controversy came to exercise a decided influence. Quite otherwise than during the previous contest with Gnosticism, the orthodox theology had now to encounter an adversary, who, like herself, stood on biblical ground. The question was not now of excluding some apparently Pagan element. The whole controversy lay fully within the pale of Christianity: it was essentially exegetical. But in exegetical respect the orthodox theologians were not the proper match for the Arians, and they were consequently compelled to seek aid from tradition. It was, indeed, by claiming to be possessed of the true ancient interpretation of certain passages of Scripture, that the orthodox succeeded in overthrowing Arius at Nicæa; and doctrinal tradition was thus introduced under the guise of exegetical tradition. But the mask was soon thrown off. In the East the doctrine of a secret apostolical tradition, from which the master theologians drew their wisdom, was first developed by the three Cappadocians. Basil the Great says in a passage, De Spiritu Sancto, 27 (which, however, is much contested), that Christian theology is derived partly from Scripture, and partly from a secret apostolical tradition, both of which have equal authority; and on the basis of this proposition he develops his doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In the West it was Vincentius of Lirin who gave the final definition of the idea of true tradition. In his Commonitorium occurs the famous passage, Mag-nopere curandum est, ut id teneamus, quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est ("we must be sure that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always, and by all").

However aptly the rules of the Commonitorium were formulated, they would, nevertheless, hardly have been able to take hold of the course of the development, if the idea whose practical organ they were had not happened to find another and most potent agency. But, such as the actual circumstances were, the tradition found in the œcumenical councils, not only a natural ally, but its necessary organ. After the Council of Nicæa (325), all duly convened synods were, in accordance with Acts xv. 28, considered as standing under the immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, as inspired: their decrees were infallible. But as the universitas, that is the general acceptance throughout the church, was the only guaranty of their infallibility, they appeared as the true twin-brother of the tradition: indeed, their true object was to manufacture tradition. No wonder, then, that the seventh œcumenical council (Nicæa, 787) laid its anathema on any one who should dare to reject the tradition of the church, be it oral or written tradition; and the next councils repeated the condemnation. From that moment, tradition, so to speak, flooded the church, carrying along with it every thing, — dogmas, constitutions, etc. Theoretically Scripture and tradition were co-ordinated. But practically it is generally the case, when two principles are placed in co-ordination to each other, that one of them gains the ascendancy; and before long even the most prominent theologians began to argue exclusively from tradition, referring to Scripture only in order to find confirmatory passages. All original productivity ceased, and was supplanted by the compiler's industry, digging in all the corners of the Fathers and the councils, and trusting itself to do nothing above a slight re-arrangement of the materials. In the East this whole movement reached its consummation in John of Damascus. In the West it was still continued for several centuries on account of a somewhat different idea of inspiration, according to which, not only the Fathers and the œcumenical councils were inspired, but also the Pope and the great doctors, and the mystics and the monks, in short, the whole church. Abelard's Sic et non fell flat to the ground, with no more effect in the West than the works of Stephanus Gobarus in the East; and as all who felt the need of reform, and practically worked for it, — the Waldenses, the Wicliffites, the Hussites, etc., — naturally turned to Scripture, the Bible received from the church, which had its foundation on tradition, the name of the "book of heretics."

After centuries of slow growth, the new form of the conception of tradition became visible in the negotiations which were carried on between Nicholas of Cusa, as representative of the Council of Basel, and the Hussites, 1433-52. What Gerson in 1401, in discussing the Immaculate Conception dogma, had said with some cautiousness and reserve, — that the Holy Spirit might communicate to later teachers much which had remained unknown to the earlier, — was now repeated by Nicholas of Cusa with rudeness and cynicism, in arguing for the withdrawal of the cup from the laity in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. The church, he argued, was not bound by the letter of the Bible: on the contrary, the scriptural text could and should be variously interpreted according to the various circumstances of its application. But who was to decide on such a question? The Pope. The universality of tradition, established by the complete representation of the church in the œcumenical councils, was superseded by its unity, enforced by the verdict of the Chair of Peter. This conception, however, did not appear fully developed until after the breach between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Reformation had taken place. Luther's opposition to tradition became one of principle as early as 1520, and in 1522 he declared that tradition could be tolerated only so far as it was in perfect harmony with Scripture. Over against this principle of Scripture being the highest, the absolute authority, which was carried out with still greater rigorousness by the Reformed Church, the Council of Trent placed the declaration (April 8, 1546), that there were two sources of Christian knowledge, Scripture and tradition, and that the interpretation of Scripture had to be regulated by tradition; which, however, simply meant the Pope. The arguments on both sides are fully set forth in Martin Chemnitz (Examen concilii tridentini, 1565-73), and Bellarmin (De verbo Dei, 1581). Within the Protestant camp, however, various movements have been made in favor of tradition, — by Lessing, Delbrück, and Daniel in Germany; by Pusey and the Tractarians in England; and by N. F. S. Grundtvig in Denmark.

TRAJAN (Marcus Ulpianus Trajanus), emperor of Rome (98-117), was, no doubt, one of the best rulers of the Roman Empire, and a sincere, mild, even benevolent character. Nevertheless, he was the emperor who issued a decree against the Christians. He made persecution of Christianity legal. The occasion was the appointment of the younger Pliny as governor of Bithynia. In the East, Christianity numbered many more adherents than in the West. In the great cities, more than one-half of the inhabitants were Christians; and the Pagan temples began to be left empty and almost desolate. Pliny noticed it with alarm, and in lack of any thing better he determined to apply the laws against secret societies to the case. But the accusations were so numerous, and the results of the legal proceedings so unsatisfactory, that he felt obliged to address the emperor himself for instruction. Trajan's answer is very characteristic. It forbids to search after suspected persons, to pay any regard to anonymous accusations, etc., and it grants full forgiveness to those who repent and abjure; but it also authorizes the punishment of such as are convicted and will not retract. As a consequence of this rescript, the general position of the Christians became very insecure, not to say dangerous. Among those who actually suffered martyrdom were Simeon of Jerusalem, and Ignatius of Antioch. See the Epistles of Pliny, book x. (Bohn's ed., Lond., 1878), and his panegyric of Trajan.

TRANSCENDENTALISM IN NEW ENGLAND. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, a strong re-action took place against materialism. As philosophy, it began in Germany. Voltaire brought from London to Paris the ideas of Hume. From Paris they went with him to the court of Frederick, king of Prussia, and became ruling principles of thought. Kant subjected them to searching analysis in his famous work, the Kritik of Pure Reason, published in 1771, and became the leader in a great philosophical reform. Materialism took no deep root in the German mind. The great names in German idealism are Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel; and the sequence of their doctrine, so far as it can be conveyed in very few words, is as follows: Kant sounded the depths of the human mind; Fichte imparted reality to the idea of the human person; Schelling combined the inward and the outward by supposing an Absolute, which he called reason; Hegel transformed what was to him the unsubstantial reason into a being, thus completing, as is claimed, the fundamental "categories" of Kant. The word "transcendentalism" is of Kantian origin. It means that which is valid beyond the experience of the senses, though present to the knowledge of the mind. It describes a form of idealism. In the judgment of Dr. J. H. Stirling, "The transcendental philosophy is a philosophy of the merely speculative pure reason; for all moral practice, so far as it involves motive, refers to feeling, and feeling is always of empirical origin." Again: "I call all cognition transcendental which is occupied not so much with objects as with the process by which we come to know them, in so far as that process has an a priori element. A system of such elements would be a transcendental philosophy."

In France, materialism was represented by Condillac, Cabanis (author of the saying that "brain secretes thought, as the liver secretes bile"), and others; idealism, by Maine de Biran, Destutt de Tracy, Cousin, Jouffroy, and others.

In England, not to mention the poets, who are always idealists, Coleridge reflected Schelling; and Carlyle, Goethe and Richter. The Aids to Reflection and Friend, of Coleridge, were early reprinted in this country. The writings of Carlyle — articles, reviews, essays (produced from 1827 onward), Signs of the Times, Characteristics, later, Sartor Resartus — were eagerly read in American editions. So far as this goes, transcendentalism in this country was of foreign extraction, an invasion of the German intellect; though it doubtless had roots and a character of its own, being derived from the same general impulse, but shaped by peculiar circumstances.

In New England, materialism was abroad, sometimes implicitly, sometimes by formal statement. Unitarianism, itself a protest, on the ground of common sense, against "Orthodoxy" and "Evangelicalism," was infected with the metaphysics of John Locke. It was a system of rationalism, prosaic, unimaginative, critical, suspicious of ideal elements and manifestations. Its teaching was didactic, its worship was uninspiring, its interpretations of Scripture were literal in the extreme. It was, in the main, a negative system, its forms mechanical, its beliefs traditional, its associations conventional. It was destitute of genius. The elder men, like Channing and Lowell, retained the sentiments of piety which they had brought with them from the faith they had left; but the new society did not share the original enthusiasm. A spirit of individualism was in the air, running occasionally into deism and atheism. In 1832 Abner Kneeland founded The Investigator: in 1836 he was prosecuted for blasphemy. There was great interest in clairvoyance, mesmerism, and kindred doctrines. As early as 1824 F. H. Hedge raised the banner of revolt (in the Christian Examiner for November) against the materialism implied in phrenology, which even then was getting possession of the public mind. There was a rage for the expositions of Gall. The popular lectures of Spurzheim were attended by crowds. Later, Combe's book on the Constitution of Man was hailed as a gospel. Regeneration by bread was proclaimed in the name of Graham. Every kind of medicament was called in to do the work of the Holy Spirit.

At this juncture, idealism appeared in the shape of a protest against the drift of the time towards animalism and externalism. The soil was prepared by orthodox mystics, who proclaimed "the life of God in the soul of man;" by the spiritualism taught by Jonathan Edwards; by the Reformed Quakers, with their doctrine of an all-sufficing "Inner Light;" by the traditions of Abby Hutchinson, Mary Dwyer, and the apostles of soul-freedom. Not that the positions taken by these men and women were the same as those assumed by the transcendentalists. They were not: they were quite different. Indeed, they were precisely opposite; for these all recognized some supernatural authority, whereas the transcendentalists as a class were pure "naturalists," believers in the inspiration of the individual soul; but they looked only at apparent results, disregarding adjacent beliefs. The leaders were young men, almost without exception, educated for the ministry, Unitarians, members of the best class in society, eloquent speakers and talkers, scholars, men of liberal culture, outspoken in the declaration of their opinions. Of these Ralph Waldo Emerson was chief, most seraphic and persuasive, most uncompromising, too, in his ecclesiastical action. He resigned his charge in 1832, from scruples in regard to the "communion-service," which he regarded as a spiritual rite, and was willing to continue as such, not as an ordinance imposed by church or Scripture. Later, he was unwilling to offer public prayer, and retired from the pulpit altogether, making the secular platform his sole visible elevation above the multitude, — an elevation not of authority, but of convenience. A few young men gathered round him. In September of 1836, on the day of the celebration of the foundation of Harvard College, four persons — Emerson, Hedge, Ripley, and Putnam — met together in Cambridge, and, after discussing the theological and ecclesiastical situation, agreed to call a meeting of a few like-minded men, with a view to strengthen each other in their opposition to the old way, and see what could be done to inaugurate a better. At a preliminary meeting at the house of George Ripley, in Boston, there were present Emerson, Hedge, Alcott, Bartol, Brownson, Bartlett (a young tutor at Cambridge). Then and there it was resolved, on invitation of Emerson, to hold a convention at his house in Concord during that same month of September.

Invitations were sent to as many as were known or supposed to be in sympathy with the objects of the meeting. From fifteen to twenty came, among them, W. H. Channing, J. S. Dwight, J. F. Clarke, Ephraim Peabody, Chandler Robbins, George P. Bradford, Mrs. Samuel Ripley, Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Peabody, perhaps Theodore Parker. Convers Francis and Caleb Stetson were the only men of the older generation who took a practical interest in the movement. Dr. Channing was in sympathy with its general aims, but did not show himself. His contemporaries either did not appear, or immediately withdrew. The public got intelligence of the Concord meeting, and gave to the little fellowship the name of the "Transcendental Club," why, it is not easy to discover; for a club it was not in any proper sense of the word. There was no organization, there were no officers, there was no stated time or place of assembling, there were no topics for discussion: in fact, there appears no good reason for calling it "transcendental," unless that term was supposed to carry with it ridicule or opprobrium. The meetings were fitful, and hastily pre-arranged. In ten years there were scarcely more than as many convocations. Some members remained in the church, attempting to combine transcendental ideas with ecclesiastical forms: others left the church for other vocations. Each followed the leading of the individual disposition. The short lived Dial and the shorter lived Massachusetts Quarterly were results of the "transcendental" spirit.

At the time when the transcendental movement was at its height, the atmosphere of New England was filled with projects of reform. Every kind of innovation on existing social arrangements had its advocate, its newspaper, its meetings, its convention. Temperance, non resistance, woman's rights, antislavery, peace, claimed attention from those concerned for the progress of mankind. Some of these projects were wild, visionary, and, in the eyes of cool observers, grotesque. It is not unlikely that they owed their origin to the same impulse which produced transcendentalism, though the historical and logical connection has not been discovered. That a large part of the ridicule which was vented on the transcendentalists was owing to their presumed affiliation with these summary iconoclasts is more than probable. Nor was such a presumption unreasonable; for the transcendentalists not merely took no pains to correct the impression, but rather gave it encouragement. In 1840 The Friends of Universal Progress held conventions in Chardon Street. Emerson, who was present, gave an account of the meetings in the Dial. He wrote: —

"The singularity and latitude of the summons drew together from all parts of New England and also from the Middle States, men of every shade of opinion, from the strictest orthodoxy to the wildest heresy, and many persons whose church was a church of one member only. A great variety of dialect and of costume was noticed. A great deal of confusion, eccentricity, and freak appeared, as well as of zeal and enthusiasm. . . . Madmen, madwomen, men with beards, Dunks, Muggletonians, Come-outers, Groaners, Agrarians, Seventh-day Baptists, Quakers, Abolitionists, Calvinists, Unitarians, and philosophers, all came successively to the top, and seized their moment, if not their hour, wherein to chide, or pray, or preach, or protest. If there was not parliamentary order, there was life, and the assurance of that constitutional love for religion and religious liberty which in all periods characterizes the inhabitants of this part of America. . . . These men and women were in search of something better and more satisfying than a vote or a definition."

Emerson's lecture on Man the Reformer was an eloquent arraignment of society. "One day all men will be lovers, and every calamity will be dissolved in the universal sunshine." In his lecture on The Times, delivered the same year (1841), he says, —

"These reformers are our contemporaries; they are ourselves, our own light and sight and conscience; they only name the relation which subsists between us and the vicious institutions which they go to rectify. . . . The reforms have their high origin in an ideal justice; but they do not retain the purity of an idea. . . . The reforming movement is sacred in its origin; in its management and details, timid and profane. These benefactors hope to raise man by improving his circumstances: by combination of that which is dead, they hope to make something alive. In vain. By new infusions, alone, of the spirit by which he is made and directed, can he be remade and re-enforced."

But the general public took no notice of the distinction between regeneration and reform: the great body of transcendentalists did not, as the experiment of Brook Farm bore witness. The interest of the transcendentalists in reformers was, in part at least, due to the principle of sympathy, which made them desirous of extending to others the liberty they claimed for themselves, — a feeling that may have led them to extremes in the direction of promiscuousness of advocacy, but saved them from practical license.

The moral tendencies of transcendentalism were what might have been expected from individualism. But the theories were bolder than the actions. Mr. Emerson, in his essay on Self-Reliance, said, —

"I would write on the lintels of the doorpost, Whim. I hope it is somewhat better than whim at last, but we cannot spend the day in explanation. . . . The idlest reverie, the faintest native emotion, command my curiosity and respect."

Yet no loftier, purer man ever lived than Ralph Waldo Emerson. Certain theoretical implications may have, to vulgar eyes, looked towards "free love;" but their authors were men of cleanest life.

In religion the typical transcendentalist might be a sublimated theist: he was not, in any accepted sense, a Christian. He believed in no devil, in no hell, in no evil, in no dualism of any kind, in no spiritual authority, in no Saviour, in no church. He was humanitarian and optimist. His faith had no backward look: its essence was aspiration, not contrition. His regard was fixed on the individual soul. Very remarkable was his confidence in nature, in natural powers and capabilities, in the results of obedience to natural law, in spontaneity, impulse, unfolding, growth. His love of childhood, flowers, land-cape, was proverbial. Emerson called transcendentalism an "excess of faith." But the faith was in human nature as a possible realization of the divine.

At present there is a vehement re-action against transcendentalism, partly from the quarter of the materialists, and partly from the quarter of the supernaturalists. But, except for a few local and incidental extravagances, its influence was noble, and the idealism which was the essence of it is the foundation of all spiritual belief. As one form of the great intuitive school of philosophy, it has, perhaps, seen its best days; but its elements will render vital other faiths, which will endure when it is forgotten. [O. B. TRANSFIGURATION (Matt. xvii. 1-13; Mark ix. 2-13; Luke ix. 28-36). The transfiguration is that extraordinary episode in Christ's earthly life which anticipated his future state of glory just before he entered the path of suffering, according to his own prediction (comp. Matt. xvi. 21-28; Mark viii. 31-38; Luke ix. 21-27). It marks the culminating point in his public ministry, and stands midway between the temptation in the wilderness and the agony in Gethsemane. It is recorded, with slight variations, by all the evangelists except John, who omits this, and many other events and miracles, as being already known from the popular gospel tradition. It is also alluded to long afterwards by Peter, as an eyewitness of the transcendent majesty of the scene (2 Pet. i. 16-18).

1. The place mentioned by the synoptists is "an high mountain" (ὄρος ὑψηλόν). Peter calls it "the holy mountain" (ἐν τῷ ὄρει τῷ ἁγίῳ, 2 Pet. i. 18), from which we may infer that it was well known, and had acquired a halo of glory from the event. The Lord was wont to withdraw to a mountain for prayer (Matt. xiv. 23; Luke xxi. 37; John vi. 15); and several of the greatest events in the history of revelation, from the legislation on Mount Sinai to the ascension from Mount Olivet, took place on mountains. But the particular mount of transfiguration is in dispute. Three mountains have been named.

(a) Mount Olivet. This rests on the earliest tradition (in the Itiner. Burdig., A.D. 333), but is inconsistent with the context, as Christ was in Galilee before and after the event, and a journey to Judæa in the intervening time could not have been left unnoticed. The mountain must be sought in the province of Galilee.

to build,—one for his Lord, one for Moses, one for Elijah, forgetting himself and the two other disciples, and “not knowing what he said,” in his dreamy state of mind. It also gave the name Τὸ Οὐράνιον to the festival of the transfiguration in the Greek Church. There is a poetic fitness in this tradition. No mountain in Palestine was by nature better suited for the event than Tabor. It lies in the very centre of the country, and commands from its flattened summit one of the finest views over many historic scenes of sacred history,—the hills of Nazareth and Mount Carmel in the west, the Lake of Tiberias and Mount Lebanon in the north, the mountains of Moab and Bashan in the east beyond the Jordan, and the Little Hermon and Gilboa, where Jonathan fell, and the plain of Esdraelon, the historical battle-field of Palestine, in the south. For its central location and view, it may be called the Rigi of Palestine.

But two arguments may be urged against this view, which make it at least very doubtful. (1) The fact that the summit of Tabor was occupied by a city with suburbs of the same name (1 Chron. vi. 77), and was employed without intermission, between the times of Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.) and the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70), as a fortification, and hence unfit for quiet seclusion and meditation. See Polybius, V. 70, 6; Josephus, Ant., XIV. 6, 3; Bell. Jud., I. 8, 7, II. 20, 6, IV. 1, 8. (2) The time of the transfiguration, which occurred only “six days” (μεθ’ ἡμέρας ἑξ, Matt. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; or, more indefinitely, ὥστε ἡμέραι ὀκτώ, Luke ix. 28) after the confession of Peter at Cæsarea Philippi. After the transfiguration, and the healing of the lunatic, it is said that Jesus went to Capernaum (Matt. xvii. 24; Mark ix. 33), and thence to Jerusalem. Now, it is barely possible, but not at all probable, that he should in a few days have gone from Cæsarea Philippi to Mount Tabor, passing Capernaum on the way, and gone back from Mount Tabor to Capernaum. Dr. Lange (Commentary on Matt. xvii. 1, p. 306, Amer. ed.) remarks, “that it is exceedingly improbable that Christ should so suddenly have left his retreat in the highlands of Gaulonitis, and transferred the scene of one of his most secret revelations to Galilee, where he was everywhere persecuted.”

(c) Mount Hermon (now called Jebel esh-Sheikh, i.e., “the chief mountain”), the highest peak of the Lebanon range, and the Mont Blanc of Palestine. It rises in three summits very majestically to a height of ten thousand feet above the Mediterranean, is covered with eternal snow, and is visible for many miles in every direction. It can be seen from Gerizim and Tabor, from Damascus, from the northern heights of the Anti-Lebanon and Lebanon, and the plain of Coele Syria. Moses could see it from the top of Pisgah in Moab, when “the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan” (Deut. xxxiv. 1). It reaches down to the northern borders of Galilee. Cæsarea Philippi, or Baniyas, lies at its base. The way from Baniyas to Damascus leads over it, and presents magnificent views. In favor of Hermon as the mountain of transfiguration are, (1) its location at the very place where Christ was a few days before, and (2) its retirement from the busy crowd. “There are several retired platforms on Mount Hermon,” says Tristram, “behind the last recess of Palestine, where the scene of the transfiguration may have occurred, with the disciples ‘apart by themselves.’” It is worthy of note that this event, as well as the confession of Peter, and Christ’s great prophecy concerning his church, which the powers of Hades cannot overthrow, should be attached to the border-region between the Jews and the Gentiles, as indicating the point where the gospel left Palestine to become the religion of the whole world. The leading modern writers on Palestine have pronounced in favor of Hermon, and against Tabor. So Ritter: Comparative Geography of Palestine, ii. 312, Eng. trans.; Robinson: Biblical Researches, vol. ii. 330, 358 (Amer. ed.), and his Physical Geography of the Holy Land, p. 26; Stanley: Sinai and Palestine, p. 351, Eng. ed. of 1868; Trench: Studies in the Gospels, p. 192; Tristram: Topography of the Holy Land, p. 233; Keim: Gesch. Jesu, ii. 585.

2. The time of the transfiguration. It probably took place in the night; because it could be seen to better advantage than in daylight, and Jesus usually went to mountains to spend there the night in prayer (Luke vi. 12, xxi. 37, xxii. 29; Matt. xiv. 23, 24). The apostles were asleep, and are described as “heavy with sleep, yet having remained awake” during the act of transfiguration (ἦσαν βεβαρημένοι ὕπνῳ, διαγρηγῶσάντες δὲ, Luke ix. 32); and they did not descend till the next day (Luke ix. 37).

3. The actors and witnesses. Christ was the central figure, the subject of the transfiguration. Moses and Elijah appeared from the heavenly world as the representatives of the Old Testament,—the one of the Law, the other of Prophecy,—to do homage to Him who was the fulfilment of both. They were the fittest persons to witness this anticipation of the heavenly glory, both on account of their representative character and their mysterious departure from this world. Moses died on the mountain, as the rabbinical tradition has it, “of the kisses of Jehovah,” in sight of the Holy Land, and out of sight of the world. Elijah was translated alive from earth to heaven on a chariot of fire. Both had endured, like Christ, a forty-days’ fast; both had been on the holy mount in the visions of God; and now they appeared on earth with glorified bodies, “solemnly to consign into his hands once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power” (Alford).

Among the apostles, the three favorite disciples were the sole witnesses of the scene, as they were also of the raising of Jairus’ daughter, and of the agony of Christ in Gethsemane. Peter alludes to the event in his Second Epistle. John, the bosom-friend of Jesus, probably had in view this, among other manifestations of his glory, when he testified, “We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth” (John i. 14). And his brother James, as the protomartyr among the apostles, was the first to follow him into that glory of which the transfiguration was a foretaste and a sure pledge.

4. The event itself. The transfiguration, or transformation, consisted in a visible manifestation and effulgence of the inner glory of Christ’s person, accompanied by an audible voice from heaven, declaring him to be the Son of God, with whom the Father is well pleased. The expression used by Matthew and Mark is that the Lord was metamorphosed (μετεμορφώθη). Luke, who wrote for Gentile readers, avoids this expression, and simply states "that the fashion of his countenance was altered." But it was not only his countenance which shone in supernatural splendor: even "his raiment was white and glistening." Or as Mark, borrowing one image from nature, and another from man's art, says, it "became shining, exceeding white as snow, such as no fuller on earth can whiten them." This is one of those incidental picturesque touches, not infrequent in Mark, which betray the report of an eye-witness, and may be traced to a communication from Peter (comp. 2 Pet. i. 18). We have analogies in Scripture which may be used as illustrations. When Moses returned from the presence of Jehovah on Mount Sinai, the skin of his face shone (Exod. xxxiv. 29-35), which circumstance Hilary calls a figure of the transfiguration. Stephen's face, in view of his martyrdom, shone like the face of an angel (Acts vi. 15). The human countenance is often lighted up by joy; and the peace and blessedness of the soul, in moments of festive elevation, shine through it as through a mirror.

In the case of Christ, the transfiguration was the revelation and anticipation of his future state of glory, which was concealed under the veil of his humanity in the state of humiliation. The cloud which overshadowed him was bright, or light-like, luminous (φωτεινὴ), of the same kind as the cloud at the ascension, or the clouds of heaven at the second advent of Christ (Matt. xxiv. 30; Mark xiii. 26; Luke xxi. 27), and symbolized the presence of God (Exod. xiv. 19, xix. 16; Isa. xix. 1; Dan. vii. 13).

5. Different Explanations.—The event is described as a vision (ὄραμα, Matt. xvii. 9). This does not exclude its objective reality: it only places it above the sphere of sense and ordinary consciousness. It was partly an objective appearance, partly a spiritual vision. The apostles saw the scene "in spirit" (ἐν πνεύματι, as distinct from ἐν νοῒ; comp. Acts x. 10; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Rev. i. 10). They were in an ecstatic "state of supernatural clairvoyance," so to speak, "heavy with sleep," yet "keeping themselves awake throughout." And Peter did "not know what he said," being only half conscious, overawed with fear and wonder, delighted so as to hold fast this goodly state, yet "sore afraid."

(a) The older orthodox commentators and divines describe the transfiguration as an outward, visible manifestation. Some suppose that Moses and Elijah appeared in their own bodies; others, that Moses, not yet having risen, assumed a foreign body resembling his former body (so Aquinas).

(b) The rationalists resolve the transfiguration into a dream, or a meeting of Jesus with two secret disciples.

(c) Strauss presents it as a pure myth, a poetic imitation of the transfiguration of Moses (Exod. xxiv. 1, xxxiv. 29 ff.); similarly Keim, who draws a minute parallel between the two events.

(d) Ewald regards it as an actual occurrence, but with mythical embellishments.

(e) Weiss: a real but spiritual vision of the three disciples.

The circumstantial agreement of the three evangelists who narrate the event, the definite chronological date, the connection with what follows, and the solemn reference to it by Peter, one of its witnesses (2 Pet. i. 16-18), as well as the many peculiar traits to which no parallel can be found in the transfiguration of Moses, refute the mythical hypothesis, and confirm the historical character of the scene. But it is useless to indulge in speculations concerning the precise form and mode of a supernatural event.

6. Significance.—The transfiguration was, as already remarked, a visible revelation of the hidden glory of the person of Christ in anticipation of his future state of exaltation, and at the same time a prophecy of the future glory of his people after the resurrection, when our mortal bodies shall be conformed to his glorious body (Phil. iii. 21).<sup>1</sup> It served as a solemn inauguration of the history of the passion and final consummation of his work on earth; for, according to Luke's account, the ἔσθλος of Christ—i.e., especially his death, the great mystery of the atonement for the sins of the world, and the following resurrection, and return to the Father—was the topic of conversation between Jesus and the two visitors from the other world. The event bears a relation to the history of Christ's suffering similar to that of his baptism in the River Jordan to his active ministry. On both occasions he was brought into contact with representatives of the Old Testament, and strengthened for his course by the solemn approval of the voice from heaven declaring him to be the well-beloved Son of the Father. The transfiguration, no doubt, confirmed the faith of the disciples, and prepared them for the approaching trial. It took away from them, as Leo the Great says (Serm., xciv.), the scandal of the cross. It furnishes also a striking proof for the harmony of the Old and New Testaments, for personal immortality, and the mysterious intercommunion of the visible and invisible worlds. Both meet in Christ: he is the connecting link between the two dispensations, as also between earth and heaven, between the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory. It is very significant, that at the end of the scene the disciples saw no man save "Jesus alone." Moses and Elijah, the law and the promise, types and shadows, pass away: the gospel, the fulfilment, the substance, Christ, remains, the only one who can relieve the misery of earth, and glorify our nature,—Christ all in all.

7. The transfiguration has given rise to one of the greatest works of art ever conceived by the genius of man. It is the best artistic comment on this supernatural event. The picture under that name was the last work of Raphael, and was carried after his coffin at his burial, in the Pantheon of Rome. He died of this masterpiece, in the prime of early manhood. The original is in St. Peter's at Rome, and has been multiplied in innumerable copies. It represents Christ soaring above the earth, in a halo of glory; Moses with the tables of the law on one hand, Elijah on the other; the three disciples, with their characteristic features, at their feet, gazing in a half-dreamy state at the dazzling light; and beneath this scene of celestial peace the painter represents, in startling contrast, the suffering of the lunatic, whose healing follows in the Gospel narrative. So the Christian must ever descend from the heights of festive joy and the occasional foretaste of heaven to the hard work of daily life, before he can attain to final rest and glory.

TRANSMIGRATION of souls from one body to another, through the death of the former and the birth of the latter, forms an important element of Buddhist ethics, and was also taught in ancient Egypt; but it never took root in Greek mythology, in spite of Pythagoras and Plato; or in Judaism, though it is found in the Cabala; or in Christianity, though Jerome relates that it was taught by some obscure sects, and reminiscences of it are found, not only among the Fathers, but also in the middle ages.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, a scholastic term (from trans and substantia, "a change of one substance into another," μετασώσις, Wesensverwandlung), introduced in the twelfth century,<sup>1</sup> for the Roman-Catholic theory of the real presence in the Eucharist.

I. The DOCTRINE is, that the elements of bread and wine in the sacrifice of the mass are, by the consecration of the priest, transubstantiated, i.e., changed as to their essence, into the very body and blood of Christ, while the visible form and the appearance of bread and wine remain to the sight, touch, and taste. The miraculous change is supposed to take place simultaneously all over the world, day after day, wherever the priest pronounces the words of institution,—"This is my body," "this is my blood."

The doctrine was suggested by several Greek and Latin Fathers under different terms, such as μεταβολή, conversio substantiæ, transitio, transmutatio. It was first clearly set forth (without the term) by Paschasius Radbertus in the ninth century, by Lanfranc in the eleventh, defended by the leading scholastics, and confirmed in 1215 by the Lateran Council under Pope Innocent III., which declared its belief on the subject in these words: "Verum Christi corpus et sanguis in sacramento altaris sub speciebus panis et vini erraciter continentur, TRANSUBSTANTIATIS pane in corpus et vino in sanguinem potestate divina." The doctrine was finally settled for all orthodox Roman Catholics by the Council of Trent (in the thirteenth session, Oct.

11, 1551), in opposition to the Protestant denial, in the following terms:—

"This holy Synod doth now declare it anew, that, by the consecration of the bread and of the wine, a conversion is made of the whole substance of the bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood; which conversion is, by the Holy Catholic Church, suitably and properly called Transubstantiation."

Canons 1-4 of the same session condemn the contrary opinions. The same statement is repeated in the Tridentine Profession, art. vi. (See the Latin and English text in Schaff: Credentials of Christendom, vol. ii. 130, 136, 137, and 208.)

The doctrine as thus stated involves a stupendous miracle, or, rather, a series of miracles and magic transformations. It is not only above reason, but contradicts directly the testimony of three senses. All attempts of Catholic divines to explain it by scholastic distinctions of various kinds of presence, and by speculations about the relation of the substance to the accidents, are failures. Two opposite tendencies meet in this dogma: on the one hand, the divine is materialized; and, on the other hand, the material is spiritualized. Christ's real body and blood are enclosed in the narrow dimensions of the sacramental elements, and yet they are everywhere, by innumerable acts of priestly creation, wherever the mass is celebrated; and they are wholly partaken of by the mouth (yet not digested) by every communicant, good or bad, without division or diminution.<sup>1</sup>

The doctrine of transubstantiation led, with other causes, to the withdrawal of the cup from the laity to avoid possible profanation by spilling the blood of Christ; and both the doctrine and the usage combined greatly to strengthen the power of the priesthood, and to widen the gulf between the priesthood and the laity.

It may be admitted that a great and precious truth underlies this as every other great error; and it is the truth which gives the error such power and tenacity over millions of devout Catholics to this day. This truth is, that Jesus Christ is the bread of life from heaven, and nourishes

— Dogma datat Christianis, Quod in eucarem transit panis,
Et vinum in sanguinem.
Quod non capis, quod non vides,
Animosa firmat fides
Præter rerum ordinem.

Sub diversis speciebus,
Signis tantum et non rebus,
Latet res cœlestis.
Cæci cibis, sanguis potus,
Manet tamen Christus totus,
Sub utraque specie.

A sumente non concisus,
Non confectus, non divisus, Integer accipitur.
Sumit unus, sumunt mille,
Quantum isti, tantum ille,
Nec suntu consumitur.

Sumunt boni, sumunt mali,
Sorte tamen inæquali
Vltro ed interitus.
Mors est malis, vita bonis:
Vide, patris sumptionis
Quam sit dispar exitus."

See the whole hymn of the Doctor Angelicus in Daniel's Theaurus Hymnologicus, t. ii. 97-100, with interesting notes.

<sup>1</sup> According to Dr. Mattes (R. C.), in Wetzer and Welte, xi. 134, the term transubstantiatio or transsubstantiatio was not officially used in the Catholic Church before the Fourth Lateran Council (1215).

his people spiritually by faith, as truly as he fed the five thousand physically by the miracle of the five loaves. The error lies in the carnal, Capernaïtic misunderstanding; and this is condemned by our Lord at the close of that very discourse which sets forth that great and comforting truth (John vi. 63). The flesh profits nothing, the spirit makes alive.

II. The ARGUMENTS which Papal divines produce in defence of this doctrine are:—

1. Exegetical.—(a) A literal interpretation of the words of institution,—“This<sup>1</sup> is my body;” “this” [which, however, refers to the preceding “cup,” the wine not being mentioned] “is my blood of the covenant” (Matt. xxvi. 26, 27). The Lutheran symbols agree with this exegesis, but nevertheless reject transubstantiation. The Reformed symbols reject it for the following reasons: (1) the word “is” may indicate a figurative as well as a real relationship between the subject and the predicate, and often means “represents,” or “sets forth,” in the Septuagint and the Greek Testament (e.g., Gen. xli. 26, 27; Matt. xiii. 38, 39; Gal. iv. 21; Rev. i. 20); (2) the surrounding circumstances of the institution of the Holy Supper (the living Christ amidst his disciples, his body not yet broken, his blood not yet shed, etc.) forbid a strictly literal interpretation, and application to the first celebration; (3) the literal interpretation cannot be carried out, inasmuch as the Lord himself (Matt. xxvi. 27; Luke xxii. 20) and the apostle Paul, in quoting the words of institution (I Cor. xi. 25, τοῦτο τὸ ποτήριον, etc.; x. 16, “the cup of blessing,” etc.), substitute the “cup” which contains the wine, for the wine itself; i.e., they use the figure of synecdoche continentis pro contento: and yet no Catholic assumes the transubstantiation of the vessel.

(b) The mysterious discourse of our Lord in the synagogue of Capernaum, about eating his flesh, and drinking his blood (John vi. 52–59). To this may be objected, that this discourse is appealed to by theologians for different theories of the Lord’s Supper; that many of the ablest exegetes deny the reference of this section to the Lord’s Supper, which at that time was not yet instituted; that in any case the words of our Lord (John vi. 63)—“It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit, and are life”—furnish the key for the understanding of the preceding discourse and of all our Lord’s discourses; and that, finally, if any theory of the Lord’s Supper is favored by that discourse, it is one which confines the fruition of the Lord’s flesh and blood to the believer, since every one that eateth his flesh, and drinketh his blood, is said “to have eternal life,” “to abide in Christ and Christ in him,” and “to live forever” (vi. 53, 56, 58),—all of which can be said of believers only; while the Roman Church teaches that unworthy as well as worthy communicants partake of the literal body and blood of Christ, though with opposite effect.

2. Historical.—The Roman Church appeals to the Fathers, especially Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ambrose. It is true that a materialistic conception of the real presence and fruition of Christ set in at a very early date, we may say with Ignatius, Justin Martyr, and Irenæus (although the last speaks of the consecrated bread and wine as “antitypes” of the body and blood of Christ); but it is equally true that different theories prevailed among the Fathers; that the African divines—Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine—teach a symbolical and spiritual, rather than corporeal, presence; and that the Alexandrian school of Clement and Origen put the whole design of the Eucharist in feeding the soul on the spiritual life and the divine word of Christ: hence the Fathers have been appealed to for the Lutheran, Calvinistic, and Zwinglian theory, as well as for the Roman-Catholic. (Compare on the patristic views the doctrine histories of Münscher, Hagenbach, Baur, Nitzsch, and the writer’s Church History, II. 241 sqq.) Nor has any of the seven ecumenical councils made a deliverance on the doctrine, except the second of Nicæa, in 787, which sanctioned the worship of images, and declared that the elements after the consecration were no mere figures or antitypes of the body and blood of Christ, but really the body and blood. John of Damascus said substantially the same; and the Greek Church has even adopted the Roman dogma, under the name μετενοσίωσος.

But this result was not reached in the Latin Church till a much later period. During the middle ages two controversies on the real presence took place, which prove that transubstantiation was not yet fixed in the mind of the church. The first controversy occurred in the ninth century. Paschasius Radbertus, abbot of the monastery of Corbie, first expounded and defended transubstantiation in a tract, De Sacramento Corporis et Sanguinis Domini (831, 2d ed., 844), but expressly says that some taught only a spiritual communion of the soul with the Redeemer in the Eucharist. The tract provoked considerable opposition, and Ratramnus (Bertram), also a monk of Corbie, refuted it (without mentioning the name of his abbot) by a tract, De Corpore et Sanguine Domini ad Carolum Calvum.<sup>1</sup> He appealed to the Scriptures (John vi. 63) and to St. Augustine, and taught that bread and wine remain unchanged after consecration, as the water in baptism, but become the significant symbols of a spiritual communion with Christ by faith; so that the body and blood of Christ were present, and partaken of only spiritualiter et secundum potentiam. John Scotus Erigena, Herigar, Rabanus Maurus, and, in part, Gerbert, likewise wrote against Radbert’s view. (See Neander: Church History, Boston ed., iii. 494–502, and Steitz, in Herzog I., xvi. 311 sqq.) The second eucharistic controversy took place in the eleventh century. Berengarius of Tours (between 1040 and 1050), attacked in a work, De Cæna Sacra, the doctrine of transubstantiation as contrary to reason, to the Scriptures, and to the older church Fathers, especially St. Augustine. His former friend Lanfranc, prior of Bec in Normandy, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1089), was the principal champion of transubstantiation. He first drew the logical inference from the doctrine, namely, that unbelievers as well received the essence of the sacrament (but not its salubris officina). Hildebrand, then papal legate in France, afterwards Pope Gregory VII., for a while protected Berengar; but a Roman synod condemned him as a heretic. Berengar was forced to commit his writings to the flames; but on returning to France he renewed his opposition, was again cited to Rome, and even Pope Gregory VII. could not protect him any longer against the powerful current in favor of transubstantiation: he saved him, however, from a violent end. Berengar was allowed, after a sort of forced recantation, which he afterwards regretted, to retire to a solitary island near Tours, and lived till 1088. (See Neander, iii. 502-530; Steitz, xvi. 315 seq.)

<sup>1</sup> τοῦτο, not “this bread,” which would lead to consubstantiation. Thomas Aquinas and other scholastics lay stress on this difference, in proof that the bread as to its substance had disappeared, and given place to the body of Christ. The theory of consubstantiation, however, had its advocates among the mediæval schoolmen. See Steitz, in Herzog I., xvi. 347 sq.

After this, the doctrine of transubstantiation triumphed completely in the Western Church, and held its sway almost undisputed till the sixteenth century. It fell in with the magic supernaturalism and superstitious piety of mediæval Christianity. Thomas Aquinas has given it poetic expression in his famous hymn, Lauda Sion Salvatorem, for the Corpus Christi Festival. Thomas à Kempis, in his inimitable book on The Imitation of Christ, best represents the devotional use made of it by pious Catholics.

III. OPPOSITION.—The forerunners of the Reformation began the opposition, especially Wiclif, Hus, and Wessel. The Reformers were unanimous in rejecting transubstantiation as a fundamental error, contrary to Scripture, to reason, to the testimony of the senses, to the very nature of the sacrament, and leading to gross superstition and the adoration of the host (first prescribed by Cardinal Guido in Cologne, 1203). The last was denounced as downright idolatry (though it follows as a logical consequence from the doctrine that the very body and blood of our Lord are literally present on the altar).

There was, however, a serious difference among the Reformers in the extent of opposition. Luther, from conscientious conviction, adhered to the literal interpretation of the words of institution, the doctrine of the corporeal presence, and the fruition of the true body and blood of Christ by all communicants (though with different effect), but substituted for transubstantiation the idea of co-existence of body and blood “in, with, and under” bread and wine during the sacramental transaction; while Zwingli and Calvin gave up the literal interpretation, and the latter substituted for the idea of a corporeal presence the idea of a spiritual real presence, and for manducation by the mouth and the teeth a spiritual real fruition by faith alone. TRAPP, John, b. in 1601; d. at Weston-on-Avon, 1669, where he had been vicar since 1624. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford. Besides God's Love Tokens (London, 1637), he issued a Commentary on the entire Bible, in 5 vols. folio, 1651-56 (reprinted, edited by Revs. W. WEBSTER and HUGH MARTIN, with Memoir by Rev. A. B. GROSART, 1866-68, 5 vols. super royal 8vo). It is in some respects the best of the Puritan commentaries.

TRAPPISTS, The, are the members of an order in the Roman-Catholic Church which arose out of a Cistercian abbey founded by Count Rotrou of Perche, in 1140. This abbey, called “Notre Dame de la Maison Dieu,” lies in a damp, unhealthy valley, reached by a narrow and stony passage: hence the name La Trappe (“the trap”). The monks distinguished themselves by austerity until the fourteenth or fifteenth century, when they became so notorious for revelling, licentiousness, and robbery, as to win the title of the “Bandits of La Trappe.” This state of affairs continued till the middle of the seventeenth century, when the abbey passed into the hands of Dominique Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé, then (1636) a boy of ten years. The young abbot was well endowed with mental gifts, but abandoned himself to a wild career of sensual indulgence. Overcome by feelings of repentance, he went to the opposite extreme of austerity, retired to La Trappe, and, in spite of opposition on the part of the monks, carried through a rigid discipline. In order to do this, he introduced some Benedictine monks to his abbey.

Rancé's rules obliged the inmates of La Trappe to rise at two o'clock, and retire at seven in winter, eight in summer. They slept on sacks of straw, spent eleven hours daily in spiritual exercises, the rest of the time in hard work. During the hours of work, as in all their relations to one another, the monks observed almost absolute silence, and in greeting one another used the formula, Memento mori (“Remember that we must die”). Their wishes were made known through signs. Their fare was simple, consisting of vegetables, bread, and water. After the evening meal, the monks spent a short time in digging upon their future graves. Their garb was a long cloak with wide sleeves, of a gray color, and a black cap.

Rancé was opposed to literary pursuits, and expressed his views in the Traité de la sainteté et des devoirs de la vie monastique, 1683. He was answered by Mabillon, in his Traité des études monastiques, 1691. Rancé died Oct. 12, 1700. In 1692 Princess Louise of Condé founded a female branch of the order at Clacé, France; and branches were also established near Florence and Düsseldorf. The Revolution drove the Trappists out of France. They found refuge in Switzerland, where Augustin de Lestrange founded a cloister at Valsainte, canton of Freiburg. In 1798 it was destroyed by the French. Lestrange found a refuge in Warsaw and Cracow, Poland; but the Trappists were expelled from here in 1800, and, after various attempts to get a foothold in Germany and Italy, were put in possession of La Trappe after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1817. Lestrange was very active until his death (1827), and succeeded in establishing various branches of his order. In 1829 a royal order was issued, closing the Trappist houses; but nine remained, several of which, however, were closed in 1830. In 1844 the Trappists opened a house in Algiers, and in 1848 some of them emigrated to the United States. A branch of the order took the name of the "Trappist Preachers," in 1851. It does mission-work, and has its seat in the monastery of Pierrequi-Vire, near Avallon. [Since 1870 the Trappists have ceased to have legal existence in Italy and Switzerland. In 1803 a colony, under the direction of Lestrange himself, settled near Conewago, Penn. After different removals, it moved, in 1813, to Tracadie, N.S. In 1818, Trappists from La Meilleraie, in France, emigrated to Kentucky; and a second establishment has been founded near Dubuque, Io. TRAUTHSON, Johann Joseph, a distinguished ecclesiastic of the Roman-Catholic Church; was b. in Vienna, 1704; d. in Vienna, March 10, 1757. In 1751 he was made archbishop of Vienna, and in 1756 honored with a cardinal's cap by Benedict XIV. He caused a great deal of excitement by his pastoral letter of Jan. 1, 1751, in which he exalts the work and intercession of Christ at the expense of the intercession of the saints, and urges the proclamation of the central truths of the gospel. The letter called forth a number of writings from Protestants and Catholics. Trauthson, however, had no thought of protestantizing the Church. He succeeded in introducing some reforms, as the diminution of the number of holy days in his diocese. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

TREGELLES, Samuel Prideaux, LL.D., b. at Wodehouse Place, Falmouth, Jan. 30, 1813; d. at Plymouth, April 24, 1875. He was educated at the Falmouth classical school; was employed in the Neath Abbey Iron-works, Glamorganshire, 1828 to 1834; and in 1836 became private tutor at Falmouth. From early life he took an interest in New-Testament textual studies, and in his twenty-fifth year formed the design, to which he gave his life, of preparing a critical edition of the Greek New Testament, with a text derived from the oldest manuscript versions prior to the seventh century, and citations from early ecclesiastical writers, including Eusebius. In 1838 he issued a first specimen of his plan, and in June, 1844, the first instalment, — The Book of Revelation. He made three visits to the Continent (1845-46, 1849-50, 1862) to collate the ancient manuscripts. In 1845 he spent five months in Rome; but, although permitted to see, he was not allowed to collate, the Codex Vaticanus. In 1848 he published his Prospectus for a Critical Edition of the Greek New Testament, now in Preparation, with an Historical Sketch of the Printed Text (Plymouth, 27 pp.); but the first part of his great work, containing Matthew and Mark, did not appear until 1857 (London). By the side of the Greek he gives Jerome's Latin Version from personal collation of the Codex Amiatinus. He was stricken with paralysis in 1861, just after Part Second had appeared, and again in 1870, while at work upon Part Sixth (Revelation), which appeared in 1872. Part Seventh, containing the Prolegomena, and finishing the work, appeared in 1879, edited by Dr. Hort and A. W. Streane. Besides his Greek New Testament, Tregelles edited the Codex Zacynthius (1861) and the Canon Muratorianus (Cambridge and London, 1868); revised the manuscript and superintended the publication of The Englishman's Greek Concordance to the New Testament (London, 1839, 2d ed. 1844), Index to (1845), The Englishman's Hebrew and Chaldee Concordance to the Old Testament (1843, 2 vols.); translated Gesenius' Hebrew and Chaldee Lexicon (1847); wrote the 4th vol. of the 10th ed. of Horne's Introduction (1856), and the original, independent volumes, Remarks on the Prophetic Visions of the Book of Daniel, 1847, 4th ed. enlarged by Notes and Defence of the Authenticity of the Book, 1852; On the Original Language of St. Matthew's Gospel, 1850; The Jansenists, 1851; Lecture on the Historic Evidence of the Authorship and Transmission of the Books of the New Testament, 1851; Heads of Hebrew Grammar, 1852; Account of the Printed Text of the Greek New Testament, with Remarks on its Revision on Critical Principles, 1854.

Tregelles was of Quaker parentage, but in early life joined the Plymouth Brethren, from whom, however, he later separated himself. He was active in charitable and philanthropic enterprises. In 1850 he received the degree of LL.D. from the University of St. Andrews; in 1863 he was put upon the civil pension-list for one hundred pounds per annum, and later for two hundred. In 1870 he was invited to join the New-Testament Company of the English Revision Company; but ill health prevented him from attending. For a criticism upon his textual labors, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 277, and SCHAEFF: Companion to the Greek Testament (1883), pp. 262 sqq.

TREMELLIUS, Emmanuel, b. of Jewish parentage, at Ferrara, about 1510; d. at Sedan, 1580. He was converted to Romanism by Cardinal Pole, and to Protestantism by Peter Martyr, with whom he went to Strassburg, and thence to England in 1547, where he enjoyed the friendship of Cranmer and Parker, and taught Hebrew at Cambridge. When Queen Mary came to the throne (1553) he went to Germany, and taught Hebrew at Hornbach, Heidelberg, some time at Metz, and finally was appointed professor of Hebrew at the university of Sedan. His fame rests upon his elegant Latin version of the Bible, which appeared in parts, between 1575 and 1579, at Frankfort-on-the-Main (2 vols.); New-Testament part reprinted in London, 1580; best edition of whole work, Hanau, 1621. In it he was aided by his son-in-law, the elder Francis Junius, who in the second edition joined to it Tremellius' version of the Syriac New Testament (Paris, 1569), and Beza's of the Greek (Geneva, 1590).

TRENT, Council of (Concilium Tridentinum), the nineteenth, or, according to another reckoning, the eighteenth, of the œcumenical councils recognized by the Roman-Catholic Church; so called from Trent (Tridentum), a city in the southern and Italian part of the Tyrol, where it was held, with interruptions, from Dec. 13, 1515, to Dec. 4, 1563. In a doctrinal and disciplinary point of view, it is the most important council in the history of the Roman Church, and fixed her character, and relation to the Protestant evangelical churches. It produced her highest standards of faith and practice, which have since been supplemented by the Vatican Council (in 1870). It was called forth by the Reformation of the sixteenth century, and demanded by both parties in the contest, but was again and again postponed by the policy of the papal court. Finally it was convened as an exclusively Roman council, by order of Pope Paul III., at Trent (at that time a free city of the Holy Roman Empire under a prince-bishop), on Dec. 13, 1515; transferred to Bologna in March, 1547, from fear of the plague; indefinitely prorogued, Sept. 17, 1549; re-opened at Trent, May 1, 1551, by Pope Julius III.; broken up by the sudden victory of Elector Maurice of Saxony over the emperor, Charles V., and his march into Tyrol, April 28, 1552; recalled by Pius IV., for the last time, Jan. 18, 1562, when it continued to its final adjournment, in Dec. 4, 1563. It closed with "Anathema to all heretics, anathema, anathema." The history of the council is divided into three distinct periods, — from 1515 to 1549, from 1551 to 1552, and from 1562 to 1563. The last was the most important.

The decrees and canons of the council were confirmed by a bull of Pope Pius IV., Jan. 26, 1564. This bull enjoins strict obedience upon all Catholics, and forbids, under pain of excommunication, all unauthorized interpretation, reserving this to the Pope alone, and threatening the disobedient with "the indignation of Almighty God and of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul." The number of attending members in the three periods varied considerably. It increased toward the close, but never reached the number of the first œcumenical council at Nicaea (which had three hundred and eighteen members), nor of the last of the Vatican (which numbered seven hundred and sixty-four). The decrees were signed by two hundred and fifty-five members, including four papal legates, two cardinals, three patriarchs, twenty-five archbishops, a hundred and sixty-eight bishops, two-thirds of them being Italians. Lists of the signers are added to the best editions of the decrees.

The object of the council was twofold. (1) To condemn the principles and doctrines of Protestantism, and to define the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church on all disputed points. It is true the emperor intended it to be a strictly general or truly œcumenical council, at which the Protestants should have a fair hearing. Melanchthon and Brentius, with some other German Lutherans, actually started in 1552 on a journey to Trent; but they were refused a deliberative voice, and their mission was an entire failure. (2) To effect a reformation of discipline, which was admitted by all honest and earnest Catholics to have fallen into such deplorable decay as to explain, if not to justify, the Reformation.

Twenty-five public sessions were held, but about half of them were spent in solemn formalities. The chief work was done in committees or congregations. The entire management was in the hands of the papal delegates. The court of Rome, by diplomacy and intrigue, outwitted all the liberal elements. The council abolished some crying abuses, and introduced or recommended disciplinary reforms as regards the sale of indulgences, the morals of convents, the education of the clergy. In this respect the Reformation produced a salutary effect upon the Roman Church itself, as is admitted by the best historians of that church. But in regard to the department of doctrine, although liberal evangelical sentiments were uttered by some of the ablest members in favor of the supreme authority of the Scriptures, and justification by faith, no concession whatever was made to Protestantism.

The doctrinal decisions of the council are divided into decrees (decreta), which contain the positive statement of the Roman dogmas, and into short canons (canones), which condemn the dissenting Protestant views with the concluding "anathema sit." They are stated with great clearness, precision, and wisdom. The decree on justification betrays special ability and theological circumspection. The Protestant doctrines, however, are almost always exhibited in an exaggerated form, and mixed up with real heresies, which Protestants condemn as emphatically as the Church of Rome.

The following is a list, in chronological order, of the articles of faith which were settled by the council in favor of the views held ever since by the Roman-Catholic Church: —

SESSION III. (Feb. 4, 1546). — Decree on the symbol of faith (the Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed as a basis of the following decrees).

SESSION IV. (April 8, 1546). — Decree on the Scriptures (including the Apocrypha) and church tradition, which are declared to be the joint rules of faith. The Latin Vulgate is put on a par with the original text.

SESSION V. (June 17, 1546). — On original sin.

SESSION VI. (Jan. 13, 1547). — On (progressive) justification by faith and good works, in opposition to justification by faith alone.

SESSION VII. (March 3, 1547). — On the seven sacraments in general, and some canons on baptism and confirmation.

SESSION XIII. (Oct. 11, 1551). — On the sacrament of the Eucharist.

SESSION XIV. (Nov. 25, 1551). — On the sacraments of penance and extreme unction.

SESSION XXI. (July 16, 1562). — On communion under both kinds, and the withdrawal of the cup from the laity.

SESSION XXII. (Sept. 17, 1562). — Doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

SESSION XXIII. (July 15, 1563). — Sacrament of ordination.

SESSION XXIV. (Nov. 11, 1563). — Sacrament of matrimony.

SESSION XXV. (Dec. 3 and 4, 1563). — Decrees approving the scholastic doctrines of purgatory, the invocation, veneration, and the relics of saints and sacred images, also on the selection of food, fasts, festive days, and providing for an index of prohibited books, catechism, breviary, and missal, to be issued under the direction of the Pope.

The council was acknowledged in Italy, Portugal, Spain, France, the Low Countries, Poland, and the Roman-Catholic portion of the German Empire, but mostly with a reservation of the royal prerogatives. In France it was never published in form, and was only recognized in its doctrinal part. No attempt was made to introduce it into England. Pius IV. sent the decrees to Mary, Queen of Scots, with a letter, dated June 13, 1564, requesting her to publish them in Scotland; but she dared not do it in the face of John Knox and the Reformation.

The canons and decrees of the council were first published by Paul Manutius (Rome, 1564), and often since in different languages. Best Latin edition by Le Plat (1779), and by Schulte and Richter (Lips., 1853); best English edition by Rev. J. Waterworth (with a history of the council, Lond., 1848).

The original acts and debates of the council, as prepared by its general secretary, Bishop Angelo Massarelli, in six large folio volumes, are deposited in the Vatican Library, and remained there unpublished for more than three hundred years, until they were brought to light at last, though only in part, by Augustin Theiner, priest of the oratory (d. 1874), in Acta genuina SS. Œcum. Concilii Tridentini nunc primum integre edita, Lips., 1874, 2 vols. Most of the official documents and private reports, however, which bear upon the council, were made known in the sixteenth century and since. The most complete collection of them is that of Le Plat: Monum. ad Histor. Conc. Trident., Lovan., 1781-87, in 7 vols. New materials have been brought to light by Mendham (1834 and 1846) from the manuscript history of Cardinal Paleotto, and more recently by Sickel (Actenstücke aus österreichischen Archiven, Wien, 1872), and by Dr. Dollinger (Ungedruckte Berichte und Tagebücher zur Geschichte des Conc. von Trident, Nördlingen, 1876, 2 parts).

The history of the council was written chiefly by two able and learned Catholics of very different spirit,—the liberal, almost semi-Protestant monk FRA PAOLO SARPI of Venice (Istoria del Concilio Tridentino, first, London, 1619, and repeatedly since in Italian, Latin, French, and German; best ed., with notes by COURAYER, Amsterdam, 1751, 3 vols.; Eng. trans. by Sir N. BRENT, 1619, also 1676), and, in the interest of the Papacy, by Cardinal SFORZA PALLAVICINO, who had access to all the archives of Rome (Istoria del Concilio di Trento, Rome, 1656-57, 2 vols. fol., and other eds. Rome, 1665, Milan, 1717, 3 vols. 4to; Latin trans. by J. B. GUTTINO, Antwerp, 1673, fol.). Both accounts must be compared to get a full view. For a criticism of both, see RANKE's History of the Popes, Appendix, and BRISCHAK's Beurtheilung, etc. (Tübing., 1844). WESSENBERG, a liberal Catholic, gives a history in the third and fourth volumes of his work, Die grossen Kirchenversammlungen des 15<sup>ten</sup> und 16<sup>ten</sup> Jahrh. (Constance, 1840). Professor (now Bishop) HEFELE intended at first to carry his valuable History of the Councils (Conciliengeschichte) down to the Council of Trent, but gave it up at last for reasons assigned in his Preface to vol. vii. part ii. (1874), and stopped with the Councils of Basel and Florence. Among Protestant historians of the Council of Trent we mention SALIG (1741-45, 3 vols.), DANZ (1816), J. A. BUCKLEY (London, 1852), BUNGENER (in French; Eng. trans. by D. S. SCOTT, Edinburgh, 1855; republished by McCLINTOCK, New York). Dr. PUSEY discusses the doctrinal articles in his Eirenicon. On the Tridentine Standards, see SCHAFF: History of the Creeds of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 90-100, and vol. ii. 77-210. A good sketch of the Council is given in the fifth volume of GIESELER'S Church History (Eng. trans. by HENRY B. SMITH and MARY A. ROBINSON, N.Y., 1880), pp. 21-44, with judicious extracts from the sources. Cf. KÖLLNER'S Symbolik, vol. i. 8-60, the art. "Trienter Concil.," by H. SCHMIDT, in the first edition of HERZOG, vol. xvi. 369-394, and Cardinal HERGENRÖTHER'S Kirchengeschichte (2d ed.), vol. ii. pp. 402-422. See also TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH. PHILIP SCHAFF.

TRESPASS OFFERING. See OFFERINGS.

TREVES, Holy Coat of. This coat, preserved in the Cathedral of Treves, is said to be the seamless garment mentioned in John xix. 23. There are several traditions about it. In the thirteenth century the story went, that Mary spun the garment out of wool, and that Jesus wore it uninterruptedly till the day of his death. Herod then gave it to a Jew, who threw it into the sea. It was thrown up on the shore, and picked up by a pilgrim, who cast it back again into the water. A whale swallowed it; but a fisherman recovered it, and sold it to King Orendel of Treves. This king put it on, and, as long as he wore it, was invincible. Among the other legends is the one that a maiden carried the garment into Treves; and, as she approached the city, all the bells began tolling at once. It is claimed that the mention of the garment occurs in the Gesta Trevirorum (467 or 327). But we have no mention of it till 1054. The notice seems to have been inserted in the Gesta Trevirorum, under the Abbot Thiofrid of Echternach, between 1106 and 1124. The coat was first used at the consecration of Archbishop Bruno, Oct. 23, 1121. It was allowed to remain at rest till 1512. Then, and at a later time, it was presented for worship. Luther refers to the matter as a shameful and foolish travesty. It was again displayed for worship from Aug. 18 to Oct. 7, 1844. The bishops of Metz, Cologne, Limburg, and many others, attended the spectacle; and miracles, so it was pretended, were wrought upon some of the devout visitors. This superstitious scene became the occasion for the German Catholic movement of Ronge (see art.), and for a thorough investigation of the legend of the coat. It was discovered that twenty other seamless coats compete for the honor of having been worn by Christ. See GILDMESTER and V. SYBILLE: D. heil. Rock zu Trier und d. zwanzig anderen heil. ungenähten Röcke, Düsseldorf, 1844; BINTERIM: Zeugnisse für d. Aechtheit d. heil. Rocks zu Trier, Düsseldorf, 1845, etc. NEUDECKER.

TRIALS, the name given to the examinations and literary exercises required, in the Presbyterian Church, of all candidates for the ministry. These are examined in Greek and Hebrew, systematic theology, church history and polity, and required to present a sermon, a lecture, a Latin thesis, and an exegetical essay.

TRIBES OF ISRAEL. The Israelitish people, the house of Jacob or Israel, was divided into twelve tribes (Heb. matloth or shebatim). The two Hebrew words are thus distinguished: the first denotes the tribes according to their genealogical relation as branches of a people; the second, as corporations and political powers. The tribes are enumerated according to their progenitors. As Joseph received a double portion in Ephraim and Manasseh, there were, strictly speaking, thirteen tribes; but, on account of the peculiar position of the tribe of Levi, the number twelve is preserved, as may already be seen from the order during the wandering in the wilderness (Num. ii. x. 13 sq.). In the midst, round the tabernacle, we find the priests and the three families of Levites, and then, towards the region of the sky, the twelve tribes in four triads, each led by a prince. The triads are formed with reference to the maternal relationship: (1) Judah, Issachar, Zebulon; (2) Reuben, Simon, Gad; (3) Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin; (4) Dan, Asher, Naphtali. The number twelve is also regarded as the division of the country, since Levi received no portion. Where, however, as in the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix.) and of Moses (Deut. xxxiii.), Levi is mentioned with the other tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh are mentioned only as one tribe, — Joseph: thus Ezek. xlviii., where the future division of the country is spoken of (1-7, 23-28), Ephraim and Manasseh are numbered as two tribes. Where, however, the twelve gates of the new Jerusalem are to be named after the twelve tribes (30-35), Levi is also counted in, and Joseph is only mentioned as one tribe.

The tribes were again divided into families [mishpachoth, οἰμοί], these, again, into households [batim, οἶκοι], then came "man by man" (Josh. vii. 14, 17 sq.). At the head of the tribes stood the princes (Exod. xxxiv. 31; Num. i. 16, 41, vii. 12 sq.), who were also called the heads of the tribes (Num. xxx. 1). Then came the chief of the house of the fathers (Num. iii. 21, 30). This tribal constitution, which developed itself during the stay of the people in Egypt, was not abolished by Moses, but rather received into the theocratic order. The people of the covenant was to have its normal continuance in the number twelve of its tribes: hence every thing was avoided whereby a tribe could be destroyed out of Israel (Judg. xxi. 17). Each Israelite is a citizen of the theocracy, because he belongs to one of the families of the twelve tribes: hence the importance of the list of generations. The Mosaic law contains enactments which tend towards the preservation of the integrity of the generations and families, since each family was to remain in its heritage. The chiefs or elders of the house also were drawn into the service of theocracy, because out of the midst of them the judges were taken (Deut. i. 15); and the commission of the Seventy was formed, who was to assist Moses. Twelve of them are commissioned with the numbering of the people (Num. i. 4, 16); the same number was sent to search the Holy Land (Num. xiii. 2); and, for the division of the land, twelve chiefs of the tribes were also appointed (Num. xxxiv. 18 sq.).

When the Holy Land was taken, the division was made in such a manner that the boundary lines of each tribe were not only fixed, but that also within these lines each family received a certain portion of real estate. Upon such a basis the tribal constitution could endure all storms of the coming centuries; but it also favored, where there was lack in the government of theocratic order, particularism at the expense of nationalism. This we see in the time of the judges (Judg. v. 15-17).

[With the exception of the tribe of Levi (for which see the art. LEVITES), the land of Canaan was divided among the other tribes as follows: —

1. Asher (i.e., "happy") was the eighth son of Jacob, and his second by Zilpah (Gen. xxxv. 26). He had four sons and one daughter (Gen. xlii. 17). After the exodus the number of adult males in that tribe was 11,500; but, before entering Canaan, the number was raised to 53,100 (Num. i. 40, xxvi. 41). In the reign of David the tribe had become so insignificant, that its name is altogether omitted from the list of the chief rulers (1 Chron. xxvii. 16-22). The territory assigned to the Asherites comprised the fertile plain of Acre, and the coast of Phœnicia up to Sidon (Josh. xix. 24-31); but for a long time they were unable to gain possession of the territory actually assigned them, and "dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land" (Judg. i. 32). In the struggle against Sisera, Asher forgot the peril of his fellows (Judg. v. 17, 18): he also furnished neither hero nor judge to the nation. One bright name is that of Anna, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser (Luke ii. 36).

2. Benjamin (i.e., "son of my right hand"), also called Benoni (i.e., "son of my pain"), youngest son of Jacob by Rachel (Gen. xxxv. 18); was born on the road between Bethel and Bethlehem, where his mother died. How he was sent into Egypt, and what policy Joseph used to retain him, we read in Gen. xliii., xliv. When the mustering was held in the desert, the tribe of Benjamin counted 35,400 warriors (Num. i. 36, ii. 22), and at the entrance of Israel into Canaan even as many as 45,600 (Num. xxvi. 38 sq.). The territory which was occupied by this tribe (Josh. xviii. 11 sq.) was a narrow strip bounded on the east by the Jordan; and from thence it mainly extended to Kirjath-jearim, about six miles west of Jerusalem; while in other directions it stretched from the valley of Hinnom on the south to Bethel on the north. Thus Dan intervened between this tribe and the Philistines. In this territory lay Jericho, Beth-hogla, Bethel, Gibeon, Ramah, and Jebus, or Jerusalem. In the time of the judges the tribe of Benjamin, whose emblem according to Jacob's blessing was the wolf (Gen. xlix. 27), became involved in a civil war with the other tribes, which almost extinguished the tribe (Judg. xix.-xxi.). But it revived again, and in the time of David it numbered 59,131 able warriors (1 Chron. vii. 6-12); in that of Asa, 280,000 (2 Chron. xiv. 8); and in that of Jehoshaphat, 200,000 (2 Chron. xvii. 17). It furnished a deliverer in the person of Ehud, who killed the king of the Moabites, Eglon (Judg. iii. 12 sq.); and the first king in the person of Saul (1 Sam. ix., x.), whose dynasty (2 Sam. ii.), as well as that of David (1 Kings xii. 21; 1 Chron. xxi.), it supported. At the division of the kingdom after Solomon's death, it belonged to the southern kingdom. After the exile, together with the tribe of Judah, it constituted the flower of the new Jewish colony in Palestine (Ez. i. 5, iv. 1, x. 9). To the tribe of Benjamin also belonged Mordecai and Esther (Esth. ii. 5), more especially that "Saul who also is called Paul" (Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5).

3. Dan (i.e., "judge"), fifth son of Jacob, by Bilhah (Gen. xxx. 6). He was the last of the tribes to receive his portion; and that portion, strange as it appears in the face of the numbers, — 62,700 at the first mustering (Num. i. 39), and 64,400 at the second (Num. xxvi. 43), — was the smallest of the twelve. On the north and east it was completely embraced by Ephraim and Benjamin, while on the south-east and south it joined Judah. On the west it was bounded by the Mediterranean. The boldness of the tribe is characterized by the taking of Laish (Judg. xviii.). In the time of David, Dan still kept its place among the tribes (1 Chron. xii. 35). After this time the name of Dan as applied to the tribe vanishes. It is also omitted from the list of those who were sealed by the angel in the vision of John (Rev. vii. 5-7). A Danite was Samson (q. v.).

4. Ephraim (i.e., "fruitful"), son of Joseph (Gen. xli. 52), whom Jacob preferred to Manasseh (Gen. xlviii. 14). By virtue of the blessing, Jacob adopted Ephraim and his brother Manasseh as his own sons, in the place of their father; the object being to give to Joseph, through his sons, a double portion. At the census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 40,500 (Num. i. 32, 33), but subsequently, however, only 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 37). The territory allotted to Ephraim was bounded on the west by the Mediterranean Sea, and the River Jordan on the east; on the north it had the half-tribe of Manasseh; and on the south, Benjamin and Dan. This fine country included most of what was afterwards called Samaria, as distinguished from Judaea on the one hand, and from Galilee on the other. Ephraim plays an important part in the history of the Jewish nation. It produced the successor of Moses (Joshua), chastised the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), quarrelled with Gideon (Judg. viii. 1) and Jephthah (Judg. xii.), revolted from the house of David (1 Kings xii. 25; 2 Chron. x. 16), and formed the kingdom of Israel, or, as it is also called, the northern kingdom, in opposition to the kingdom of Judah, or the southern kingdom, to which the tribes of Judah and Benjamin belonged. At last Ephraim was carried into captivity (2 Kings xvii. 5; for prophecies concerning the same, see Isa. vii., ix. 9, xi. 13, xxviii. 1; Jer. xxxi. 1; Hos. v.-xiv.; Zech. ix. 10, x. 7).

5. Gad (i.e., "fortune"), Jacob's seventh son, the first-born of Zilpah, and brother of Asher; is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 19) and by Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 20). His descendants (Gen. xlv. 16) are twice numbered (Num. i. 24, xxvi. 15). The territory allotted to Gad was the region between Heshbon and the River Jabbok, together with an additional strip along the east bank of the Jordan, extending up to the Sea of Chinnereth (Josh. xiii. 24-28). Gad is commended by Joshua (Josh. xxii. 1), but accused of idolatry (Josh. xxii. 11 sq.). The character of the tribe was warlike (Gen. xlix. 19; 1 Chron. xii. 8). It was carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser

(1 Chron. v. 26). Perhaps that Elijah the Tishbite, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," belonged to that tribe.

6. Issachar (i.e., "reward"), the ninth son of Jacob, and the fifth of Leah (Gen. xxx. 18, xxxv. 23). When the tribe was first numbered, it had 54,400 men (Num. i. 28); at the second mustering, 64,300 (Num. xxvi. 25). In David's time the tribe had 87,000 fighting men (1 Chron. vii. 5). His territory was the noble plain of Esdraelon, a territory, however, whose fertility was more than overbalanced by its exposed situation (Josh. xix. 17-23). One among the judges of Israel was from Issachar, — Tola (Judg. x. 1). When Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, had invaded the north of Palestine, and had taken Samaria, Issachar, with the rest of Israel, was carried away to his distant dominions. Allusion is also made to this tribe in Rev. vii. 7.

7. Joseph (i.e., "increase"). See Ephraim and Manasseh.

8. Judah (i.e., "praise"), the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxix. 35). For his character, life, etc., comp. Gen. xxxviii., xliii. 3, xlv. sq. The important position which Judah was to occupy in the future is indicated in the final blessing of his blessing, which was conveyed in lofty language, glancing far into futurity, and strongly indicative of the high destinies which awaited the tribe that was to descend from him (Gen. xlix. 8-12). Judah's sons were five. Of these, three, — Shelah, Pharez, and Zerah, — together with two sons of Pharez, went into Egypt. When the Israelites quitted that country, the tribe of Judah numbered 74,600 adult males (Num. i. 26, 27); at the second mustering, 76,500 (Num. xxvi. 22). Its representative amongst the spies, and also amongst those appointed to partition the land, was the great Caleb (Num. xiii. 6, xxxiv. 19). After Joshua's death this tribe is appointed to attack the Canaanites (Judg. i.). The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xv. 20-63. The whole of the extensive region was from a very early date divided into four main regions: (1) The Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah," with thirty-eight (or, according to the Septuagint, with forty-eight) towns (Josh. xv. 48-60); (2) The Wilderness, the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 61 sq.); (3) The South (Josh. xv. 21 sq.), containing twenty-nine cities with their dependent villages (Josh. xv. 20-32), which, with Ether and Ashan in the mountains, were ceded to Simeon (Josh. xix. 1-9); (4) The Lowland (Josh. xv. 33 sq.), or the Shephelah, between the Mountain and the Mediterranean Sea, the garden and the granary of the tribe. But this very tract was, for the greater part, in the hands of the Philistines. To this tribe belonged Othniel (Judg. iii. 9) and Ilzan (Judg. xii. 8 sq.). It made David king (2 Sam. ii. 4), and adhered to his house (1 Kings xii.; 2 Chron. x., xii.); and after the disruption of the kingdom, together with Benjamin, it formed the southern kingdom, in opposition to the northern or Ephraimitic kingdom, to which the ten tribes belonged. To Judah's tribe belonged prophets, like Amos, Isaiah, Micah, perhaps, also, Obadiah, Joel, Nahum, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, and others.

After the exile most of those who returned belonged to that tribe: in consequence, the name "Judah" (or Jew) attached itself to the entire nation from about the epoch of the Restoration. Thus we also find the name "Jews" in Jeremiah (xxxiv. 9). More frequently this name occurs in the post-exile books, also in the New Testament. The highest honor which was bestowed upon that tribe consists in the fact that to it belonged the Messiah of the world, "the Lion of the tribe of Juda" (Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5).

9. Manassch (i.e., "causing forgetfulness"), the elder of the two sons of Joseph (Gen. xli. 51). At the beginning this tribe was the smallest, — it only numbered 32,200 (Num. i. 31 sq.); but it afterwards increased to 52,700 (Num. xxvi. 29). At the distribution of the country, one half of the tribe settled east of the Jordan, to which was allotted all Bashan, and part of Gilead; while the other half settled west of the Jordan, which, together with Ephraim, occupied a territory reaching from the Jordan to the sea, and from Bethel to the border of Esdraelon (Josh. xvi., xvii.). In addition to this large mountain territory, the cities of Beth-shean, Taanach, Megiddo, and a few others situated in Esdraelon, were allotted to them. As Manassites, may be mentioned Gideon and Jephthah. Some of them fell to the house of David (1 Chron. ix. 3, xii. 19; 2 Chron. xv. 9, xxx. 11). The fate which befell Gad and Reuben awaited them in the end (1 Chron. v. 26).

10. Naphtali (i.e., "wrestling"), the sixth son of Jacob, and his second by Bilhah (Gen. xxx. 8, xxxv. 23); blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 21) and Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 23); his descendants (Gen. xli. 24) numbered (Num. i. 42, x. 27, xiii. 14, xxvi. 48; Judg. i. 33); subdue the Canaanites (Judg. iv. 10, v. 18, vi. 35, vii. 23). Their inheritance was in the mountains of the northern border (Josh. xix. 32–39), and made them in a great measure isolated from the Israelitish kingdoms. Barak is the one great hero whom Naphtali is recorded to have produced. Tobit also belonged to his tribe (Tob. i. 5, vii. 3), which was also carried captive by Tiglath-pileser to Assyria (2 Kings xv. 29). After the captivity, the Jews again settled largely in Naphtali; and its southern section became the most densely populated district in Palestine. It became the principal scene, also, of our Lord's public labors, fulfilling the prophecy of Isa. ix. 1.

11. Reuben (i.e., "behold, a son"), Jacob's first-born child, the son of Leah (Gen. xxix. 32, xxx. 14); loses his birthright (Gen. xlix. 4; 1 Chron. v. 1) for his transgression (Gen. xxxv. 22); he intercedes for Joseph (Gen. xxxvii. 21, xlii. 22), and entreats Jacob (Gen. xlii. 37). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 21, ii. 10, xxvi. 5; 1 Chron. v. 18), and their request for land beyond the Jordan is granted (Num. xxxii.; Deut. iii. 12; Josh. xiii. 15); Moses' charge to them (Num. xxxii. 20), and his blessing (Deut. xxxiii. 6); Joshua's charge to them (Josh. i. 12); commended and dismissed by him (Josh. xxii. 1). They build an altar for a memorial (Josh. xxii. 10), and justify themselves when accused (Josh. xxii. 21). The tableland (miskor) extending from the Arnon to Heshbon was the territory occupied by them (Josh. xiii. 15 sq.). Immediately after the captivity (1 Chron. v. 26), the Moabites again returned to their old country, and occupied their old cities. This is the reason why, in the later prophets, many of the cities of Reuben are embraced in the curses pronounced upon Moab (Jer. xlviii.).

12. Simeon (i.e., "a hearing" by Jehovah), the second of Jacob's sons by Leah (Gen. xxix. 33); avenges Dinah's dishonor (Gen. xxxiv. 7, 25); is detained by Joseph (Gen. xlii. 24); Jacob's prophecy concerning him (Gen. xlix. 5). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 22, xxvi. 12), and receive a section on the south, which was originally allotted to Judah. To that tribe belonged Judith, who prays to "the Lord God of her father Simeon" (Jud. ix. 2). Simeon is mentioned by Ezekiel (xlviii. 25), and in the Book of Revelation (vii. 7), in their catalogues of the restoration of Israel.

13. Zebulun (i.e., "dwelling"), the sixth and last son of Leah, and the tenth-born to Jacob (Gen. xxx. 20, xxxv. 23); is blessed by Jacob (Gen. xlix. 13) and Moses (Deut. xxxiii. 18). His descendants are numbered (Num. i. 30, xxvi. 26), and receive their lot amid the picturesque hills and plains of Lower Galilee, having Tabor on the east and the great sea at the base of Carmel on the west (Josh. xix. 10–16). In the great campaign and victory of Barak it bore a prominent part (Judg. iv. 6, 10), and Deborah praises Zebulun and Naphtali as a people that jeopardized their lives unto the death (Judg. v. 18). This tribe also came to Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxx. 11, 18); and though it appears to have shared the fate of the other northern tribes at the invasion of the country by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xvii. 18, 24 sq.), yet the land of Zebulun occupied a distinguished place in New-Testament times (comp. Isa. ix. 1, 2; Matt. iv. 15, 16). In the visions of Ezekiel (xlviii. 26–33) and of John (Rev. vii. 8), this tribe finds its due mention.]

For prophecy, the re-union of the twelve tribes under one head forms an important part of the future salvation (Hos. ii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 22); and, since the bringing-back of the tribes as such is predicted (see especially Ezek. xlvii.), their continuance is naturally presupposed. The same is also historically guaranteed for the following centuries (1 Chron. v. 26). The tribal constitution was continued in the gala [i.e., "dispersion"], for (Jer. xxix. 1; Ezek. xiv. 1, xx. 1) the elders of the people are mentioned; and among those who returned from the exile we meet with the chief of the fathers (Ez. ii. 68, iv. 2), from whom went forth the princes and elders (Ez. v. 9, vi. 7, x. 8; Neh. x. 1). That those who returned regarded themselves as representatives of all the tribes, we see from Ez. vi. 17, where twelve he-goats are offered for a sin-offering for all Israel (cf. also Ez. viii. 35). That in the new commonwealth each had to show his pedigree is seen from Ez. ii. 59 sq.; and priests who could not prove their pedigree were suspended from priestly functions; but for the rest we are not told that those who "could not show their father's house and their seed, whether they were of Israel," were excluded from the congregation. According to Ez. vi. 21, Neh. x. 29, there were also proselytes, "who had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land to seek the Lord God of Israel." That at all times a dis-

tion of the different tribes was tried, we see from the list as given by Neh. xi. But this list only contains those who belonged to Judah, Benjamin, and Levi: the others are comprehended under the indefinite term sh'aur Israel ["the residue of Israel," xi. 20]. The genealogies of such as belonged to the ten tribes might have been lost, yet a woman of the tribe of Aser is mentioned Luke ii. 36.

TRICHOTOMY means the division of human nature into three parts. — body, soul, and spirit (σῶμα, ψυχή, and πνεῦμα), — in contradistinction to dichotomy, the division into two parts, — body and soul. The trichotomic view is found in the New Testament (1 Thess. v. 23), and is advocated by Origen and many German divines; while Tertullian and Augustine, and many English divines, adopt the dichotomic theory, making, however, a distinction between the animal soul and the rational soul. See DELITZSCH (Eng. trans., Edinb., 1867) and BECK (Eng. trans., Edinb., 1877), on biblical psychology, and J. B. HEARD: The Trichotomic Nature of Man, Edinb., 3d ed., 1870.

TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH (Professio Fidei Tridentinæ), or the Creed of Pius IV. The original name was Forma professionis fidei catholicæ, et orthodoxæ fidei. It is the shortest, but practically the most important, creed-statement of the Roman-Catholic Church. It must be subscribed or sworn to by all priests and public teachers of that church, and also by Protestant converts (hence called the "Profession of Converts"). It was suggested by the synod of Trent, and prepared, by order of Pope Pius IV. in 1564, by a college of cardinals. It is a very clear and precise summary of the specific doctrines of the Roman Church as settled by the Council of Trent, and put in the form of a binding oath of obedience to the Pope, as the successor of the Prince of the apostles, and the Vicar of Christ. It consists of the following twelve Articles, including the Nicene Creed, with the Western clause Filioque: —

"1. Ego, —, firma fide credo et profiteor omnia et singula, que continentur in symbolo fidei, quo sancta Romanæ Ecclesiæ utitur, videlicet:

"Credo in unum Deum. Patrem omnipotentem, etc. [Symbolum Næanum.]

"2. Apostolicæ et ecclesiasticæ traditiones, reliquasque ejusdem Ecclesiæ observationes et constitutiones firmissime admitto et amplector.

"3. Item sacram Scripturam juxta eam sensum, quem tenuit et tenet sancta mater Ecclesiæ, cujus est judicare de vero sensu et interpretatione sacram Scripturarum, admittit; nec eam unquam nisi juxta unanimum consensum patrum accipiam et interpretabor.

"1. I, —, with a firm faith believe and profess all and every one of the things contained in that creed which the holy Roman Church makes use of.

"I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, etc. [Here follows the Nicene Creed.]

"2. I most steadfastly admit and embrace the apostolic and ecclesiastic traditions, and all other observances and constitutions of the same Church.

"3. I also admit the holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother Church has held and does hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures; neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

"4. Profiteor quoque, septem esse vere et proprie sacramenta novæ legis à Jesu Christo Domino nostro instituta, atque ad salutem humani generis, licet non omnia singulis, necessaria: scilicet baptismum, confirmationem, eucharistiam, penitentiam, extremum unctionem, ordinem et matrimonium; illaque gratiam conferre; et ex his baptismum, confirmationem et ordinem sine sacrilegio reiterare non posse. Receptos quoque et approbatos Ecclesiæ Catholicæ ritus in supradictorum omnium sacramentorum solemnè administratione recipio et admitto.

"5. Omnia et singula, quæ de peccato originali et de justificatione in sacrosancta Tridentina synodo definita et declarata fuerunt, amplector et recipio.

"6. Profiteor pariter, in missa offerri Deo verum, proprium et propitiatorium sacrificium pro vivis et defunctis; atque in sanctissimo eucharisticæ sacramento esse vere, realiter et substantialiter corpus et sanguinem, una cum anima et divinitate Domini nostri Jesu Christi, ferique conversionem totius substantiæ panis in corpus et totius substantiæ vini in sanguinem; quam conversionem Catholicæ Ecclesiæ transsubstantiationem appellat.

"7. Fateor etiam, sub altera tantum specie totum atque integrum Christum, verumque sacramentum sumi.

"8. Constantiter teneo, purgatorium esse, animasque ibi detentas fidelium suffragiis juvari. Similiter et sanctos una cum Christo regnantes venerandos atque invocandos esse, eosque orationes Deo pro nobis offerre, atque eorum reliquias esse venerandas.

"9. Firmissime assero, imagines Christi ac Deipræ semper Virginis, nec non aliorum sanctorum habendas et retinendas esse, atque eis debitum honorem ac venerationem impertiendam. Indulgentiarum etiam potestatem à Christo in Ecclesiâ relictam fuisse, illarumque usum Christiano populo maxime salutarem esse affirmo.

"10. Sanctam Catholicam et Apostolicam Romanam Ecclesiam omnium ecclesiarum matrem et magistrum agnosco, Romanoque pontifici, beati Petri apostolorum principis successori ac Jesu Christi vicario, veram obedientiam spondeo ac juro.

"11. Cætera item omnia à sacris canonibus et œcumenicis conciliis, ac præcipue à sacrosancta Tridentina synodo tradita, definita et declarata indubitanter recipio atque profiteor; simulque contraria omnia, atque hæreses quasquæ ab Ecclesiâ damnatas, rejectas et anathematizadas ego pariter damno, rejicio et anathematizo.

"12. Hanc veram Catholicam fidem, extra quam salvus esse potest, quam in præsentî sponte profiteor et veraciter teneo, eandem, integram et inviolatam usque ad

"4. I also profess that there are truly and properly seven sacraments of the new law, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord, and necessary for the salvation of mankind, though not all for every one, to wit: baptism, confirmation, the eucharist, penance, extreme unction, holy orders, and matrimony; and that they confer grace; and that of these, baptism, confirmation, and ordination cannot be reiterated without sacrilege. I also receive and admit the received and approved ceremonies of the Catholic Church, used in the solemn administration of the aforesaid sacraments.

"5. I embrace and receive all and every one of the things which have been defined and declared in the holy Council of Trent concerning original sin and justification.

"6. I profess, likewise, that in the mass there is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead; and that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ; and that there is made a change of the whole essence of the bread into the body, and of the whole essence of the wine into the blood; which change the Catholic Church calls transubstantiation.

"7. I also confess that under either kind alone Christ is received whole and entire, and a true sacrament.

"8. I firmly hold that there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful. Likewise, that the saints reigning with Christ are to be honored and invoked, and that they offer up prayers to God for us, and that their relics are to be had in veneration.

"9. I most firmly assert that in the images of Christ, and of the perpetual Virgin the Mother of God, and also of other saints, ought to be had and retained, and that due honor and veneration are to be given them. I also affirm that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the Church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people.

"10. I acknowledge the holy Catholic Apostolic Roman Church for the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome, successor to St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles, and Vicar of Jesus Christ.

"11. I likewise undoubtingly receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the Sacred Canons and General Councils, and particularly by the holy Council of Trent; and I condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies which the Church has condemned, rejected, and anathematized.

"12. I do, at this present, freely profess and truly hold this true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved; and I promise most constantly to retain and confess the same extremum vitæ spiritum constansissimæ. Deo adiuvante, retinere et congluti, atque a meis subditis vel illis, quorum cura ad me in munere meo spectabit, teneri, doceri et prædicari, quantum in me erit, curaturum. Tu ego idem — sponsus, coram de jure. Sic me Deus adiuvat, et hæc sancta Dei Evangelia." entire and inviolate, with God's assistance, to the end of my life. And I will take care, as far as in me lies, that it shall be held, taught, and preached by my subjects, or by those the care of whom shall appertain to me in my office. This I, —, promise, vow, and swear, so help me God, and these holy Gospels of God."

Since that time the Roman-Catholic Church has added two more dogmas to her creed: one on the sinlessness of the Virgin Mary (in 1851), and one on the infallibility of the Pope (in 1870), in the following words:—

"(1) That 'the blessed Virgin Mary, by a singular grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of Christ Jesus the Saviour of mankind, has been preserved free from all stain of original sin.'

"(2) That 'the Roman pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra, — that is, in discharge of the office of pastor, and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals, — is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irreformable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church.'

TRIDENTINUM. See TRENT, COUNCIL OF.

TRINE BAPTISM denotes that form of the administration of baptism by which the person baptized is immersed thrice in the water, or the water poured thrice over him, in the name of the three persons of the godhead. Its symbolical meaning is striking; and its origin from the apostles, or, at all events, from the second century, cannot be doubted. The Arian Eunomius introduced baptism by single immersion, and this form was adopted for a short time in Spain during the Arian ascendancy (7th century); but trine Baptism still continues to be the usual form of the sacrament throughout the church.

TRINITARIANS, a monastic order, founded in 1197 by St. John of Matha, and Felix of Valois, for the purpose of redeeming Christians who were taken captives by the infidels. The order was confirmed by Honorius III., and received its name from the circumstance that all its churches and houses were dedicated to the Holy Trinity, — the most characteristic difference between the Christian and all other religions. The order employed one-third of its revenues for its special purpose.

TRINITY. The Old-Testament revelation contained the doctrine of the Trinity in germ. Its very statement of the unity of God admitted of interpretation in the light of the later revelation of the trinity in this unity; for God comes before us in the two names of Elohîm and Jehovah, in the contrasts between God ruling in the heavens and the Angel of the Presence, between God absolute and Wisdom, by whom he built the world, between the God of Israel and the Messiah. But as this distinction is throughout pneumatic, and not psychical, the centre of identity of these two representations of God is the Spirit of Jehovah, the fulness of the divine impartation to the Anointed One. Thus the way was prepared for the ampler revelation of the New Testament. The three divine persons — Father, Son, and Holy Ghost — are brought together in Matt. xxviii. 19, 2 Cor. xiii. 14, 1 Pet. i. 2, in such a way as to imply equality. Moreover, to each one of them is assigned an ante-mundane, hypostatic, divine existence. Respecting the Father, the statement demands no proof; but respecting the Son see John xvii. 5; Col. i. 17; John i. 1; Phil. ii. 6; John i. 1, 20, 27; Gal. i. 1; and for the Spirit see 1 Cor. ii. 10; John xiv. 16, 17, 26; Acts v. 3. These passages prove that the distinctions in the Trinity are not those of mere manifestation, but are immanent.

An imperative and never-resting impulse towards the development of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is contained in the very formula of Christian baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19). But it is not to be wondered at that the first attempts, such as we meet them in the writings of Justin, Tatian, and Theophilus, or in those of Athenagoras, Clement of Alexandria, and Irenæus, should present a somewhat vague and aphoristic character. They lack not only systematic completeness, but also dialectical sharpness. Nevertheless, when surveyed as a whole, they appear to point in two different directions, of which Tertullian represents the one, and Origen the other. Tertullian made the Logos the Son; but, in spite of his true conception of the Sonship, he reached only a trinity of succession, and it remained a question whether Athanasius or Sabellius should take up the thread of the development after him. Origen made the Sonship an eternal fact, above and outside of time, but his trinity is only one of subordination; and Arius might as well become his pupil as Athanasius.

The oecumenical Council of Nicæa (325) decided against both of these tendencies, directly rejecting Arianism, and indirectly, also, Sabellianism. The confession of truth, however, is not identical with the destruction of error. Both heresies continued to develop for a long time after the decision of the council, even entering into queer combinations with each other, until finally overcome by the indefatigable labor of Athanasius, Basil the Great, the two Gregories, and Hilary. The positive doctrine thus established is not merely a cautious compromise between Arianism and Sabellianism, a single negation of two extremes: it is, indeed, a conscious and courageous affirmation of the truth, excluding the errors. But it cannot be denied that this affirmation is not yet the fulness of the truth. It has its weaknesses; it has its defects. The monas is identified with the Father. The hypostasis is merely negatively defined; the third hypostasis of the Trinity, the Holy Spirit, remains undeveloped. Up to 360 the whole development was markedly dyadic; and even after the researches of Athanasius and the Cappadocians, and after the condemnation of the Macedonians by the oecumenical Council of Constantinople (381), it took a long time before the Holy Spirit attained full equality with the Father and the Son in the divine triad.

How far Augustine can be said to have made good the above defects is doubtful. With the full development of the three hypostases in the Holy Trinity, the danger of tritheism begins; and, indeed, the trinitarian doctrine of Augustine, so conspicuous for its idea of the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, called forth the tritheism of Philoponus. Nevertheless, though the acceptance by the whole Western Church of the Augustinian doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit, and the encyclical by Photius, Patriarch of Constantinople (867), denouncing that doctrine as heretical, called forth a very warm discussion, the only treatment of the subject which has any theological interest is, for the whole earlier part of the middle ages, that of Scotus Erigena. On the basis of the psychological triad of reason, understanding, and the senses, he builds up the divine triad of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. But, however well such an analogy may suit his Neo-Platonic idea of God, it is very far from the track which the Church has chosen to follow: indeed, he makes trinity a mere name. At the beginning of the latter part of the middle ages, the period of scholasticism proper, Anselm proved very successful in refuting the nominalistic tritheism of Roscellin; but the positive exposition of his own views is cold and abstruse. Quite otherwise with Richard of St. Victor, who poured his whole wealth of half-poetical mysticism into the subject, and produced one of the greatest efforts of mediæval theology. God is love, he says; but love is not the highest love, unless that which is loved has the highest worth. God can love only God. Thus the step is made from the one hypostasis to the other, from the Father to the Son. The next step, from the first two hypostases to the third, — from the Father and the Son to the Holy Spirit, — is not made with the same unwavering certainty. Love, he says, has always a longing after communicating itself to a third. The proposition is true, but has not the same inherent force as the first proposition. Before this radiant though mystical vision of Richard of St. Victor, the Sabellianism of Abelard and the subordinationism of Joachim of Floris wane away as insignificant.

The problem of the Reformers lay in another field than that of pure speculation; and whenever they undertook to remodel, or farther develop, a doctrine, they attached themselves to its anthropological or soteriological bearings. Nevertheless, Luther often and with great fondness reverts to the idea that the true Christian seeks and finds the traces of the Holy Trinity everywhere in the creation, from the most modest flower in the fields to the most gorgeous product of art; and he, as well as Calvin, felt the necessity of regenerating and remodelling the dogma. In that point, however, Protestantism achieved very little, at least for a long time. The doctrine was taught in accordance with the old symbols of the Church, and to the exclusion of all old and new errors; but a farther development was not attempted. Some Protestant theologians, as, for instance, Calovius, laid very little stress on the dogma; and others, such as Quenstedt, became entangled in its formal difficulties, and reached no farther than a preliminary sifting of the materials given.

The first really new departure in the development of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, since the days of Richard of St. Victor, was due to the Protestant philosophy, now set free from the fetters of the Church, more especially to Jacob Boehme. His idea of an immanent process by which the Deity evolves into a trinity is one of the profoundest speculative thoughts which ever sprung from the dogma, and has exercised a widespread, fertilizing influence both on theology and philosophy. That this immanent process, just on account of its immanency, involves no element of time, Boehme was aware of from the very first, and has expressed with great emphasis and felicity. But on other points his exposition is very obscure; and, in spite of its great wealth of striking hints, it was forgotten, or at least neglected, for a long time. Leibnitz, who in a very happy way ties up the idea of God with the idea of eternal truth, making the eternal truth the very nature of God, reaches, in his construction of the trinity, not beyond a dyadic development; and the formula of the Wolffian school, according to which the Deity became triune by virtue of three different acts of his will, — voluntas primitiva, media, and finalis, — hardly touches the question. It was Schelling, and after him Franz Baader, who first drew attention to the speculations of Jacob Boehme, though their complete incorporation with the theological treatment was still far off. Schleiermacher could be of no service in this respect: his own philosophy hindered him. Though he abandoned the natura naturans of Spinoza, God was still to him "the spiritual power in nature," known to us only through its presence in our own heart and the things around us, but utterly incomprehensible when contemplated in separation from the world as the absolute unity. He acknowledged that it was "almost" necessary to accept the idea of a personal god; "but" the case had to him also another side. His exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity is Sabellian.

But, while Schleiermacher thus treated the dogma with apparent indifference, hardly a decade elapsed after the publication of his Der christliche Glaube (1821–22), before it once more came to the foreground, and again assumed, though under various forms, its old position as the true centre of the whole theological system. The old psychological analogy, first invented by Augustine, then elaborated in a somewhat eccentric way by Scotus Erigena, but never wholly abandoned by the schoolmen, has been renewed (K. Th. Fischer, Billroth, Martensen); and more especially the abstract form of self-consciousness — the subject making itself object, and through that process returning to itself as self-conscious — has furnished a fertile scheme for trinitarian speculation. The old attempt at developing the Holy Trinity by means of the idea of the world (well known to the ancient Church from the apologists, and to the middle ages from Anselm), has also been repeated with success (J. H. Fichte, Weiss, Twisten). It allures the interest of the philosopher by its undeniable connection with the profoundest efforts of the classical, especially the Alexandrian speculation; and at the same time it takes hold of the attention of the theologian, because Scripture undoubtedly places the Son, the Logos, in connection with the world. Of greatest importance, however, has perhaps been the return to the fundamental idea of Richard of St. Victor, — to represent the Holy Trinity as founded in the idea of God as love (Julius Müller, Nitzsch, Dörner).

TRINITY SUNDAY, the first Sunday after Pentecost; was introduced into the calendar by Benedict XI. in 1305. It concludes the festival part of the Church Year in the West. In the Church of England the Sundays from Whitsuntide to Advent are counted as the first, second, etc., till twenty-sixth Sunday after Trinity. The universal use in the Western Church of this festival of Trinity Sunday dates from Pope John XXII. (1334).

TRISAGION, a liturgical formula, which, during the Monophysite controversy of the fifth century, secured dogmatic importance. It was originally nothing else than the ascription of praise in Isa. vi. 3. It was used at the beginning of divine service, and runs ἅγιος ὁ θεός, ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς. ("Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us!") The origin of this formula is involved in obscurity. The tradition that it was received during an earthquake at Constantinople, in the reign of Theodosius II., through a boy, who, being caught up into the sky, heard it from the angels, is unreliable. The earliest testimonies to the existence of the Trisagion date from the fifth century, or the latter part of the fourth. In Antioch the clause was added, ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς ("who was crucified for us"), and probably originated with the Monophysite usurper of the patriarchal chair of Antioch, — Peter the Fuller. The defenders of the orthodox doctrine found in this change the rudest Eutychianism. Peter's orthodox successor, Calendio, did not throw out the phrase, but changed its reference by prefixing the expression βασιλεὺς χριστέ ("Christ our King"). On his re-instatement, Peter cast out this limiting clause. The introduction of the additional clause under Anastasius, who was inclined to Monophysitism, led to bloody scenes at Constantinople. It was in fact, as Walch first (Ketzehistorie, vii. 329 sqq.), and Dorner since, have shown, a supplement to the expression θεοτοκος ("mother of God"), with which the Nestorian controversy began. The suffering of the divine nature on the cross, emphasized by it, grew out of a deep experimental interest in the atonement. See PETER ALLIX: Diss. de Trisagii origine, Rouen, 1678; SUICER: Thesaurus, ii. 1310; BINGHAM: Orig. eccl., xiv. 2; AUGUSTI: Denkwürdigkeiten; DORNER: Lehre von d. Person Christi, ii. 155 sqq.; DANIEL: Codex Liturgicus, vol. iv. [and art. "Trisagion," in BLUNT, Dict. Theol.]. H. SCHMIDT.

TRITHEISM denotes a conception of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity which emphasizes the triad so strongly, that it forgets, or seems to forget, the unity. No Christian theologian has ever taught that there were three gods; but the expositions of the trinitarian mystery have sometimes endangered the principle of monotheism, as, for instance, in the Eastern Church in the sixth century, and in the Western in the eleventh. In Alexandria a party arose which received the name of Tritheists, on account of their sharp distinction between the three divine persons. Among their leaders were Philoponus, Conon of Tarsus, Eugenius of Seleucia, and others. Under the reign of Justin II. (565-578) they appeared in Constantinople; and a disputation was held between them and the orthodox Patriarch John, though without any result. The further vicissitudes of the sect are not known. See LEONTIUS BYZANTINUS: De Sectis, v.; JOHN DAMASCENUS: De Har.; NICEPHORUS CALLISTI: Ecc. Hist., xviii. 47-49. Roscelin, the father of nominalism, taught theology and philosophy at Tours, and was accused of tritheism by Anselm. His views were condemned by the synod of Soissons (1092), and he retracted. TRITHEMIUS, Johann, a distinguished German theologian of the period just preceding the Reformation; was b. at Tritenheim, near Trier, Feb. 1, 1462; d. at Würzburg, Dec. 16, 1516. He struggled hard with poverty, but succeeded in securing an education at Heidelberg. On his way home from that city, he stopped at a convent at Spanheim; and, being prevented by a violent storm from starting on his journey at the hour intended, he took it as an indication of the will of Providence, continued at the convent, became a monk, and was elected abbot when only twenty-one years old. The convent became famous under his direction. Reuchlin and Pirckheimer were among his friends and correspondents. In 1506 he was transferred to a convent in Würzburg. Trithemius wrote a number of works on the natural sciences, scholasticism, etc., most of which were published after his death. Among them are Naturalium Questionum, libri xx.; Steganographia, sive de ratione occulte scribendi, Frankfurt, 1606; Sermones et exhortationes ad Monachos, 1516. He laid in Germany the foundation of church history by his works, Catalog. illustr. virorum Germaniam suis ingeniis et lucubrationibus omnifariam exornantium and De script. eccles. A full list of his writings is given by ERHARD: Geschichte d. Wiederaufblühens wissenschaftlicher Bildung, etc., iii. 387 sqq., Magd., 1832. KLIPPEL.

TROAS, or ALEXANDREIA TROAS, or ALEXANDREIA, a town on the coast of Mysia, built by Antigonus; was during the Roman rule one of the principal towns of the province of Asia, and the centre of the traffic between Macedonia and the western part of Asia Minor. Paul visited the place four times (Acts xvi. 8-11, xx. 5-6; 2 Cor. ii. 12-13; 2 Tim. iv. 13).

TRONCHIN, the name of two distinguished Genevan theologians. — I. Theodore was b. at Geneva, April 17, 1582; d. there Nov. 19, 1637. After studying theology at Geneva, Basel, Heidelberg, Franeker, and Leyden, he became professor of Hebrew at Geneva in 1606, and of theology in 1618. He was appointed by the Vénérable Compagnie des Pasteurs de Genève one of its two delegates to the synod of Dort. He wrote back from Dort, "The canons have shot away the heads of the Remonstrants." In 1655 he was appointed to carry on negotiations with John Dury, and seems to have written a Harmonia confessionum. He left behind a few tracts, — De peccato originali, De baptismo, etc. — II. Louis, son of the preceding; was b. at Geneva, Dec. 4, 1629; d. there Sept. 8, 1705. In spite of his strict Calvinism, the elder Tronchin sent his son to the French school of Saumur, which taught a modified Calvinistic theology. He became pastor in Lyons, refused the appointment to a professorship in Saumur, and in 1661 accepted a similar appointment in the university of Geneva. There he found Francis Turretin, with whose severe Calvinism he had no sympathy. He found a sympathizer in Mestrezat. A controversy arose about obliging clergymen to profess their adhesion to the strict doctrines of Calvinism. Turretin and his party triumphed; and all candidates for licensure were obliged to sign the so-called règlements of Aug. 6, 1647. Tronchin was for five years rector of the university, much admired as a preacher, and beloved as a man. He wrote little. [His Theses theolog. appeared in 1663; Disput. de provident. Dei, 1670, and some sermons, pub. 1703.] ANDRÉ ARCHINARD.

TRUBER, Primus, b. at Rastschiza in Carniola, 1508; d. at Dredingen in Württemberg, June 28, 1586. He was educated at Salzburg, studied theology in Vienna, was ordained priest in 1527, and appointed canon at the cathedral of Laibach in 1531, but embraced the Reformation, and was compelled to flee in 1547. In the following year he obtained a small benefice near Nuremberg, and later on he settled in Württemberg. But he never broke off the connection with his native country, and the work he had begun there; publishing in the Slav dialect a catechism (1550), a translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew (1555), of the three other Gospels (1556), of the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Corinthians (1561), besides making frequent though perilous visits. His life was written by Sillem, Erlangen, 1861. KLOSE.

TRUCE OF GOD (treuga or treua Dei), an institution of the middle ages, designed to mitigate the cruelties of war by enforcing a cessation of hostilities on all the more important church festivals, and from Thursday evening to Sunday evening each week. The scheme was recommended by the councils of Orléans (1016) and Limoges (1031), and by the efforts of the Bishop of Aquitaine (1030) enforced. The second (1139) and third (1179) Lateran councils adopted it. The Truce was a praiseworthy attempt to check the passions and barbarities of warfare.

TRULLAN COUNCILS, The, were held in a room of the imperial palace at Constantinople which had a dome (τροχάλλος), whence the name. The First Trullan Council was called (680) by the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus, and held eighteen sittings. The legates of Pope Agatho were accorded the highest rank, then followed in order the Patriarch Georgius of Constantinople, the legate of the Patriarch of Alexandria, Macarius of Antioch, the legate of the Patriarch of Jerusalem, etc. The doctrine of Monophysitism was taken up and condemned, and Christ declared to have two natures and two wills. Macarius of Antioch was indicted for his allegiance to the false doctrine. Georgius of Constantinople went over in the eighth sitting to the Roman doctrine. In the sixteenth sitting, Pope Honorius I. was anathematized for his Monophysite views, and the anathema was repeated at the eighteenth sitting. Pope Agatho's confession of two wills in Christ, in his Epistola ad Imperatores, was declared the doctrine of the council, and all Monophysites were anathematized. The Patriarch Macarius was deposed at a later time.

The Second Trullan Council was called by Justinian in 692. It was designed to supplement the fifth and the sixth (the First Trullan) oecumenical councils, and passed 102 canons bearing upon matters of church-discipline. Six of these (II., XIII., XXXVI., LV., LXVII., LXXXII.) met with determined opposition in Rome; and, although the legate of Pope Sergius I. subscribed to them, he himself firmly rejected them, and in spite of the Emperor Justinian's demand that he should accept them. The emperor was about to compel the Pope's acceptance, when he was de-throned. Canon XIII. (upon the basis of Matt. xix. 6, 1 Cor. vii. 27, Heb. xiii. 4) allowed the marriage of priests, but forbade their remarriage, and the continuance of bishops in the married state after their ordination. Canon XXXVI. gave to the Patriarch of Constantinople a rank after the Pope, but granted him equal privileges with the latter. The Second Trullan Council is regarded as spurious (synodus erratica) in the West, but is accepted in the East; its canons being denominated "the canons of the sixth synod." From this time the Eastern and Western churches grew farther and farther apart. The Second Trullan Council was the entering wedge of the great division which followed. TÜBINGEN SCHOOL, The, the name given to two schools of theology, whose chief representatives were connected with the university of Tübingen, either as professors or students, or both.

I. THE OLD TÜBINGEN SCHOOL played an important part in the history of German theological thought in the latter part of the last century by being the champion of biblical supranaturalism. It had its first representative in Gottlob Christian Storr. He was b. in Stuttgart, Sept. 10, 1746; studied at Tübingen; was appointed professor of philosophy at Tübingen, 1775, and professor of theology in 1777; and d. in Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1805, as court-preacher. His entrance upon his professional duties at Tübingen, as Baur has said, marked an epoch in the Tübingen theology. The activity of the great Bengel had not introduced any new period of theology, so much as it worked as savory salt, purifying the religious life of the day. The so-called theology which had sprung up in the latter half of the eighteenth century saw in positive and orthodox Christianity an enemy of progress and humanity which it felt called upon to resist. This idea was the prevailing idea of the day; and against it Storr rose up, and sought to recover an impregnable position for the defence of what is true and unchangeable in Christianity.

He planted himself firmly and solely upon the authority of divine revelation as it is contained in the Scriptures, and sought by grammatical and historical exegesis to build up a system of theology. As a preliminary work, he sought to prove the integrity and credibility of the New Testament, and thence to deduce the authority of Christ as the sent of God, laying special emphasis upon the evidential value of the miracles. The foundation-stone of Storr's theology was the authority of Christ as the highest and divinely attested messenger of God. He held, that, while reason and experience are desirable allies in confirming the doctrines of Scripture, they are "not essential," and affirmed that we are acting rationally when we accept a doctrine on the authority of Scripture alone. Storr thus came into conflict with Kant, and sharply criticised his Religion within the Limits of Pure Reason. He also contended against the accommodation theory of Semler, Teller, and others. He held that systems of theology and morals are to be founded upon the results of exegesis, and not upon mere processes of ratiocination. His own theological system is laid down in his last great work, Doctrinæ christ. pars theoretica e sacris litteris repetita, 1793 (German translation, 1803). Among his other writings are works upon the Revelation of John (1783), the Gospel of John (1786), the Epistle to the Hebrews (1789), etc.

The immediate followers of Storr, and representatives of the Old Tübingen school, were the brothers Johann Friedrich Flatt (b. Feb. 20, 1759, at Tübingen; d. Nov. 24, 1821, at Tübingen), Karl Christian Flatt (b. Aug. 18, 1772, in Stuttgart; d. Nov. 20, 1843), and Friedrich Gottlieb Suskind (b. Feb. 17, 1767, at Neustadt; d. at Stuttgart, 1829). All three were pupils of Storr, and became professors at Tübingen. The elder Flatt edited the Magazin für Dogmatik und Moral from 1796 to 1803, when it was continued by Suskind. This periodical became the organ of the school, which contended against Kant, Fichte, and Schelling in the interest of a biblical supranaturalism. The elder Flatt was an exceedingly conscientious student. Suskind was the dialectician of the school. The younger Flatt, although at first inclined to Kantianism, renounced it, and wrote at length upon the current topics of the Tübingen circle, the absolute and divine contents of Revelation, the miracles of Christ, etc.

Another representative of the early Tübingen school was Ernst Gottlob Bengel (b. 1769; d. March 26, 1826), a grandson of the great commentator Bengel, who, as professor of theology and church history at Tübingen, exerted a very extensive influence. He was somewhat more liberal than his predecessors. Steudel and Christian Friedrich Schmid also represented the same general tendency. It was the idea of supranaturalism, the idea that in Christianity something more than human powers and blessings is conferred, that these men fought for with zeal, and literary and exegetical skill. Theirs is the merit of having defended the inheritance of the fathers, and preserved it for a better period. Though they did not build up so well as they fought, yet there are times when a militant theology must fight with both hands. Such a time was theirs; and thus they fought, and in doing so conscientiously they did what they could to defend the truth (Mark xiv. 8).

LANDECKER.

II. THE MODERN SCHOOL. — The founder and central figure of the Modern Tübingen school of theology is Ferdinand Christian Baur (b. June 21, 1792; professor at Tübingen, 1826; d. Dec. 2, 1860), with whose death its characteristic philosophical and theological positions were relinquished. Limiting the history of the school to the lifetime of its founder, we distinguish three periods, — the preparatory period, characterized by studies into the history of Christian doctrines, and lasting till 1835; the flourishing period, characterized by critical investigations into the contents and origin of the New Testament, lasting till 1848; and the period of disintegration, characterized by historical studies, and lasting till 1860.

Baur's fundamental principles concerning the nature of religion and the progress of history were taken from Hegel's philosophy; although he never placed himself among Hegel's followers, but rather denied having used him as his master. The Hegelian terminology clearly appears in his work against Möhler, Gegensatz des Protestantismus u. Katholicismus, which was published in 1834. He applied the Hegelian principle of intellectual development with great success in the study of Christian doctrines, and brought it to bear in his work on the Trinity and incarnation of God (Dreieinigkeit u. Menschwerdung Gottes, Tübing., 1841-43, 3 vols.). A new impulse in the study of the history of Christian doctrine dates from these investigations of Baur.

Baur's importance, however, is not derived so much from these studies of Christian doctrine as from his investigations in the department of biblical criticism, which belong to the second period of the history of the Tübingen school. Strauss's Life of Christ appeared in 1835; but it was not this work which suggested to Baur the teacher, the principles which he worked out in his work on the canon of the New Testament. It simply gave a new impetus to his studies. In 1835 Baur's work on the Pastoral Epistles appeared; in which the attempt was made to prove, from the alleged references to Gnostic systems, that they were the product of the second century. This work was the inauguration of a movement to tear asunder the writings of the New Testament, and to use them as a foundation-stone for reconstructing the whole church history of the first two centuries. The Gnostic systems were used to carry out the programme. But Baur had already made the discovery of a great difference in the apostolic age, between the older apostles and Paul. This was the fruitful and inexhaustible proposition with which the Tübingen school worked for a quarter of a century. It was stated by Baur, in an article on the Christ party at Corinth, published in the Tübingen Zeitschrift for 1831. From thenceforth he sought to destroy what the Old Tübingen school had so earnestly contended to establish. This task was left to himself and a few young men then occupying the position of privatdocent; for the other professors at Tübingen were not in sympathy with the movement. Of these younger men, Zeller occupies the front rank. In thorough scholarship and keen thought he was not equal to the master, but surpassed him in the lucidness and elegance of his style. More audacious was Schwegler, with his rare critical gifts. Köstlin and G. Planck were exceedingly industrious. The most distinguished co-operators outside of Württemberg were Hilgenfeld, Holsten, and Ritschl.

The name of Paul was the one around which the critical study and ingenuity of the school marshalled their forces. Much appeared between 1836 and 1845: the Theologische Jahrbücher, edited by Zeller (1842 seq.), being the organ of the movement. In the year 1845 Baur summed up the results of the investigations in his work on Paul (2d ed., 1866), in which he denied the Pauline authorship of all the Epistles attributed to Paul, except Galatians, First and Second Corinthians, and Romans. The genuineness of the last two chapters of Romans, however, was called in question. The historical picture which was left was this. The older apostles and the entire early church were Judaistic, and distinguished from the Jewish Church only by their faith in the crucified Christ as the Messiah. All the elements of a new religion which lie concealed in the teachings and life of Christ were undeveloped. Stephen in vain attempted to bring these out. Paul, by a remarkable divination of his own, by a logical deduction from the fact of the crucifixion, made the discovery that the gospel meant freedom, and was designed for all mankind. These principles brought him into conflict with the older apostles and the church. He preached to the Gentiles; and the older apostles, for the sake of peace, suppressed their hostility. But one party in the church grew more and more bitter against him. It was the endeavor of a later age to harmonize these conflicting parties and principles. Hence, wherever an irenic tone is met with in the New Testament, it is to be regarded as an unmistakable sign of the late date of the writing; and that there was no attempt made in the apostolic age to reconcile the two parties was proved by the Apocalypse of John, which is a product of Jewish-Christian narrowness.

The next question was what the Christianity of Christ really was. Baur did not answer this until ten years after Strauss had spoken. In the Jahrbücher for 1844, and a special book on the Gospels, published in 1847, he attempted to prove the unguineness of John's Gospel. It was declared to have been written with the special purpose of reconciling the differences between Judaistic and Pauline Christianity, and consequently belonged to the second century. Mark, by concealing these differences, also betrayed that it was not apostolic; and Luke's Gospel was only a revision of Marcion's Gospel. Schwegler's Montanismus, Ritschl's Gospel of Marcion and Gospel of Luke, and the first edition of his Origin of the Old Catholic Church (Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche), Köstlin's John's Doctr. System (Johanneischer Lehrbegriff), [Zeller's Acts of the Apostles], and other works, were the allies of Baur. But the most important of all was Schwegler's Post-Apostolic Age (Nachapost. Zeitalter), which employed the writings that had been declared unguine to construct a history of the development of Judaistic and Pauline Christianity to the Old Catholic Church. This development was put in two centres, — Rome and Asia Minor. At Rome the chronological sequence of the writings was the Shepherd of Hermas and Hegesippus, Justin Martyr, the Clementine Homilies, the Apostolical Constitutions, James, the Second Letter of Clement, Mark's Gospel, the Clementine Recognitions, Second Peter. From the Pauline side the conciliatory authorship began under Trajan, with First Peter, which was followed by Luke, Clement's first Letter, and then the Pastoral Epistles and the Ignatian Epistles. The Pauline type of Christianity did not get the victory till Victor's reign. In Asia Minor, the name of John, and not Peter, was the starting-point of the development; and the Apocalypse was the first, the Gospel of John the last, stage in the development.

Such is the strange course of development we are called upon to believe. Our canonical writings differ very largely from the extra-canonical. And yet these remarkable works are put down in an age which lacked originality; and a few doctrinal terms are spied out, and forced to become sufficient evidences that the writings belong to a period when Gnostic systems were disseminating their philosophy. [Dr. Fisher says, "On this supposition we are brought to face this contrast. In the first age of Christianity we have only men; in the following age, only writings: in one period, men without writings (only the Apocalypse and four Epistles belonging there); in the other period, only writings of great power and influence, without known authors." — Supernatural Origin of Christianity, p. xxxvii.]. It is further to be remarked, that the motive which Schwegler gives for the development of Christianity, viz., the reconciliation of two opposite principles, is wholly insufficient.

In the third period of the Tübingen school, beginning in 1848, Baur devoted himself to the study of church history, and brought out the very able work, Christianity and the Christian Church of the First Three Centuries, 1853, 3d ed., 1863; [Eng. trans. by Allen Menzies, London, 1878-79, 2 vols.]. He came to the conclusion that that which distinguished Christianity as the absolute religion from all other religions was the purely moral nature of its events, teachings, and demands. (And yet the very writings from which this characteristic is drawn were declared by the school to be Ebionitic!) In the Christianity of Christ, Baur gave no place to the death of Christ. The fundamental conception of Baur was, after all, not very different from that of Kant. The pure religion of reason came into the world with Christ, but was covered over in the succeeding periods. He refused to enter into an explanation of the "miracle" of the resurrection, regarding the faith of the apostles as the sufficient starting-point for the contemplation of the history of Christianity. He endeavored to account for the development of Christianity, but denied its miracles. His so-called Tendenzkritik, while it led him to unsound conclusions, prepared the way for the brilliant achievements in the departments of church history and doctrine of the present generation, and must ever be a starting-point for the construction of the history of early Christianity. In his last years Baur had a faithful disciple in Northern Germany, in Holsten. Otherwise he stood almost alone. Holtzmann, Hausrath, and O. Pfeiderer denied the miracles, and accepted the vision hypothesis.

But Keim, Weizsacker, and others admitted the possibility of miracles as a necessary deduction from theism. H. Schultz attempted to answer the question, which Baur left unanswered, — how an ideal man-Christ could have existed without a miracle, — but was more than met by Dorner. The judgment concerning John's Gospel, as is well known, has been largely reversed; and the synoptic Gospels are declared, even in the circle nearest Baur, not to have been written with a special and partisan purpose (Tendenzschriften). The return to the person of Christ has been followed by a recognition of the historic value of the Gospels; and even O. Pfleiderer, who once declared himself a partisan of the Tübingen school, finds in the Acts a larger portion credible than was once conceded. The fact is, that the logical conclusion from Baur's own premises was the Life of Christ, by his own scholar, Strauss. The first shot against the Tübingen school was fired by Dietlein (Das Urchristenthum, 1815); he was followed by Thiersch (Versuch zur Herstellung d. hist. Standpunkts für d. Kritik d. neutest. Schriften), Lechler (D. Apost. und nachapost. Zeitalter, 1851, 2d ed., 1857), and Ritschl, in the second edition of his Entstehung d. altkath. Kirche, Bonn, 1857, etc.

He was graduated at Harvard College, 1798; pastor at Chelsea, Mass., 1801–26; in 1812 founded at Boston first American society for the religious and moral improvement of seamen; in 1826 took charge of the "Ministry at Large," a city mission organized by the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston; visited Europe to promote similar organizations, and on his return, in 1838, published Principles and Results of the Ministry at Large.

TUCKNEY, Anthony, b. at Kirton, Lincolnshire, Eng., September, 1599; d. February, 1670. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and took his master's degree in 1622, his B.D. in 1627. He became domestic chaplain to the Earl of Lincoln, but, after he was chosen fellow of his college, returned, and was a very successful teacher. He then became assistant to John Cotton at Boston, and, after Cotton's departure to New England, his successor. In 1643 he was appointed member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines for the County of Lincoln, and was one of the most active and influential members. After the death of Herbert Palmer, he was made chairman of the committee on the catechisms. He had a chief hand in the questions relating to the divine law in the Larger Catechism, and in the construction of the entire Shorter Catechism.

While at London, he was minister of St. Michael le Querne until 1648. He was made master of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, in 1645, vice-chancellor of the university in 1648, master of St. John's College in 1653, and regius-professor of divinity of the university.

He was one of the commissioners at Savoy, but failed to attend. He was silenced for nonconformity. His controversy with Benjamin Whichcote is important as showing the break of a new era in Whichcote, his pupil, out of the old era in Tuckney, the teacher. These eight letters discuss the use of reason in religion, as well as differences among Christians, in a calm, dignified, and charitable spirit. They are models of Christian controversy. Tuckney's Parliament Sermons and other occasional pieces were published during his lifetime; but his principal works are posthumous: Forty sermons upon several occasions (London, 1676); Prælectiones theologicae (Amsterdam, 1679). TUDELA, Benjamin of. See BENJAMIN OF TUDELA.

TUNKERS, or DUNKERS, so called from the German tunken ("to dip"), a denomination of Christians originating in Germany at the beginning of the last century. The name originally adopted by themselves, and which is now generally used, is simply "The Brethren;" but they frequently use the term "German Baptists," even in their official documents.

In the year 1708 Alexander Mack of Schwartzau and a few of his neighbors agreed to meet together and study the word of God without reference to existing creeds, and to submit themselves wholly to its guidance, wherever it should lead them. Without being aware of the existence of any body of Christians holding similar views, they were led to adopt, (1) the Bible as their creed, without any catechism or other confession of faith; (2) the independent or congregational form of church government; (3) believers' baptism; and (4) immersion. To these general principles of the Baptist denomination they added in their Covenant of Conscience some views held, it would seem also without their knowledge, by the Friends; namely, an unpaid ministry, nonconformity to the world in dress, etc., and not to take oaths, or to engage in war.

In addition to these views and the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith (the Trinity, atonement, etc.), they agreed not to go to law, or to invoke the aid of the civil authorities, even in self-defence; to refuse interest on money; to salute one another with the kiss of charity; to anoint the sick with oil for recovery; and to celebrate the Communion in connection with the Agapa, or love-feast (in imitation of the Paschal Supper), feet-washing, the salutation or "holy kiss," and giving the right hand of fellowship.

They also adopted trine immersion (in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost); the candidate kneeling, and being plunged by a forward movement under the water, from which they were sometimes called "Tumblers."

The little company of eight persons, whose names are piously preserved by the society, soon increased in numbers; and colonies were formed at Marienborn with John Naas as minister, and at Epstein with Christian Levy as minister. Although leading harmless and peaceful lives, the Brethren were persecuted by the State, which allowed no dissent from the authorized churches (the Lutheran, the Reformed, and the Catholic); and many of them took refuge in Holland, Friesland, and the Dutchy of Cleves. Shortly after, they all emigrated to America; the first families arriving in 1719, and settling in Germantown, where they built a church, and chose Peter Becker, a weaver, to be their minister. By 1729 they had all reached the United States; and the society no longer exists in Europe, though they have had for the last five years a mission in Denmark.

The Brethren soon found their way into the interior counties of Pennsylvania and the Southern and Western States, having at the present time congregations even in California and Oregon. They are now so strong in the West, that their Annual Meeting in May (the week after Whitsuntide), which regulates all matters connected with the society, was held this year (1883) west of the Mississippi River, near Lawrence, Kan.

The Brethren do not officially publish their numbers, "inasmuch as the apostles never gave the exact number of believers" (Minutes of Annual Meeting, 1866, art. 10); but, in a recent publication (The Record of the Faithful, 1882) by one of the Brethren, the present membership is given as 57,799, of whom 3,000 are said to belong to the "Old Order" Brethren. Other estimates place the number above 100,000. The number of congregations is about 500. The ministers receive no salary; the Annual Meeting of 1882 (art. 9) having re-affirmed that the gratuitous ministry of the word of God "is a fundamental principle in the order and practice of our Brotherhood." Even marriage-fees are regarded with disfavor. The Annual Meeting of 1857 (art. 14) declares "the gospel does not allow ministers to take a fee." The Family Almanac for 1883, issued by the Brethren's Publishing-House, Huntingdon, Penn., prints a "ministerial list" comprising 1,773 names, of which 67 are marked as belonging to the "Old Order Brethren," and 22 to the "Progressives." These represent the opposite tendencies existing in the society for some years, and which have lately resulted in separate organizations. The first contend for a stricter application of the principles of the society, especially as to nonconformity to the world. They are opposed to Sunday schools, which, with other innovations, they assert in their protest of Dec. 10, 1880, to be "grave departures from ancient principles, by what is called the General Council of the German Baptist Church." Their first yearly meeting was held at Brookville, O., May 27, 1882. The Progressives are in favor of greater liberty in what they regard as non-essentials, and seceded last year, protesting that "our annual conference is almost wholly taken up with legislation tending to abridge our liberties in the gospel, enforcing customs and usages, and elevating them to an equality with the gospel, and defending them with even more vigor than the commands of God." Their first convention was held at Ashland, O. June 29, 1882, and their Annual Meeting of the present year at Dayton, O. The main body, who are known as "Conservatives," and who insist upon the decisions of the Annual Meeting as "mandatory," or obligatory upon all the members of the society, decided at their last meeting "that such as have left the church, and joined in with the 'Old Order,' or 'Progressive' churches, should not be received into the church without being rebaptized" (Annual Meeting, 1883, art. 3); so that these divisions in the church may now be regarded as permanent.

The society insists upon a regular ministry. Members are not allowed, "without being authorized by the church, to exhort in our public or general meetings" (Annual Meeting, 1859, art. 3). The ministers are of three orders or grades: (1) The lowest, called a minister of the first degree, who is regarded merely as an "assistant" in preaching, and is subject to the authority of his superiors in the ministry; (2) The minister of the second degree, who is always chosen from those of the first—he makes his own preaching appointments, baptizes, performs the marriage-ceremony, etc.; (3) The highest official is called the elder or bishop, sometimes the housekeeper, and is always taken from the ministers of the second degree, usually the senior. He presides at councils, love-feasts, etc., and exercises a general supervision over all the members. There is only one elder in each congregation, but there may be several ministers of the lower degrees.

The only other official in the church is the deacon. There are usually three or four of these in each congregation: they care for the poor and needy, and visit in couples all the members at their homes before the annual love-feast, to ascertain whether they are in peace and union.

The records of the early church at Germantown show that several of the sisters were chosen as deaconesses: but the sisters are no longer appointed to any official position in the church; and the Annual Meeting, 1859, decided "that a female cannot teach or preach in the ordinary acceptance of those terms, yet we cannot forbid them to prophesy" (art. 7). At installations (for ministers of the first and second degrees) and ordinations (for the bishops) the wife of the minister is also saluted by the congregation, the men giving the hand, and the sisters both the hand and kiss; "the church enjoining on the believing wives of teachers the duty of aiding, by their humble example and chaste conversation, their husbands in the solemn duty laid upon them" (Annual Meeting, 1862, art. 36).

The ministers and deacons are chosen from the congregation by the vote of all the members; the election being conducted by visiting brethren, i.e., ministers of neighboring churches who have been summoned by the congregation for that purpose. After devotional exercises, these brethren retire to some convenient, quiet place, where each member comes singly, and expresses his or her preference; all canvassing of the congregation, or "electioneering," being strictly forbidden. The brother who has the highest number of votes is declared elected; and the names of all others voted for, together with the number of votes cast for them, are kept secret.

All the affairs of the congregation are managed at a meeting or council of the members, presided over by the elder, and held statedly, or as often as occasion may require; the sisters having an equal voice with the brethren. District meetings and a general conference are held yearly: these are representative bodies. A certain number of churches conveniently located constitutes a district; each church sending two delegates, one of whom must be a minister. The general conference, called the Annual Meeting, has, since 1866, been composed exclusively of ministers, one of them a bishop. There are two delegates from each district meeting. These councils, or "Big Meetings," put in order such matters as cannot be agreed upon in the congregations, or by the district meetings; matters in dispute being submitted to the meeting in the form of "queries." Formerly all the brethren and sisters present, often several thousand, took part in settling the questions brought before the council, as in one of congregational meetings; but now the discussions and voting are confined to the delegates, two-thirds of the votes cast being required for a decision. The first of these Annual Meetings was held in 1712, but there are no minutes preserved prior to those of 1758. An examination of these minutes (by which alone the doctrines and usages of the Brethren can be really ascertained) shows that "queries" with reference to doctrines are rare, and proves that there has always been a general adherence to the fundamental and distinctive principles originally adopted by the society. But the application of these principles in special cases is the subject of frequent "queries" from the district meetings, referring to such minute questions of casuistry as the following: Is it right, according to the tenor of the gospel, for brethren to erect lightning-rods (1861)? whether we shall have a rolling or a standing collar on our coats (1876)? ought members of the church to attach themselves to the Washington Mutual Live Stock Insurance Company (1871)? is it right to burden brethren with paying postage for letters sent by mail, they being not interested in the same (1851)? is it becoming for members to get the walls of their houses papered with flower paper (1859)? Upon the mode of feet-washing, that is, whether the person who washes the feet must also wipe them, or whether these acts may be performed by different persons, there is a great difference of opinion; and the matter has been frequently brought before the council. The "single mode" is insisted upon by the oldest churches as more in accordance with the example of Christ, but the Annual Meeting has decided the "double mode" as the recognized mode of the general brotherhood. The minutes show that the Brethren have from the earliest times borne testimony against slavery, even when the Annual Meetings were held in the slave States, as in Tennessee, 1846, and in Maryland, 1853, and again in 1857, when it was decided that "members not willing to liberate their slaves should be dealt with according to the gospel manner of dealing with all transgressors." Testimony against the use of intoxicating drinks was given as early as 1751, and has continued to this day, though the Annual Meeting of 1812 considered it "not advisable for members to put their hands to the pledge, or to meddle with the proceeding and excitement of the world upon this subject." Members are not allowed to join secret societies.

Although a high school was founded by the Brethren in Germantown as early as 1762, education has not, until very recently, had much favor with them. The Annual Meeting, so recently as 1853, declared that "colleges are a very unsafe place for a simple follower of Christ, inasmuch as they are calculated to lead us astray from the faith, and obedience to the gospel" (art. 28). Four years later, in answering a query concerning the contemplated establishment of a high school, the Annual Meeting declares "It is conforming to the world. The apostle Paul says knowledge puffeth up" (art. 19). And the next year (1858) the question was debated, "whether the Lord has commanded us to have a school besides our common schools; and, if it is not commanded of the Lord, ought we to have one?" (Art. 31.) But in 1861 a flourishing high school was established in Ohio by Elder James Quinter; and there are now three colleges under the control of Brethren, though not officially connected with the society; namely, at Huntingdon, Penn., established 1876; at Ashland, O., established 1878; and at Mount Morris, Ill., established 1879. The catalogues for 1881-82 give the total number of students in all the departments as 695. The usual classical and scientific courses are pursued. To these three colleges should be added the normal school at Bridge-water, Va. The co-education of the sexes is regarded "as the only true method of education;" but the principles of the Brethren as to plainness in dress are insisted upon, both for teachers and pupils. "Dresses are plain, without tucks, ruffles, etc. Gay attire and jewelry are prohibited" (Mount-Morris College Catalogue). But the Brethren continue to bear testimony against the establishing, "under any pretext or color whatever, theological schools or theological departments of schools or colleges" (Annual Meeting, 1882, art. 10). The same meeting approves of Sunday schools as "promotive of good;" but "the unnecessary appendage of Sunday-school conventions" is declared to be "contrary to the principles of the gospel, and contrary to the Scriptures" (art. 22).

The first paper in the interests of the society, a monthly called The Gospel Visitor, was published by Henry Kurtz, in 1851, at Poland, O.; the next, a weekly called The Christian Family Companion, in 1861, by Henry Holsinger, at Tyrone, Penn. Their present publications are, (1) The Primitive Christian, Huntingdon, Penn., (2) The Brethren at Work, Mount Morris, Ill., and (3) Der Bruderbote, a German monthly, Grundy Centre, Io. There is also published a Sunday-school paper at Huntingdon, Penn. The Indicator, the organ of the Old-Order Brethren, is published at Kinsey's Station, O.; and The Progressive Christian, the organ of the Progressives, at Berlin, Penn.

The Sieben Tager, or German Seventh-day Baptists, are a secession from the Tunkers. They are now nearly extinct as a denomination, but at one time existed in considerable numbers at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Penn., where, under Conrad Beissel, they formed a monastic community in 1732; and colonies were afterwards formed near York, Bedford, and Snow Hill. Beissel, a native of Germany, came to this country in 1720, and settled at Mill Creek, where he was baptized by Peter Becker, the Tunker minister of the Germantown church, in 1725. He published a pamphlet protesting against the change of the sabbath from the seventh to the first day of the week, and also advocating celibacy as a higher order of Christian life. Owing to the disturbance and opposition which these views occasioned, he withdrew from the society, and led a solitary life on the banks of the Cocolico River, where he was soon joined by a number of those who shared his views. In 1728, still living in solitary cottages or cells, they organized a distinct society, which soon assumed a monastic character; and several buildings were erected at Ephrata for the use of the order. There was at first a community of goods; but this was afterwards partially abandoned, only the donations to the society, and the labor of the inmates of the cloisters, being regarded as common stock. Celibacy was enjoined upon those living in the cloisters, and was recommended to all others, but not absolutely required. They adopted a garb similar to that of the Capuchins, and, upon entering the order, assumed monastic names. Beissel took the name of Friedsam (Peaceable), to which the Brethren added that of Gottrecht (Godright), and also gave him the title of Spiritual Father. Israel Eckerlin (Onesimus) was the first prior (Vorsteher). In 1740 the cloisters contained thirty-six single brethren and thirty-five sisters; and the members living in the neighborhood swelled the numbers of the Order of the Solitary to nearly three hundred. After the battle of Brandywine (1777), one of the buildings was used as a hospital for the wounded soldiers. The society derived its support from the products of various mills (paper, grist, oil, fulling, etc.), together with the labor of the members upon the farm and in various occupations within the cloister, especially printing. Their printing-press became quite famous. The Martyr-Book (Der Blutige Schall Platz, etc.), translated by them from the Dutch for the Mennonites, and printed in 1718, a large folio of 1,512 pages, is pronounced by Mr. S. W. Pennypacker (Pennsylvania Magazine of History, vol. v. p. 276) "the noblest specimen of American colonial bibliography." Nearly forty years before Robert Raikes established his sabbath school in Gloucester, Ludwig Häcker, the teacher of the common school at Ephrata, established a school for religious instruction on sabbath afternoons. The society flourished for nearly fifty years, or until the death of Beissel, which occurred in 1768. He was succeeded by Peter Miller, a man of great learning, who, on arriving in Philadelphia in 1730, was ordained by the Scotch synod (Morgan Edwards says "by the Dutch Presbyterians"), but was received into the society at Ephrata in 1735, where he continued till his death, in 1796. He was a man of great learning and sincere piety; but before his death the society began to decline, and there are now but few members, held together mainly by the property which is vested in the society. This consists of about eighty acres of the original tract, with the old dilapidated cloisters. There is also a large cloister still remaining at Snow Hill, but having at the present time only six inmates.

The Tunkers are often confounded with the other peace sects, in Pennsylvania, of German origin, especially with the Mennonites, the Amish, Schwenckfelders, etc.; but they have no historical connection, and differ from them in some important particulars. The Mennonites and the Amish baptize by pouring (see art. MENNONITES). The Schwenckfelders do not observe the sacraments, though recently some attempt has been made to introduce them. This society was founded in Silesia by Kaspar Schwenckfeld von Ossing, a nobleman, and counsellor to the Duke of Sigmütz.

He was a very learned and pious man; but differing from Luther upon the nature of the Eucharist, the efficacy of the Divine Word, and the human nature of Christ, he was opposed by the Protestants as well as by the Catholics. He died in 1562. His followers were also opposed and persecuted; and many of them, during the next century, took refuge in Saxony. In 1734 a number of families emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery and the neighboring counties. For a hundred and fifty years they have held, each year, a festival (Gedächtnistag) in grateful memory of their arrival. They have but five or six churches, all of them in Montgomery and the adjoining counties, and number about two hundred families. The doctrines, government, and discipline of the Schwenckfelders in many respects resemble those of the Friends, whom they also resemble in intelligent and pious zeal, leading sober, honest, peaceful, and industrious lives.

TURIBIUS, Alphonso, a saint of the Roman Catholic Church; was b. in Spain, Nov. 16, 1538; d. in Santa, Peru, Nov. 23, 1606. He entered the service of the state; was appointed president of Grenada by King Philip II., and in 1581 archbishop of Lima, although he was still a layman. He greatly distinguished himself in the management of his diocese, and is said to have raised one person from the dead, and wrought other miracles. His remains, which are interred at Lima, are said to still possess miraculous qualities. He was beatified by Innocent XI. in 1679, and canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1726. NEUDECKER.

TURKEY. The Turkish tribes coming from Central Asia accepted Mohammedanism when they came in contact with it. The Ottoman Turks founded a Mohammedan Empire, and carried on their wars in the name of the Prophet. When Sultan Selim conquered Egypt, he brought away the last of the caliphs of the family of Koreish, and held him as a prisoner at Constantinople until he ceded to him his rights as caliph, or Imam-ul-Mussilmin. Since that time the Ottoman sultans have claimed to be caliphs, or successors of the Prophet; and their claim has been generally recognized by orthodox Mohammedans, on account of their ability to maintain it, in spite of the fact that the Prophet himself declared that the caliph must be of his own family. Under these caliphs of Constantinople, the constitution of the government has been strictly Mohammedan. The law has been that of the Shera'at. This law is based upon the Koran, the religious traditions, and the decisions of the distinguished doctors of the Mohammedan law. The Sultan is in all things absolutely supreme; but he is expected to consult the Sheik-ul-Islam, an officer appointed by himself, in regard to any doubtful question. The Sheik-ul-Islam may give an answer himself, or he may consult the Ulema, i.e., the learned doctors of the law under him. This religious constitution of the Ottoman Empire has stood in the way of any real reform in the government. Every thing is sacrificed to the interests of the caliphate. The Koran declares that any Mohammedan who may deny his faith shall be put to death; and there has consequently never been any such thing as religious liberty possible in Turkey, although, at times since the Crimean war, conversions to Christianity have been tolerated on account of the vigorous action of the English Government in defence of the few converts.

When the Turks conquered the country, they found already established in it a number of Christian churches, as well as communities of Jews and Pagans. In Egypt was the Coptic Church; in Asia, the Armenian, the Catholic, the Syrian, the Orthodox or Greek; in Europe, the Greek and the Roman Catholic. The majority of the adherents of these churches refused to become Mohammedans, and it was impossible to destroy them: so the Turks applied to them the third principle of the Koran, and allowed them to pay tribute, and live in the country as aliens. The church organizations and hierarchies were maintained and used by the Turks as means of more easily governing the people. Certain privileges and rights were conferred upon them by imperial firman. The patriarchs and bishops were appointed by the joint action of the Church and the Government, and were, in fact, officers of the Turkish Government quite as much as of the Church. They had civil as well as ecclesiastical authority over their flocks, and were sometimes the instruments of Turkish oppression, sometimes oppressors themselves, and sometimes the protectors of the Christians. The idea of the Turk was, that, by controlling the ecclesiastical organization, he could control the people more easily than if he dealt with them as individuals. This was true; but, on the other hand, in so doing he prepared the way for the destruction of his empire. This system has enabled the different nationalities of the empire to maintain a separate existence, to keep up national feeling, and to resist Mohammedan propagandism. The Turks have at last begun to appreciate this; and of late years the authority of the Christian ecclesiastics has been curtailed, and efforts have been made to do away with the special privileges accorded to the churches. The churches have vigorously resisted, and have been supported in this by the European powers. There are now in Constantinople, officially recognized by the Porte, Patriarchs of the Armenian, Catholic Armenian, Latin, and Orthodox churches, the Exarch of the Bulgarian Church, the Vekil of the Protestants, and the Haham-Bashii of the Jews. Except the Catholics and Protestants, these religious bodies have done nothing since the Turkish conquest to propagate their faith; but their hostility to each other has been almost as great as their hatred of the Turks.

Protestant Missions.—The Protestant Reformation in Europe was not without influence in Turkey, and some of the highest ecclesiastics of the Orthodox Church were more or less in sympathy with it. But the people were too ignorant and too isolated to be reached by any movement from without; and Protestantism was practically unknown to them until the establishment of Protestant missions in Turkey, early in the present century. These missions have been confined almost exclusively to the Jews and the Oriental Christians. There are now (1883) twenty-five societies engaged in this work,—the Church Missionary Society, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, the London Jews Society, the Established Church of Scotland, the Free Church of Scotland, the Irish Presbyterian Mission, the Palestine Church Missionary Society, the British Syrian School Society, the Lebanon Schools Committee, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Whately Schools Society in Egypt. All of these are British organizations; and in addition to these, there are several independent enterprises, mostly schools, conducted by the English. The American societies are the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the Presbyterian Board of Missions, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission, the United Presbyterian Mission, the Methodist-Episcopal Mission, the Christian (Campbellite) Mission, the Society of Friends (American and English). There are also a number of publication societies, both English and American, which have agents in Turkey, or work through the missionaries. The most important are the British and Foreign Bible Society, the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, the London Religious Tract Society. The German missions are the Kaiserswerth Deaconesses, the Krishona Missions, and the Jerusalem Verein. These societies employ about 450 missionaries and assistant missionaries, and about 1,300 native assistants. The whole number of Protestants in Turkey is estimated at 40,000, of whom about 10,000 are communicants. Details cannot be given in the space allowed for this article in regard to all of the societies, but the more important ones merit special attention. First of all stands the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, which originally represented the Presbyterian, Dutch Reformed, and Congregational churches of America, but since 1870 only the last. The work of this board in Turkey was commenced in 1819, when two missionaries, Messrs. Fisk and Parsons, were sent out to begin work at Jerusalem. This mission was never fairly established, but in 1823 the Syrian mission was commenced at Beyrout. The Armenian mission was founded at Constantinople in 1831, and the Jewish mission in 1832, the Assyrian mission in 1849, and the Bulgarian in 1858. Several missionaries have at times been appointed to work among the Mohammedans, but without any permanent result. The board has now four distinct missions in Turkey,—the European, Western, Central, and Eastern Turkey missions; and its work is chiefly among the Armenians, Bulgarians, and Greeks. The missionaries at first had no intention of establishing an independent Protestant church in Turkey, but sought rather to reform the existing Christian churches. The peculiar constitution of the Turkish Empire, which not only gave civil power to the patriarchs, but treated as an outlaw every person not belonging to some established church, together with the violent animosity of the ecclesiastics against evangelical teaching, finally forced the missionaries to found a Protestant church, or, more properly, a Protestant civil community, which was recognized by the Porte in 1850, through the influence of England. In 1882 the American Board had in Turkey 156 male and female missionaries. They also supported, wholly or in part, 580 native pastors, preachers, teachers, etc. They have 97 churches, with 6,726 communicants; 481 having been added during the year. They have 24 theological and high schools, 18 high schools for girls, 379 common schools, with about 15,000 pupils in all. They have printed and circulated, since the establishment of the missions, 2,555,139 books, or 317,200,364 pages. Two colleges, at Aintab and Kharpoot, are in part connected with the board.

The mission to Syria was transferred by the American Board in 1870 to the Presbyterian Church, and reports the following statistics: missionaries, 33; native laborers, 155; churches, 12; communicants, 877; added during the year, 58; theological and high schools, 9; high schools for girls, 3; common schools, 91; pupils in all, 4,371; pages printed from beginning, 206,713,217.

The United Presbyterian Mission in Egypt was founded in 1851, and reports the following statistics, Dec. 31, 1881: missionaries, 24; native laborers, 146; churches, 13; communicants, 1,168; added during the year, 205; theological and high schools, 2; high schools for girls, 2; common schools, 41; pupils in all, 2,410; volumes of books sold during year 1881, 27,150. Most of the printing for this mission has been done at Beyrout, and is included in the statistics of the Syrian mission.

The missions to the Jews in Turkey are conducted by the London Jews Society, which has 5 stations, 7 missionaries, 2 medical missionaries, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the church of Scotland, which has 5 stations, 5 missionaries, 1 medical missionary, 6 helpers, and 6 schools; the Free Church of Scotland, which has 2 stations, 2 missionaries, 2 helpers, and 3 schools. In all there are four organized churches. It is supposed that the wives of the missionaries are not included in these statistics, as they are in those which precede them.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has eleven depots and depositories in Turkey, with a central agency at Constantinople. It now employs thirty-three colportors. It commenced work in Turkey about 1806. It has circulated the Bible in thirty-five languages, to the amount of 1,958,804 volumes. The American Bible Society has a central agency at Constantinople. Its most important branch is at Beyrout; but it operates through all the stations of the American missions. It now employs 50 colportors. It circulates the Bible in twenty-six languages, and the total number of volumes circulated since 1858 is 501,805.

Both of these societies have worked in such close connection with the missionary societies, and have so generally depended upon the missionaries for their translations and for the work of publication, that it is impossible to say exactly how large a proportion of the volumes reported above is included in the statistics already given in connection with the missions. Up to 1858 the missionaries acted as agents of the American Bible Society. Robert College at Constantinople, and the Syrian Protestant College at Beyrout, are independent, endowed institutions, not connected with any missionary society; but they are the fruit of missionary work. Robert College has 17 professors and instructors, and 238 students. Its course of instruction is similar to that of the best American colleges. It was founded in 1863. The Syrian Protestant College has a medical department in addition to its college course, and was founded in 1865. It has 16 professors and instructors, and 127 students. These colleges are both American institutions, and in both the language of instruction is English. Their students represent almost all the languages, religions, and nationalities of the East.

The real influence of Protestant missions in Turkey cannot be measured by any such statistics as those given above. It has been not only religious, but intellectual, social, and political. It has modified the character of the Oriental churches, and to some extent reformed them. It has carried Western ideas and Christian civilization into the darkest corners of the empire. Many English statesmen familiar with Turkish affairs have declared that American missionaries have accomplished more for the regeneration of the East than all other influences combined. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe and Lord Shaftesbury may be mentioned, among others, as having expressed this opinion.

Roman-Catholic Missions.—Neither the Roman-Catholic authorities nor the French embassy at Constantinople are ready to furnish the statistics of Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey; although an offer was made to publish what they might furnish, without note or comment. Without such statistics, only general statements can be made.

All Roman-Catholic missions in Turkey are political agencies of the French Government, and as such receive pecuniary aid and diplomatic support, even from the present anti-clerical government of France. In return for this they are expected to propagate and sustain French influence under all circumstances. So far as my observation goes, the principal Catholic organizations represented in Turkey are the Lazarists, Mechitarists, Franciscans, Dominicans, Capuchins, Carmelites, Jesuits, and various organizations of Sisters of Charity. For many years past they have made but little apparent progress in winning converts from other Christian churches, and they have not attempted to convert Mohammedans.

For a time the Bulgarians, after their conversion to Christianity, inclined toward Rome; but they finally united with the Eastern Church; and only a small body of Paulicians are now Catholics. Since the commencement of the conflict between the Bulgarians and the Greek Patriarch, great efforts have been made to win the Bulgarians over to Rome; and, since the expulsion of the religious orders from France, this mission has been largely re-enforced, and French protection has been offered to converts, especially in Macedonia. The results have thus far been small. In Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Albania, there is a strong Catholic element; and the Austrian Government is doing its best to increase its influence, thus far with no other effect than to exasperate the population. Among the Greeks, no progress has been made for fifty years. There is a rich and influential Armenian Catholic Church in Turkey, which during the last century suffered terrible persecution; but this church has during the past few years been distracted by dissensions, growing out of an effort, on the part of Rome, to Latinize it. Several thousand families have gone back to the old Armenian Church.

Among the Arabic-speaking races, the Catholics have won over many of the Jacobites, control the Maronites of Syria, have some influence among the Greeks and Copts, and of course maintain establishments in Tripoli and Tunis. In addition to the native Catholics, there is all through the empire a large foreign population, which is generally Roman Catholic, and which contributes to the support of the missions. In fact, much of the influence of this faith in Turkey has always come from the diplomatic, consular, and commercial establishments maintained here by Catholic countries. The native Christians have always been taught to feel, that, in becoming Catholics, they became in some sense Europeans, and shared in some degree the honor and immunities of foreigners. In addition to these social and political advantages afforded to converts, the Catholic missions have founded churches, schools, hospitals, and orphanages, monasteries, convents, and seminaries. Their schools have always been of a low order; but they have taught the French language, and such accomplishments as took the fancy of the people. Until the establishment of Protestant missions, they were, no doubt, the best schools in the country. Of late years, whatever progress has been made has been due chiefly to the work of the Sisters of Charity in hospitals, orphanages, schools, and house-to-house visitation. They are to be found everywhere; and, although generally ignorant and bigoted, they are indefatigable workers, well trained to obedience, self-sacrificing, and wholly devoted to these works of Christian charity.

The number of Roman-Catholic missionaries in the empire, native and foreign, male and female, including the ecclesiastics of the native Catholic churches, cannot be less than ten thousand. I have no means of estimating the annual expenditure, but the Roman-Catholic missions have certainly been more successful than the Protestant in "living on the country." They depend much less, in proportion to their numbers, upon foreign aid.

It is not easy for a Protestant to form an estimate of the success of Roman-Catholic missions. They have no doubt planted the church so firmly in this empire, that it can stand by itself without foreign aid; but they have done nothing towards converting the Mohammedans, and have made no progress in winning over the Oriental churches to a union with Rome. They have not essentially weakened these churches, nor have they made converts enough to enter into any rivalry with them. They will not advance farther, unless, as in the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the country falls under the control of some Catholic power.

GEORGE WASHBURN

(President of Robert College, Constantinople.)

TURLUPINS, The, a sect of the latter part of the fourteenth and the beginning of the fifteenth centuries, which was quite numerous in Paris and in the province of Isle-de-France. It held private meetings, at which, in order to represent paradise, the members threw aside their garments. They had the appearance of holiness and earnestness. Gregory XI. in 1373 urged the king of France to support the Dominicans against the Turlupins; and, when they spread to Savoy, a similar appeal was likewise sent to Duke Amadeus. Gerson attributes to them the same doctrines that were advocated by the Brethren of the Free Spirit.

TURNER, Daniel, was b. at Blackwater Park, near St. Albans, March 1, 1710; and d. at Abingdon, Berkshire, Sept. 5, 1795; Baptist pastor at Reading, 1741, and from 1748 at Abingdon. He published Short Meditations, 1771, and two other prose works; Divine Songs, Hymns, etc., 1747; and Poems, Devotional and Moral, 1794. Four of his hymns appeared in ASH and EVANS's Collection, 1769, and eight in RIPPON's, 1787. Several of them have been widely popular, and are still in use.

TURNER, Francis, English prelate, d. Nov. 2, 1700. He was graduated at New College, Oxford, April 14, 1659; proceeded D.D., 1669; was master of St. John's College, Cambridge, April 11, 1670; dean of Windsor, 1683; bishop of Rochester, Nov. 11, 1683; translated to Ely, Aug. 23, 1684. On May 18, 1688, he joined Archbishop Sancroft and five other bishops in refusing to read James II.'s Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, and was with them committed to the Tower, June 8, but acquitted June 29. Subsequently refusing to take the oath to William and Mary on their ascension to the throne, he was suspended March, 1689, and deprived Feb. 1, 1691. He then went into retirement. He published Vindication of the late Archbishop Sancroft and his Brethren; Brief Memoirs of Nicholas Farrar, 2d ed., 1837.

TURNER, James, Presbyterian, b. in Bedford County, Va., May 7, 1759; d. at New London, Jan. 8, 1828, where he had been pastor since July 28, 1792. His contemporary fame as a preacher was very great. See SPRAGUE'S Annals, iii. 581-585; GILLET: History Presbyterian Church, vol. i.

TURNER, Samuel Hulbeart, D.D., Episcopalian; b. in Philadelphia, Jan. 23, 1790; d. in New-York City, Dec. 21, 1861. He was graduated at the university of Pennsylvania, 1807; entered the ministry; settled at Chestertown, Md., 1812; professor of historic theology in the General Theological Seminary, New York, 1818, and from 1821 till his death, professor of biblical learning. He was a sound and able commentator. He translated, with Bishop Whittingham JAHN'S Introduction to the Old Testament (N.Y., 1827), and PLANCK'S Introduction to Sacred Philology and Interpretation (1831); wrote commentaries upon the Greek text of Hebrews (1852, 3d ed., 1859), Romans (1853, 3d ed., 1859), Ephesians (1856), Galatians (1856, 2d ed., 1860); prepared Companion to the Book of Genesis, 1841; Biographical Notices of some of the most Distinguished Jewish Rabbies, and Translations of Portions of their Commentaries and other Works, 1817; Thoughts on the Origin, Character, and Interpretation of Scripture Prophecy, 1852; Teachings of the Master, 1858; Spiritual Things compared with Spiritual, or Gospels and Acts illustrated by Parallel References, 1859; The Gospels according to the Ammonian Sections and the Tables of Eusebius, 1861. See his Autobiography, 1862.

TURRETINI, or TURRETIN, the name of several distinguished theologians of the Reformed Church, whose ancestor Francesco emigrated in 1579 from Lucca to Geneva, for religious considerations. — I. Bénédict, was b. in Zürich, 1588; became successively pastor (1612) and professor of theology (1618) in Geneva; d. [March 4], 1631. He took a prominent part at the synod of Alais (1620), which introduced the decrees of the synod of Dort into France. He left behind him a number of sermons, and especially a Defence de la fidélité des traductions de la Bible faites à Genève, Geneva, 1618-20, 2 vols. — II. François, son of the preceding, a distinguished representative of Calvinism; was b. in Geneva, [Oct. 17], 1623; d. there [Sept. 28], 1687. After studying at Geneva, Leyden, Paris (where he heard Gassendi), Montauban, and Nismes, he became pastor of the Italian congregation in Geneva, and in 1653 professor of theology. He is specially known for his zealous opposition to the theology of Saumur, as the earnest champion of the strictest orthodoxy of the canons of Dort, and as one of the authors of the Helvetic Consensus. He sternly opposed his more liberal colleagues, Mestrezat and Louis Tronchin, and exercised a preponderating influence upon the Genevan ministry of his day. His principal work is his Theological Institutes, Institutio theologiæ Elencticae in qua status controversiæ perspicue exponitur, præcipua Orthodoxorum argumenta proponuntur et indicantur et fontes solutionum aperiuntur, Geneva, 1679-85, 2d ed., 1688, 3 vols., new edition, Edinburgh, 1847-48. — III. Jean Alphonse, [also called "Turretin the Younger"], son of the preceding, representative of a more moderate theology than his father's, an advocate of ecclesiastical union, and the most distinguished theologian of his name; was b. [Aug. 24], 1674, in Geneva, where he d. May 1, 1737. He studied theology under Louis Tronchin, in his native city, and in 1691 visited Holland, studying at Leyden, and in 1692, England, studying at Oxford and Cambridge, and enjoying the society of the first men of the time, — Burnet, Tillotson, Wake, etc. On his return to Geneva, in his twenty-second year, he was made pastor of the Italian congregation, and in 1697 professor of church history. His lectures were published in 1734. At Tronchin's death, in 1705, he was transferred to the chair of theology. Turretin's influence as a pastor, a theologian, and a man, was very great. His career was specially marked by the successful effort to modify the strict Calvinism which his father had taught, and an attempt to promote a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches. It was mainly due to his efforts that the rule was abolished, in 1706, requiring ministers to subscribe to the Helvetic Consensus, with the words, sic sentio, sic profiteor, sic docebo et contrarium non docebo. In 1725 the Consensus was finally renounced. As regards ecclesiastical union, Turretin was led to interest himself for the first time in the subject in 1707, when he heard that Frederick I. of Prussia, who was desirous of bringing the Lutheran and Reformed churches together, sought for the opinion of the Genevan clergy on the subject. They replied on April 22, in a document drawn up by Turretin, which emphasized the points of agreement between the two communions, and expressed a hearty readiness to admit Lutherans to the Lord's Table in Reformed churches. Turretin was thus led to consider the distinction between the fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and to incorporate his views in a volume [English translation, A Discourse concerning the Fundamental Articles in Religion, London, 1720]. He defines the fundamental doctrines to be those doctrines "a knowledge and acceptance of which are necessary to secure the grace and salvation of God," and urged ecclesiastical union on the basis of them. The work was attacked by the Jesuit François de Pierre (Lyons, 1728), who urged that the Reformed churches, with such an explanation, had no further reason for remaining outside the Catholic Church. This work of Turretin formed a part of his Nubes testium pro moderato et pacifico de rebus theologicis judicium et instituenda inter Protestantas concordia, etc., 1729. His theology appeared in 2 vols., 1737, under the title, Cogitationes et dissertationes theol., etc. After his death, there appeared Com. theoretico-practicus in Ep. ad Thessal. (Basel, 1739) and Prælectiones ad Ep. Rom., cap. xi., Gen., 1741. [See E. DE BUDÉ: François et J. Alphonse Turretini, Lausanne, 1880, 2 vols.] DR. THOMAS.

TWESTEN, August Detlev Christian, b. at Glückstadt, Holstein, April 11, 1789; d. in Berlin, Jan. 8, 1876. He studied theology at Kiel and Berlin, and was appointed professor at Kiel in 1814, and in Berlin in 1834. He was a pupil of Schleiermacher; and his Vorlesungen über die Dogmatik der evang.-luther. Kirche (Hamburg, 2 vols., unfinished, vol. i. 1826, 4th ed., 1838, first part vol. ii. 1837) forms a transition from the standpoint of his master to the strict Lutheran orthodoxy. He also published a Logik, 1831, and Matthias Flacius Illyricus, 1844.

TWIN, or DWIN, Councils of. Twin, under Chosrov II., became the capital of Armenia, and the religious centre of the realm. Eight councils were held there. The First Council, held in 452, declared Twin the seat of the Catholicos. The Second Council was summoned by the Catholicos, Nerses II., in 527, and passed thirty-eight canons, one of which ordered a fast of one week every month. The Third Council was held under Moses II. in 551, and decreed that the 11th of July, 553, should begin the Armenian era, and be the New-Year's Day of the first year. The Fourth Council (596) was important for bringing about a separation between the Armenians and Georgians: the latter, unable to agree upon a catholicos, had requested Moses II. to appoint one. He chose Cyrion, who decreed the acceptance of the Council of Chalcedon. The Fourth Council took up this decree, and condemned Cyrion and his followers. This act was the occasion of much controversy among the Armenians. The Fifth Council was held under Nerses III. in 645; condemned all heretics, and especially the Council of Chalcedon and its supporters. The Sixth Council was convened by Nerses III. in 648, and the seventh by John IV. in 719. The latter passed thirty-two canons, which provided that the altar and baptismal font should be made of stone, unleavened bread and unmixed wine should be used in the communion, the clause "Thou that wast crucified for us" (ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμῶν), in the Trisagion, should be sung three times morning and evening, as well as at the mass, etc. The last canon strictly forbade all intercourse with the Paulicians. The Eighth and last Council was held in 726, and condemned Julian Halicarnassensis, his followers, and his writings. H. PETERMANN.

TWISSE, William, D.D., by action of Parliament first moderator of the Westminster Assembly of Divines; b. at Speenham-Land, near Newbury, Berkshire, Eng., 1575; d. in London, July 20, 1646. He was a fellow of New College, Oxford. In 1604 he proceeded D.D., and then became chaplain to the princess-palatine, daughter of James I. On his return he was made vicar of Newbury, and so remained until compelled to leave at the beginning of the Civil War; although he had been offered a prebend's stall at Winchester, several other preferments in the Church of England, and the professorship of divinity at Franeker, Friesland. He was of German descent, noted as a high Calvinist of the supralapsarian school, full of learning and speculative genius, but not well fitted to preside over such an assembly. He distinguished himself by his writings against Arminianism. See Opera, Amsterdam, 1652, 3 vols. folio. He also wrote, The morality of the Fourth commandment as still in force to bind Christians, London, 1641, 4to; The riches of God's love unto the vessels of mercy consistent with his absolute hatred or reprobation of the vessels of wrath, Oxford, 1653, folio. He was buried in St. Peter's, Westminster; but his bones were dug up, by order of council, Sept. 14, 1661, and thrown, with those of several other persons, into a pit in St. Margaret's churchyard. See NEAL: Hist. Puritans, vol. ii. 40.

TYANA, Apollonius of. See APOLLONIUS OF TYANA.

TYANA, the Synod of, held in 368 in Tyana, Cappadocia, has some importance in the history of the spread of the Nicene doctrine of the co-essentiality of the Son. Eusebius of Casarea in Cappadocia, Athanasius of Ancyra, Gregory Nazianzen, and others, were present. A deputation which had been appointed by the semi-Arians was present, and professed the Nicene faith. The synod proposed a great council at Tarsus for the renewed affirmation of the Nicene faith, but it was interdicted by the Emperor Valens. See SOZOMEN, vi. 12; SOCRATES, iv. 12; HIEFEL: Conciliengeschichte, i. FROMMÜLLER.

TYCHONIUS, d. about 390; belonged to the Donatist sect, though without giving up his connection with the Catholic Church, for which reason he was violently attacked by Parmenianus as a traitor. Of his writings, we have only one, Liber de septem regulis; but as the first attempt at forming a theory of Christian hermeneutics, and on account of the influence which its author exercised on Augustine, it is of great interest. It was first edited by GRYNÆUS, Basel, 1569, and best by GALLANDI, in his Bibl. Vet. Patr., viii. pp. 107-129. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

TYCHSEN, Oluf Gerhardt, b. at Tonder, Sleswick, Dec. 14, 1731; d. at Rostock, Dec. 30, 1815. He was educated at Altona; studied theology and Oriental languages at Halle; became in 1759 a member of the Kallenberg missionary institution for the conversion of Jews and Mohammedans, but proved very unsuccessful in his practical attempts; and was in 1760 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Bützow, whence in 1789 he was removed to Rostock. He was a man of great learning, but without judgment, as appears from his controversy with Kennicott (Tentamen de cæcis codicum Hebr. Veteris Test. MSS. generibus, Rostock, 1772), with Bayer (Die Unechtheit der jüdischen Münzen mit hebräischen und samaritanischen Buchstaben, Rostock, 1779), and with others. The best he has written is found in his Bützowischen Nebenstunden, 1766-69, and Introduction in rem nummaria Muhammedanorum, Rostock, 1794; which latter has been highly praised by De Sacy. His life was written by HARTMANN, Bremen, 1818-20, 4 vols. ARNOLD.

TYLER, Bennet, D.D., Congregational theologian (first president of the Theological Institute of Connecticut, now located at Hartford); b. in Middlebury (then a part of Woodbury), Conn., July 10, 1783; d. at East Windsor, Conn., May 14, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1801; spent a year as teacher in Weston, Conn.; studied theology with the Rev. Asahel Hooker at Goshen, Conn.; licensed in 1806; begun to preach in 1807 at South Britain, where he was ordained in 1808; became president of Dartmouth College in 1822; received the degree of D.D. from Middlebury College the same year; succeeded Dr. Payson as pastor of Second Congregational Church, Portland, Me., in 1828; elected president of the Theological Institute in 1833; inaugurated May 13, 1834, when the corner-stone of the new edifice was laid in East Windsor, Conn.; resigned this position July 16, 1857, and died suddenly at the house of his daughter, from a neuralgic affection in the head and lungs. In all these positions Dr. Tyler was successful; and though much of his public life was spent in theological controversy, his Christian character was recognized even by his opponents, while his friends testify as to his genial temper, unaffected candor, genuine humility, and cheerful piety. As a teacher of theology he was clear in statement, apt in meeting objections, and, above all, successful in making his pupils feel that he believed, felt, and lived the truth he taught them.

Dr. Tyler's name has been conspicuous in connection with a theological controversy among the Congregationalists of Connecticut, which was occasioned by a discourse of N. W. Taylor, D.D. (concio ad clerum, General Association, 1828), professor in the recently established divinity school of Yale College. On a visit to Connecticut in 1829 (he was then pastor at Portland), Dr. Tyler collected the pamphlets which had been issued in the controversy, and shortly afterwards began a correspondence with Dr. Taylor (who had been a classmate at Yale), which passed into a public discussion, continuing for years, and finding its practical issue in the formation of the Pastoral Union of Connecticut (Sept. 10, 1833), and the establishment of the Theological Institute, of which Dr. Tyler became president. The views of Dr. Taylor were regarded by those who took this step, as "dangerous innovations;" and the Pastoral Union was organized with a creed which left no room for doubt on the points at issue.

The germ of the controversy was the position, attributed to Dr. Taylor, "that no human being can become depraved but by his own act, and that the sinfulness of the race does not pertain to man's nature." In connection with this, regeneration was regarded as the act of man's own will or heart; and the primary cause of this right choice was found in self-love, or a desire of the greatest happiness. Incidentally there was involved the question whether God could prevent sin in a moral system. Dr. Taylor's statements on these points have been qualified by himself and his friends, and some of his views now find few defenders. There is less uncertainty as to Dr. Tyler's views. He claimed to be in accord with the New-England Calvinism, represented by the two Edwardses, Bellamy, Hopkins, and Dwight. His position on the doctrine of original sin was not Augustinian: over against Dr. Taylor he asserted depravity of nature and the federal headship of Adam, but did not accept immediate imputation. He denied the self-determining power of the will, or the power of a contrary choice, and would not limit the definition of sin to voluntary transgression of known law. He accepted the distinction of Edwards between natural and moral ability, and denied most resolutely the "happiness theory." By discriminating between an unlimited atonement and limited redemption, he sought to preserve the doctrine of individual election. On the abstract question whether God could prevent sin, Dr. Tyler answered in the affirmative. Regeneration he regarded as "effected, not by moral suasion, or by the efficiency of any means whatever, but by the direct agency of the Holy Spirit, changing the moral disposition, and imparting a new spiritual life to the soul." The controversy, as was usual at that time, was carried on with speculative and dogmatic weapons; but the friends of Dr. Tyler claim that he was eminently scriptural in his arguments. The exegetical and historical methods of our present day have strengthened rather than weakened the defences of the system which Dr. Tyler represented, though some of his subordinate positions and arguments cannot now be maintained. As yet nothing has occurred to impeach the wisdom of Dr. Tyler and his associates in founding the Theological Institute of Connecticut.

In later times Dr. Tyler became engaged in discussion with Dr. Bushnell (see below), and his own orthodoxy was called in question before the Pastoral Union in 1856. From this charge he was almost unanimously exonerated.

Dr. Tyler not only contributed largely to the theological controversy above named, but published many sermons and addresses, and contributed many articles to the religious periodicals of the day, — Christian Sentinel, Christian Spectator, National Preacher, Connecticut Magazine, New-England Panoplist, etc. His style is forcible and clear; and his matter always manifests the grand old Puritan faith in a personal God of holiness.

M. B. RIDDLE.

TYNDALE, William, descended from an ancient Northumbrian family, b. 1484, most probably at North Nibley, Gloucestershire; went to school at Oxford, and afterwards to Magdalen Hall and Cambridge, and about 1520 became tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, at Little Sodbury in Gloucestershire. He was in orders; but the record of his ordination has not yet been verified. Having become attached to the doctrines of the Reformation, and devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures, the open avowal of his sentiments in the house of Walsh, his disputes with Roman-Catholic dignitaries there, and especially his preaching, excited much opposition, and led to his removal to London (about October, 1523), where he began to preach, and made many friends among the laity, but none among ecclesiastics. He was hospitably entertained at the house of Sir Humphrey Monmouth, and also pecuniarily aided by him and others in the accomplishment of his purpose to translate the Scriptures into the vernacular. Unable to do so in England, he set out for the Continent (about May, 1524), and appears to have visited Hamburg and Wittenberg; but the place where he translated the New Testament, although conjectured to have been Wittenberg, cannot be named with certainty. It is, however, certain that the printing of the New Testament in quarto was begun at Cologne (in the summer of 1525), and completed at Worms, and that there was likewise printed an octavo edition (both before the end of that year). From an entry in Spalatin's Diary, Aug. 11, 1526, it seems to follow that he continued at Worms about a year: but the notices of his connection with Hermann von dem Busche and the University of Marburg are utterly unwarranted conjectures; and, it being now an established fact that Hans Luft never had a printing-press at Marburg, the colophon to Tyndale's translation of Genesis, and the titlepages of several pamphlets purporting to have been printed by Luft at Marburg, only deepen the seemingly impenetrable mystery which overhangs the life of Tyndale during the interval between his departure from Worms and his final settlement at Antwerp. His literary activity during that interval was extraordinary. When he left England, his knowledge of Hebrew, if he had any, was of the most rudimentary nature; and yet he mastered that difficult tongue so as to produce from the original an admirable translation of the entire Pentateuch,<sup>1</sup> the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, First and Second Samuel, First and Second Kings, First Chronicles, contained in Matthew's Bible of 1537, and of the Book of Jonah, so excellent, indeed, that to this day his work is not only the basis of those portions of the Authorized Version, but constitutes nine-tenths of that translation. His biblical translations appeared in the following order: New Testament, 1525-26; Pentateuch, 1530; Jonah, 1531. (See ENGLISH VERSIONS.) In addition to these, continued to his dying hour, he produced sundry other works, which will now be enumerated. His first original composition, A Pathway into the Holy Scripture, is really a reprint, slightly altered, of his Prologue to the quarto edition of his New Testament, and had appeared in separate form before 1532; The Parable of the Wicked Mammon (1527); and The Obedience of a Christian Man (1527-28). These several works drew out in 1529 Sir Thomas More's Dialogue, etc. In 1530 appeared Tyndale's Practyse of Prelates, and in 1531 his Answer, etc., to the Dialogue, his Exposition of the First Epistle of St. John, and the famous Prologue to Jonah; in 1532, An Exposition upon the V. VI. VII. Chapters of Mathew; and in 1536, A brief declaration of the Sacraments, etc., which, though alleged to have been printed during his life, seems to be a posthumous publication. Joshua-Second Chronicles also was published after his death. All these works were written during those mysterious years, in places of concealment so secure and well chosen, that neither the ecclesiastical nor diplomatic emissaries of Wolsey and Henry VIII., charged to track, hunt down, and seize the fugitive, were able to reach them, and they are even yet unknown. Impressed with the idea that the progress of the Reformation in England rendered it safe for him to leave his concealment, he settled at Antwerp in 1531, and combined the work of an evangelist with that of a translator of the Bible. Mainly through the instrumentality of one Philips, the agent either of Henry or English ecclesiastics, or possibly of both, he was arrested, imprisoned in the Castle of Vilvorden, tried, either for heresy or treason, or both, and convicted; was first strangled, and then burnt in the prison-yard, Oct. 6, 1536. His last words were, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes." Excepting the narrative of Foxe, which is very unsatisfactory, and the opportune discovery of a letter written by Tyndale in prison, showing that he was shamefully neglected, and that he continued his literary labors to the last, no official records of his betrayal, arrest, trial, and martyrdom, have as yet been discovered. Indeed, less is known of Tyndale than of almost any of his contemporaries, and his history remains to be written. If the unknown and the mysterious excite and sustain our interest, no theme can excel that attached to Tyndale. His life must have abounded in incident, variety, and adventure; and it has culminated in tragedy. The writer has thus far striven in vain to secure additional information; but, as it is improbable that all the records have been destroyed or lost, some may be recovered. That his precious life might have been saved, cannot be doubted; and, although neither Cromwell nor Henry has been convicted of planning and conniving at his death, it is impossible to exonerate them from criminal indifference and culpable neglect.

Tyndale's place in history has not yet been sufficiently established as a translator of the Scriptures, as an apostle of liberty, and as a chief promoter of the Reformation in England. In all these respects his influence has been singularly undervalued. The sweeping statement found in almost all our histories, that Tyndale translated from the Vulgate and Luther, is most damaging to the reputation of the writers who make it; for, as a matter of fact, it is contrary to truth, since his translations are made directly from the originals. (See Mombert: Handbook of the English Versions, chap. iv.) As an apostle of liberty, he stands foremost among the writers of the period, whose heroic fortitude and invincible love of the truth were heard with a force superior to royal and ecclesiastical injunctions; and the very flames to which fanaticism and tyranny consigned his writings burnt them into the very hearts of the people, and made them powerful instruments in attaching and converting multitudes to the principles of the Reformation; and it is not exaggeration to say, that the noble sentiments of William Tyndale, uttered in pure, strong Saxon English, and steeped in the doctrines of the gospel, gave shape to the views of the more conspicuous promoters of that grand movement, who, like himself, sealed their convictions with their blood.

TYPE, from the Greek τύπος, means a prefiguration in a lower sphere of a fact belonging to a higher. It is allied to prophecy, allegory, and symbol: but prophecy is a prefiguration in words; type, in facts: allegory is a prefiguration through a fictitious image; type, in the form of full reality: symbol is a prefiguration by a hint which leads farther on through the natural association of ideas; type, as a complete, self-sufficient representation.

Types, in this sense of the word, are of so frequent occurrence, both in nature and history, that no total view of any comprehensiveness can be formed without involving a typical element; and, on the other side, it comes so natural to the human mind to discover types, or, rather, to recognize them, that no true method of interpretation, in any sphere, can afford to neglect that element. How prominent it was in scriptural interpretation at the time of Christ, the New Testament itself gives striking evidence. Christ represents the brazen serpent of the desert as a type of the crucifixion of the Son of man (John iii. 14), and Jonah as a type of the burial of the Son of man (Matt. xii. 40). Paul represents the first Adam as a type of the second Adam (Rom. v. 14), and the paschal lamb as a type of Christ (1 Cor. v. 7). It occurs in almost every book of the New Testament; and it was, indeed, one of the most prominent features of the general education and spiritual character of the age.

Led on by the spirit of the time, and partly, also, by the example of the New Testament, the Christian theologians plunged with all their heart into the "profound interpretation of Scripture," putting the whole apparatus of types, allegories, symbols, etc., in full operation. In the Eastern Church the arbitrariness of Justin and Origen provoked both Jews and Pagans (Tryphon and Celsus). In the Western Church the exuberance of Ambrose and Hilary was hardly checked by Augustine. Although Augustine never abandons the historical sense, he considered it slavish weakness to stick to the literal sense, as the Jews did. He distinguishes between four methods of interpretation,—secundum historiam, etiologicalum (which discovers the purpose of an event), analogiam (which demonstrates the harmony between the Old and the New Testaments), and allegoriam. Under the last head he further distinguishes between allegoria historica, facti, sermonis, and sacramenti, which divisions correspond to the four methods of interpretation prevailing during the middle ages,—historica, allegorica (including the typical), tropologica (comprising the ethical and parnetical application), and anagogica (explaining the bearing upon future life).

With the Reformation, the allegorical interpretation of Scripture came to a sudden end, at least so far as the evangelical church was concerned. Though Luther did not disdain to use the allegorical narrative as a means of edification, he, as well as Melancthon and the other Reformers, was fully aware of its illegitimacy when used as doctrinal evidence (see Apolog., xii.). But, with the allegorical interpretation in general, the type, which is only a special form of it, was not discarded. The Dutch theologian Rivetus made an acute and just distinction between type and allegory. The distinction was adopted by Gerhard (Loci, ii. 67), and farther developed into distinctions between personal and real types, and between types innati (established by Scripture itself) and types illati (introduced into Scripture by analogy). Finally, Coccejus and the other great Dutch theologians, Hulsius, D'Outreïn, Van Till, Vitringa, made the typical interpretation as prevalent in the Reformed Church as the allegorical had formerly been in the Church universal. The great interest with which Jewish antiquities were studied at that time pushed on the movement, and into what vagaries it strayed an instance from Cranmer's De ara will show. Having represented the altar as a type of Christ, and having noticed that the altar is quadrangular, he asks, "Quadratus quomodo Christus fuerit?" ("How can Christ have been quadrangular?") In the Lutheran Church the literal sense was alone acknowledged as the true one, and typical interpretation was employed only as a means of edification. See Calov: Syst. theol., i. 663. Nevertheless, in the circle of the Wurtemberg pietism, by Bengel and his pupils, the latter received a new and most interesting development; the types being sought, not in the trivial details, but in the grand totalities of the old and new dispensations. See HILLER: Neues System alter Vorbilder Christi im Alten Testament, 1758, new ed., 1858.

It was, however, only within the narrow circle of the Wurtemberg pietists that typology was really cultivated. Outside of that circle rationalism flourished, and to the eye of rationalism typical interpretation seemed a mere dream. An unbelieving view of the sacred history will never hit upon the true characteristics of the divine economy: where the religious reader finds preparation and fulfilment, the indifferent reader will find nothing but empty accommodation and subjective parallelisms. The Spencerian view of the Mosaic worship, as having been borrowed from the Egyptian and other Oriental religions, gradually destroyed the typical character of the Old Testament; and, towards the middle of the eighteenth century, Henke declared typology to be a "trick long ago played out." Semler, in his Versuch einer freieren theologischen Lehrart (1777), declares, that, at all events, typology has nothing to do with true religion; and the unhappy method of interpretation was considered as completely destroyed by Rau's Freimüthige Untersuchung über die Typologie, 1784. It revived, however, with the general revival of religion in the beginning of the present century, and has since produced some of its finest fruits. TYRE (the Greek Τύρος, the Hebrew צֹר), a city of Phœnicia, and one of the most celebrated commercial centres of antiquity, stood on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean, in latitude 33° 17' north. It consisted of two parts,—one situated on the mainland, and called Old Tyre, for some reason not known; and the other, the city proper, situated on an island, and containing the principal sanctuary, the Temple of Melkarth (Hercules). It is first mentioned in Scripture in Josh. xix. 29, where it is spoken of as a fortified place. It was a monarchy, and not, like most of the great commercial cities of antiquity, a republic. Its king, Hiram, entertained very friendly relations with David (2 Sam. v. 11) and Solomon (1 Kings vii. 13-45), who from Tyre obtained not only materials, but also workmen, for buildings. Afterwards the friendly relations between Israel and Tyre were disturbed; because the Tyrians began to buy Hebrew captives, and sell them as slaves to the Greeks and Edomites (Joel iii. 4-8; Amos i. 9, 10). Meanwhile the power of the city was steadily increasing. It planted the celebrated colony, Carthage, on the coast of Northern Africa, and subjugated the Island of Cyprus, where rich copper-mines were opened. In 721 B.C. it was besieged by Shalmaneser, and in 585 B.C. by Nebuchadnezzar, but both times in vain, though the latter siege lasted for thirteen years. When Alexander the Great, after the battle of Issus (331), entered Phœnicia, Sidon, though at that time it was both richer and more powerful than Tyre, was prudent enough to submit, while Tyre in its pride decided to resist. After a siege of seven months it was taken, and from that calamity it never rose again: its independence was lost forever. It afterwards belonged to the Seleucidian kingdom of Syria (1 Macc. xi. 59; 2 Macc. iv. 18, 44), and came then under Roman rule. At the time of Christ, however, it was still a commercial place of some consequence, though not so important as Sidon. It is mentioned in Matt. xi. 21, xv. 21, Luke vi. 17, x. 13; and in the apostolic age it contained a Christian congregation, with which Paul staid for seven days (Acts xxi. 3-7). The present Sur stands on a peninsula, formed by the dam which Alexander constructed between the mainland and the island; but it is not much more than a village. TZSCHIRNER, Heinrich Gottlieb, a distinguished German theologian; was b. at Mitweida, Saxony, Nov. 14, 1778; d. at Leipzig, Feb. 17, 1825. After studying at Wittenberg and Leipzig, he became successively pastor at Mitweida, professor at Wittenberg in 1805, and professor of theology at Leipzig. He was also made pastor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and subsequently held other positions in connection with his professorship. He was a rationalist, with a strong leaning towards the supranaturalist school. He excelled as a pulpit orator. His principal work was his continuation of SCHROCKH's Church History in 2 vols., Leipzig, 1810-12. He spent ten years upon a work edited by Niedner (Leipzig, 1829), Der Fall d. Heidenthums. His Lectures on Theology were edited by Karl Hase, Leipzig, 1829. See H. G. TZSCHIRNER: Skizze s. Lebens, etc., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1828.

(6) CROZER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY is situated fourteen miles south of Philadelphia, on the border of the city of Chester, in the borough of Upland, Delaware County, Penn.

It was founded under the auspices of the Baptist denomination, by act of the Legislature, in 1867, and owes its name to the liberality of the children of John P. Crozer, Esq., then recently deceased, whose wide public munificence his family were simply carrying forward. For the establishment and permanent support of the institution they have contributed at least four hundred thousand dollars.

The seminary entered upon its work of instruction in the fall of 1868 with twenty students; graduated its first class in 1869, some having entered advanced in studies; and has now near two hundred alumni engaged in the work of the Christian ministry at home or abroad.

Its course of instruction extends through three years, and its diploma presupposes a thorough training in all those lines of study generally recognized as necessary to the candidate for the ministry. A special provision is made, however, for the training of those, also, who from any circumstances cannot pursue the study of the Bible in its original languages. They, on completing their course, receive a corresponding diploma.

The original faculty consisted of Rev. Henry G. Weston, president, and professor of preaching and pastoral theology; Rev. George D. B. Pepper, professor of Christian theology; Rev. Howard Osgood, professor of church history, and interpretation of the Hebrew Scriptures. Rev. Lemuel Moss was subsequently appointed professor of New-Testament interpretation. The faculty consists at present of Rev. Henry G. Weston, president, Rev. George R. Bliss, Rev. John C. Long, Rev. Elias H. Johnson, Rev. James M. Stifer, Rev. Barnard C. Taylor. A lecture-fund maintains an annual course to the students from without the faculty. The Bucknell Library of the seminary contains between 8,000 and 9,000 very carefully selected volumes, and is constantly increasing.

GEORGE R. BLISS (Professor).

UBBONITES [usual spelling; correctly, Ubbonites], a party of moderate Anabaptists founded in 1534 by Ubbo Philipps [Ubbe Philipzoon]. Born at Leuwarden, he was consecrated priest, and went with his brother, Dirk Philipps, over to the Anabaptists in 1533. He displayed great zeal for the establishment of a strict church-discipline, and ordained Dirk, David Joris, and Menno Simons preachers. The Ubbonites differed from the rest of the Anabaptists by denying that the kingdom of Christ was an earthly kingdom in which the pious were to exterminate the wicked. They rejected divorce. Ubbo died in 1568, but left the Anabaptists several years before his death, on account of their excesses, and went over to the Reformed Church. See JEHRING: Hist. von denen Begebenheiten, Streitigkeiten u. Trennungen, so unter d. Taufgesinnten oder Mennonisten von ihrem Ursprung an bis auf's Jahr 1615 vorgegangen, Jena, 1720 (containing a list of the tracts of Dirk and Ubbo Philipps); H. C. BERGMANN: De Ub. Philippi et Ubbonitis, Rost., 1733. NEUDECKER.

UBERTINUS, surnamed de Casali, from the place of his birth; d. about 1330; was one of the principal leaders of the strict party among the Franciscans, which insisted upon the rigid rule of poverty, and declared the church to be wholly corrupt. This party, led by Peter John Olivi (d. 1297), was condemned by Pope Alexander IV. (1255). Ubertinus laid down his views in the work Arbor vitæ crucifixi (Venice, 1185), and a Defence of Olivi (in Wadding's Annales Minorum, tom. v., Rome, 1733). Called upon to answer for his opinions by Clement V., he went, with the permission of John XXII., over to the Benedictines, and at a later period changed to the Carthusians. He also wrote Tractatus de septem statibus ecclesiæ (a sort of commentary on the Apocalypse), Venice, 1516. NEUDECKER.

UBIQUITY is the designation of the doctrine stated by Luther, and held in the Lutheran Church, of the omnipresence of the humanity, and more especially of the body, of Christ. It was deduced from the doctrine of the hypostatic union of the two natures in Christ, and was designed to explain the real presence of the body in the Lord's Supper, upon which Luther insisted. The biblical passages for testing the doctrine are those which record the institution of the Lord's Supper, and refer to Christ's ascension, his session at the right hand of God (Eph. i. 20-23; Col. iii. 13; 1 Pet. iii. 22, etc.), and his presence with the church (Matt. xxviii. 20).

Origen and Gregory of Nyssa (Antirrheticus adv. Apollinarem, c. 59) were the only ones of the Fathers who represent the glorified body of Christ as ubiquitous. Augustine expressly denies that the hypostatic union of the two natures had for its result that the human nature is everywhere, as God is everywhere (non est consequens, ut quod in Deo sit, ita sit ubique, ut Deus). The God-man is with his church everywhere in his majesty and grace, etc., but not in his flesh, which the Logos assumed. He is everywhere by reason of being

God; but he is in heaven by reason of his human nature (ubique per id, quod Deus est, in cælo autem per id, quod homo). Thus he also said, in explanation of the word to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43), "Christ as man on that day, according to his flesh, would be in the grave; but as God, that same Christ is always everywhere" (homo Christus illo die secundum carnem in sepulchro . . . Deus vero ipse idem Christus ubique semper est, Ep. 187). With Augustine, "the right hand of God," at which Christ sits, is a restricted locality. John of Damascus denied the local explanation of the expression, "right hand of God," but held that Christ's glorified body is localized, and distinguished from his earthly body by its immunity from pain and want (De Ortho. Fide, iv. 1, 3).

In the middle ages the Augustinian view prevailed. Hugo of St. Victor, in his work on the sacraments (ii. 1, 13), says, "Christ as to his humanity is in heaven, as to his divinity everywhere" (Christus secundum humanitatem in cælo est, secundum divinitatem ubique). Peter Lombard (iii. 22), in the same tone, says that Christ as to his person is everywhere (totus ubique), but not as to his nature (sed non totum).<sup>1</sup> The doctrine of the middle ages may be indicated by the three propositions: (1) Christ's divinity is ubiquitous; (2) His glorified body is confined to a certain celestial locality; (3) This same body is present by the miracle of transubstantiation wherever the Eucharist is celebrated.

It remained for Luther to formulate the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's glorified body. He deduced it from the doctrine of the real presence in the Lord's Supper, and used it to explain the real presence. Although as early as 1520 he called the doctrine of transubstantiation the second prison in which the Roman Church had confined the consciences of men, he spoke of the Picards of Bohemia as "heretics, because they do not believe that Christ's flesh and blood are truly present in the sacrament." His doctrine of the real presence was expressed in the words, the body and blood of Christ are "in, with, and under" the bread and the wine. He says, "The glorified body is in all the parts of the substance of bread," and illustrates it by the relation of fire and iron, "two distinct substances, and yet mingled in one glowing mass of iron, so that every part is iron and fire." There is an interpenetration of the body and bread, but no mixture. The clearest statement of Luther's views on this subject is found in his work on the Lord's Supper (1528), in the chapter headed De prædicatione identica. As in Christ, divinity and humanity were united in one person, and interpenetrated each other without any change, so, in the Lord's Supper, bread and body were united in a sacramental way, and interpenetrated each other without any change. In order to explain this process, Luther affirmed the ubiquity of the humanity and body of Christ. "Not only as to his divinity, but also to his humanity, he is everywhere present," he expressly says. "Heaven and earth are a bag, and as grain fills the bag, so he fills heaven and earth; and as my voice reaches so many ears, how much more can Christ distribute himself totally and indivisibly in so many pieces!" "The right hand of God" is not a definite spot, but it is everywhere where God is. The three reasons he gives for the real presence are, that God is essentially and truly God and man in one person, that God's right hand is everywhere, and that God's word is not false.

Zwingli, Calvin, and Ecolampadius distinctly rejected the doctrine of ubiquity in rejecting Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Melancthon in his earlier period taught the doctrine of ubiquity, in 1530 edited a number of patristic testimonies to confirm the real presence, and expressly antagonized Zwingli's view that Christ's body can only be in one place. At a later period he renounced these views, and distinctly stated (Responsio de controversia Stancari) that "Christ is everywhere, but only according to his divine nature." In 1552 Joachim Westphal renewed the sacramental controversy, which seemed to have been ended, by denouncing Calvin as a Zwinglian; and at the synod of Stuttgart, Dec. 19, 1559, the Württemberg church re-affirmed Luther's doctrine of ubiquity, which was thus made for a protracted period the centre of all investigations in christology. Brenz, the most prominent theologian in Germany after Melancthon's death, was the author of this document, and developed his views in the following works: De personali unione duarum naturarum in Christo, 1561; De libello H. Bullingeri, 1561; De majestate Dom. nos. Jesu Christi et de vera presentia, 1562. He insisted upon the union of the two natures in one person and the communication to the humanity of the majesty of the divinity; so that Christ in the totality of his nature fills heaven and earth. "For if the Deity of Christ were anywhere without his humanity, there would be two persons, not one."

The Wittenberg school, which followed Melancthon, could not, of course, accept this statement of the Württembergers. Between the two parties, Martin Chemnitz took up his position as a mediator. He held that Christ is present with his whole person (divinity and humanity) in the Lord's Supper: and yet the glorified body is not omnipresent, but multipresent or colipresent; that is, its presence was subject to the will of Christ, and not confined absolutely to one locality. Beza (Refutatio dogmatis de potestate carnis Christi omnipotentia, etc.), Dancus (Exam. libri de duabus in Chr. naturis a M. Chemnitz conscripti, Geneva, 1581), Ursinus, and others opposed these views. Hutter and Hunnius returned to the stricter view of Luther, which again prevailed. In the last century the doctrine was not much discussed. In the present century Philippi has sought to revive and prove it in its strict form as held by Luther.

Among English and American theologians, the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body has never been a prominent subject, or even seriously discussed. Quite recently Professor Roswell D. Hitchcock has advocated the "potential ubiquity" of the God-man. "In this sense is he ubiquitous, that he may anywhere, at any moment, reveal himself in his God-manhood to the willing soul. Such ubiquity best explains the vision of the martyred Stephen, the vision of Paul near Damascus," etc.

ULLMANN, Karl, one of the first evangelical theologians of this century in Germany; the son of a clergyman; was b. at Epfenbach, near Heidelberg, March 15, 1796; d. at Carlsruhe, Jan. 12, 1865. In 1812 he entered the university of Heidelberg, where Paulus, Daub, and Schwarz were teaching their different systems of theology, and in 1813 passed to Tübingen at Daub's advice. Here he got admission to the circle of Uhländ's friends, and formed an intimate friendship with the poet Gustav Schwab, which was only terminated by death. In 1817 he was ordained vicar of Kirchheim, near Heidelberg, but a year later, at the suggestion of his friends, began to prepare himself for a professional career; took up his studies again at Heidelberg, and went to Berlin, where, under the influence especially of Neander, he adopted that evangelical type of theology of which he became one of the most genial and distinguished representatives. In 1819 Ullmann began to lecture at Heidelberg, and in 1821 was elected professor. In 1825 he published a work on Gregory Nazianzen, which deserves a place at the side of Neander's monographs. In 1828 he founded, in connection with Umbreit, the Theologische Studien u. Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"). It became the chief organ of the evangelical school of theology, represented by Neander, etc. The opening article, on the sinlessness of Jesus (Ueber die Unsündlichkeit Jesu), was subsequently published in an enlarged form under the title Die Sündlosigkeit Jesu ["The Sinlessness of Jesus," Eng. trans. from the 7th ed., Edinburgh, 1870], went through seven editions [7th ed., 1863], and was one of the most valuable and influential writings of the modern evangelical school in Germany. In 1829 Ullmann followed a call to Halle, where he lectured on church history, symbolics, and systematic theology. In 1833 an article appeared from his pen on John Wessel, which he afterwards incorporated in his principal historical work, Die Reformatoren vor d. Reformation, [2d ed., 1866, 2 vols., Eng. trans., "The Reformers before the Reformation," Edinburgh, 1841-42, 2 vols.]. It is characterized by thoroughness of treatment, and grace and fervor of style. In 1836 he returned to Heidelberg. He wrote a number of articles against Strauss's Life of Christ (1835) and the principles it involved, one of which, directed against Strauss's suggestion of a change in the nature of public worship, was published, with a dedication to Gustav Schwab, under the title Ueber den Cultus d. Genius, 1840. Another work, Das Wesen d. Christenthums ("The Nature of Christianity," 1845, 5th ed., 1865), was also called forth by the same general controversy.

Ullmann, like Nitzsch, had always been interested in the practical government of the church, and, when the controversy about the union of the confessions began, wrote at length and repeatedly in the Studien upon subjects it suggested. Some of these articles were printed separately, as Ueber d. Verhältniss von Staat u. Kirche. In 1853 he was appointed prelat [an officer with functions somewhat similar to those of a bishop], and, unfortunately for himself, accepted the position. He threw himself with earnestness into the management of the ecclesiastical duties of the position, and in 1856 was appointed director of the supreme ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrath). In this position he found himself constantly at variance with the ministers of the cabinet; and his efforts to introduce a new liturgy, etc., aroused serious opposition, and called forth the criticism that he was seeking to introduce re-actionary, hierarchical, and high-church movements. Unwilling to be the mere subordinate of the ministry, and to face longer the opposition in the ranks of the clergy, he resigned his office in 1861. He was thenceforth without any public office, and devoted his energies to the editing of the Studien. During the last years of his life he suffered from a complication of physical infirmities.

Ullmann was not one of the creative minds and prophetic men who cut new paths for the church and theology; but he was one of the noblest characters, and had one of the most highly gifted minds, which the German Church can boast of in our century. He was, in the best sense of the word, a Christian humanist, whose writings and example are still exercising a blessed influence. He died after hearing repeated, at his own request, the last two verses of Paul Gerhard's hymn, O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden. See W. BEYSCHLAG: D. Karl Ullmann, Gotha, 1866; [SCHAFF: Germany and its Universities, pp. 315 sqq.].

WILLIBALD BEYSCHLAG.

ULPHILAS, the Apostle of the Goths (313-383). According to the Arian church historian, Philostorgius (Hist. Eccl., 2, 5), whose statement is corroborated by other Greek church historians, he belonged to a Cappadocian family which was carried away from its homestead as prisoners of war by the Goths, but which soon found itself so well installed among the captors, and so closely allied to them, that the son received a Gothic name, Wulfila ("Little Wolf"). He was educated in Christianity and in Greek learning, and on account of his great natural gifts he was destined for the church. The Goths, at that time settled on the northern bank of the Danube, just outside the pale of the Roman Empire, were rank heathens; but they were converted by Ulphilas. His missionary labor among them must have begun very early; for in 343 he was ordained their bishop, probably by an Arian bishop, since he himself afterwards declared that Arianism had always been his faith. How successful his work was may be inferred from the fact that the Gothic chief Athanaric became frightened, and instituted a violent persecution in 350. But Ulphilas obtained permission from the Emperor Constantius to immigrate with his flock of converts to the Roman Empire, and to settle in Moesia near Nicopolis, at the foot of Mount Hæmus. Meanwhile the mission among the Goths north of the Danube did not stop its work; and in 370 a new persecution brought a new flock of Gothic converts into the Roman Empire, under the protection of the Emperor Valens. Shortly after, a Gothic chief, Frithigern, embraced Christianity, his whole tribe following his example; and finally Athanaric himself was won for the new faith, which simply meant that the conversion of the whole Gothic nation was completed. They were Arians; and on Jan. 17, 383, a council was opened in Constantinople for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the Arian Goths and the Orthodox Greek Church. It is probable that Ulphilas was present at that council. Its purpose, however, was not accomplished. See the art. GOths.

In his missionary work, Ulphilas had use, not only for his natural gifts, but also for the accomplishments of his education. One of his most effective means of success was, no doubt, his translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue of the Goths, for which he had to invent a new alphabet, a combination of Greek and Runic letters: it is the oldest existing monument of any Teutonic language. Whether he translated the whole Bible, or only portions, is doubtful: only fragments have come down to us. Seven codices have been discovered, — Codex Argenteus, written on purple vellum in gold and silver letters, dating from the sixth century, discovered in 1597 in the Benedictine abbey of Werden, now preserved in the library of Upsala, and published with diplomatic accuracy by Upström (1854); Codex Carolinus, discovered in the library of Wolfenbüttel in 1756, and published in 1762-63; finally, palimpsest fragments of five codices discovered in the Ambrosian library at Milan by Angelo Mai, and published 1819-38. The best collected editions of these fragments are those by Von der Gabelentz and Loebe, Leip., 1836-46, with Latin version, grammar, and lexicon; E. Bernhardt, Halle, 1875, with full critical notes; and Stamm, Paderborn, 1878 (7th ed. by M. Heyne), the most convenient manual edition. ULRICH, Bishop of Augsburg, the son of Hupald, Count of Dillingen, was b. at Augsburg in 890; d. there July 4, 973. Made bishop in 923, he administered his diocese with conspicuous vigor and ability, and proved himself one of the greatest ecclesiastics of his day. Twice during his episcopate the Magyars laid siege to Augsburg. The first time (923) he mingled his prayers with the cries of the babes who were laid prostrate on the earth before the altar; the second time (955) he displayed great courage and firmness, and held out against great odds, till relieved by the army of the king. Ulrich practised a princely liberality, and laid Augsburg under obligation to him by the construction of chapels, churches, and houses. He was zealous in the observance of the hours of worship, and on many days celebrated three masses. He was strict towards the clergy, and at a synod in Augsburg (152) he insisted upon the practice of celibacy. In his regard for relics he made a journey to St. Moritz to secure some trophies of the Thebaic legion, and to Rome to get the head of St. Abundus. The latter years of his life he spent in a convent, as a Benedictine, and died on a floor sprinkled with ashes. His relics were regarded as possessing a miraculous virtue; and John XV., in 993, pronounced him a saint,—the first example of a special Papal decree demanding reverence for a saint. A work entitled Catalogus testium veritatis, first printed by Flacius in 1550, and protesting against the celibacy of the clergy, is wrongly attributed to Ulrich. ULTRAMONTANE, or ULTRAMONTANISTS (from the Latin, ultra montes, "beyond the mountains," referring to the Alps), is a party-name within the Roman-Catholic Church, applied to those who wish to see all power in the church concentrated in the Pope, in opposition to those who desire a more independent development of the national churches.

UMBREIT, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, distinguished as the co-editor (from 1828) of the Theolog. Studien und Kritiken ("Theological Studies and Discussions"), and an expositor of the Old Testament; was b. at Sonneborn, near Gotha, April 11, 1795; d. at Heidelberg, April 26, 1860. He studied at Göttingen, where Eichhorn inspired him with enthusiasm for Oriental studies, and became privatdocent there in 1818. He accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in 1820. Here he spent a quiet and happy life in the midst of an affectionate family and a large circle of friends. Rothe, in his funeral-address, speaks of "the childlikeness and broadness of his personal Christianity." He devoted himself almost exclusively to the study of the Old Testament, the beauty of whose poetry, and the divinity of whose contents, he profoundly recognized. It was his effort to find out the meaning of the Scriptures, and to secure for the Old Testament its proper place in Christian theology. Without being an Orientalist in the present sense of the term, he had an accurate knowledge of Hebrew, and a fine sense of appreciation for the characteristic traits of Oriental life; and without laying claim to being a keen critic, or a stern dogmatist, he entered into sympathy with the feelings of the men of God in the Old Testament. His first commentary was on Ecclesiastes (Gotha, 1818): it was followed by commentaries on the Song of Solomon (Lied d. Liebe, d. älteste u. schönste aus d. Morgenlande. Neu übersetzt u. ästhetisch erklärt, Göttingen, 1820, 2d ed., Heidelberg, 1828), Job (Heidelberg, 1824, 2d ed., 1832), the Proverbs (Philolog.-krit. u. philosoph. Comment. über d. Sprüche Salomos, nebst einer neuen Uebersetzung u. einer Einleitung in d. morgenländische Weisheit überhaupt u. in d. hebräisch-salomonische insbesondere, Heidelberg, 1826), the prophetic books, except Jonah and

Daniel (Hamb., 1841-46, 4 vols., Isaiah appearing in a second edition in 1846), Romans (Gotha, 1856). Umbreit's commentaries are practical, and display a profound sympathy with the life of the Old Testament. Whatever may be the opinion about their literary merits, there can be no doubt that he opened the eyes and hearts of many to the beauties and religion of the Old Testament, and that his whole personality, adorned as it was "with a rare combination of divine gifts and virtues," was one of the most beneficent influences in the history of the Vermittlungstheologie; [i.e., the conciliatory, unionistic school of modern German theology]. UNCIAL (from uncia, the "twelfth part" of any thing) and CURSIVE (i.e., in running, sc., hand) MANUSCRIPTS. The former are written in capital letters (litteræ unciales, or majusculæ), usually, but not necessarily, of large size; the latter, in small letters (litteræ minusculæ), or in current hand. The uncial manuscripts are older. New-Testament manuscripts of this character vary in age from the fourth (Sinaitic and Vatican) to the tenth century. The Sinaitic is the only complete manuscript of the New Testament. The uncials are written upon costly and durable vellum or parchment, on quarto or small folio pages of one, two, even, though very rarely, of three or four columns. The older ones have no division of words or sentences, except for paragraphs, no accents or ornamented letters, and but very few pause-marks. These manuscripts are designated by Roman capitals, Greek letters after Cod. Z, and the Hebrew Aleph for the Cod. Sinaiticus. The number of uncial New-Testament manuscripts was probably once large; but they perished during the middle age, and now only eighty-three distinct manuscripts (not including lectionaries) are extant. The cursive manuscripts are indicated by Arabic numerals, number over a thousand, date from the ninth to the middle of the fifteenth century, are upon vellum, parchment, cotton paper (which came into use in the ninth or tenth century), or on linen paper (first introduced in the twelfth century). Their comparatively late date decreases their critical value; but "some twenty or thirty of them are very important for their agreement with the oldest authorities, or for some other peculiarity." See for lists of uncials and important cursives, and further information, SCRIVENER: A Plain Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament, Cambridge, 1861, 3d ed., 1883; SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament, New York, 1883, chap. ii. pp. 82-141; also art. UNIFORMITY, Acts of, denote several parliamentary decrees establishing the worship and ritual of the Church of England. The first, passed in 1549, set forth the penalties for the neglect to use the First Service-Book, which were, for the first offence, loss of the profits of one benefice for a year, and imprisonment for six months; for the second, loss of all benefices, and imprisonment for one year; for the third, imprisonment for life. The second Act was passed April 6, 1552, and established the revised Book of Common Prayer. The third and principal Act of Uniformity (after a strong opposition, passed April 28, 1558), established the new Prayer-Book under penalties similar to those of Edward VI., subjected all who were absent from church without excuse to a fine of one shilling, and gave to the sovereign liberty to "ordain and publish such further ceremonies and rites as may be most for the advancement of the church," etc. A fourth Act of Uniformity was passed May 19, 1662, and enforced the new revision of the Prayer-Book. It required all ministers to give their unfeigned assent and consent to every thing in the book before Aug. 21, and to swear "that it is not lawful, on any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king." About two thousand clergymen, some of them the most distinguished in England, unable to conform, were deprived of their livings. Neal, referring to the Elizabethan Act, says, "Upon this fatal rock of uniformity in things merely indifferent, in the opinion of the imposers, was the peace of the Church of England split" (History of Puritanism, i. p. 76, Harper's ed.). The Act of Uniformity was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary, May 21, 1689.

UNIGENITUS is the name of that famous bull which Clement XI. issued (Sept. 8, 1713), at the instance of the Jesuits, in condemnation of the annotated French translation of the New Testament by the Jansenist, Quesnel. Among the propositions condemned by the Pope are also these: "All ought to read the Bible" (80); "The obscurity of the word of God does not exempt a layman from studying it" (81); "The Lord's Day ought to be kept holy by Christians by reading the Scriptures, and it is wicked to keep away any one from such reading" (82). Forty French bishops accepted the bull; but sixteen, supported by the Sorbonne, suspended it in their dioceses; after which, persecutions immediately began. See JANSENISM.

UNION OF CHURCHES. The first difference which entered Christendom, and threatened to split the Christian congregation, was that between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. It was hardly a difference either of doctrine or constitution, but simply one of social habits: nevertheless, it was important, even dangerous; and widely various views were held with respect to the solution of the problem it presented. Some thought that the Gentile Christians were not Christians in the full sense of the word, that they could never be considered as brethren, that baptism ought to be denied them, etc.; others, among whom was Paul, thought that it was not necessary to circumcise a Gentile in order to make him a Christian, that the Gentile Christians should not be bound by the Jewish law, etc. From the very first, however, there seems to have been a third party, a middle party; and at the synod of Jerusalem (Acts xv.) a reconciliation was easily brought about. Each party yielded something, — the Jewish Christians, the obligation of the law; the Gentile Christians, the unlimited freedom of social habits; and thus the Christian congregation became able to present itself before the infidels as one social body, based on one common faith.

Much deeper, and consequently much more difficult to manage, was the difference which separated the Greek and Latin churches: it was one not of social habits, but of nationality. In spite of her social and political superiority, the Latin Church lived for a long time in complete doctrinal submission to the Greek Church. But when, with one gigantic effort, Augustine developed the theology of the Latin Church, the internal difference between the two churches at once became manifest. The principal events which gave it practical shape were the Henotikon of Zeno (484), the decrees of the Concilium quinisextum (692), and the controversy in the ninth century between Nicholas I. and Photius. But it must not be overlooked, that, besides the national difference between East and West, the monarchical tendency of the Church of Rome — developed by Victor I., Stephen I., Leo the Great, Gregory the Great, and gradually established as the informing principle of her whole policy — exercised a powerful influence; and when the Council of Constantinople (867), instead of recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, excommunicated him, the separation was accomplished. From the fact, however, that the various attempts at union which were afterwards made were wrecked, not on the vanity and fickleness of the governing classes, but on the instinctive dislike and distrust of the mass of the peoples, it is evident that the split was not caused simply by a clash between sacerdotal ambitions, but had its roots deep in the nature of the people. A compact of union was subscribed by the Greek and Latin delegates at the Council of Lyons (1274), and accepted both by the emperor and the Pope; but it could not be carried out on account of the fanaticism of the Greek people. A similar compact, compromising the principal doctrinal divergences, and recognizing the supremacy of the Pope, was subscribed at the Council of Florence (1439), but proved to be of as little practical consequence.

A still more decisive difference was established by the Reformation between the Roman-Catholic Church and the Evangelical churches. It was not one of social habits or nationality, but one of principle. By the Protestant principle, the unity of form was given up for the truth of the contents, and evangelical freedom was substituted for the despotism of tradition. It must not be understood, however, that, in the historical process from which the separation resulted, all the advantages were on the one side. The Protestant principle was not an invention of the Reformers. It has been present and at work in the Church from the day of her foundation, latent, unrecognized, suppressed, but never destroyed. On the other hand, the Roman-Catholic Church did not die by the separation, but continued to be the harbinger of much true religious life. These views were openly set forth by Hugo Grotius, in his On the Truth of the Christian Religion and other treatises; and in his annotated edition of Cassander's Consultation (1641) he even went so far as to recommend, under certain conditions, the Papal primacy. They may also be found, at least implicite, at the basis of the theological system of Calixtus (see that article and SYNCRETISM); and they actually prompted Leibnitz to undertake his attempts at uniting the Church of Rome and the Evangelical Church. If any man was fit for such an undertaking, he was. His philosophy gave him a position, religious as well as political, above the particular interests of the parties. He was intimately acquainted with many prominent and influential members of the Roman-Catholic Church, and he had the sympathy of the Protestant theologians of the school of Helmstadt; consequently, when he failed, as he did, it simply proves that the undertaking was as yet impossible. The details of the negotiations which ensued are given in the arts. LEIBNITZ, MOLANUS, and SPINOLA. The instrument of union which resulted from those negotiations, Regule circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticam unionem, was drawn up in 1683, but was not published until 1691, as it was made the basis for the negotiations in Hungary and France. It proposes to begin, not with a doctrinal, but with a political, union, to admit the whole Protestant clergy into the hierarchical system of the Roman-Catholic Church, and then try to work out a doctrinal reconciliation. It was favorably received by the Pope, but did not attract much interest among Roman-Catholics, and was considered with distrust and aversion by the Lutherans. In 1694 Bossuet suddenly broke off the correspondence which he had been carrying on with Leibnitz since 1691; and an attempt by the latter at renewing it, in 1701, called forth from the former only a peremptory dismissal of the case. See HERING: Geschichte der kirchl. Unionsversuche seit der Reformation, Leipzig, 1836-38, 2 vols. FR. NITZSCH.

More successful were the efforts for a union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches: they led, at least in Prussia and Baden, to some practical results. Great exertions were made to prevent the split between the two Protestant churches in Germany, and Luther's refusal to join hands with Zwingli at Marburg (1529) has always been regretted. The Thirty-Years' War, however, called forth considerations so grave as to mitigate even the most irate temper. The colloquy of Leipzig (1631) had a good effect, though it could not prevent the strife from breaking out anew. The colloquy of Thorn (1645) failed; but the colloquy of Cassel (1661) led to the establishment, at least of a good and peaceful modus vivendi between the two churches. As the electoral house of Brandenburg belonged to the Reformed faith after 1611, it was quite natural that the success of the colloquy of Cassel should induce the elector, Friedrich Wilhelm, to arrange a similar colloquy at Berlin (Sept. 8, 1662-May 29, 1663). The attempt failed utterly; and the temper of the Lutheran members may be inferred from the fact, that they refused to give up the so-called elenchum nominalem, that is, the mentioning by name and from the pulpit of such Reformed preachers as seemed to them to be dangerous heretics. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) brought a great number of French Reformed colonists to settle in Brandenburg; and under Friedrich I., king of Prussia (1700-13), the court-preacher Jablonski (which article see) was active in behalf of the union. A number of the so-called Sinultankirchen were built; that is, churches in which service was celebrated alternately after the Lutheran and Reformed rite. The period of religious indifference which followed during the reign of Friedrich II., and the spreading of rationalism, was, perhaps, not without some good consequences for the cause of the union. At all events, when, in the beginning of the present century, the Prussian Government proposed various measures for the speedy establishment of a United Evangelical Church in Prussia, they met with no considerable opposition. The clergy of Berlin declared in favor of the union at the synod of Oct. 29, 1817; and the new Agenda (which article see) was generally accepted in 1822. After 1830, however, disturbances of a half-religious and half-political character took place, and the embarrassments of the government were considerably aggravated in 1848; but the union was maintained in all the countries where it was introduced. [The relation of Church and State in Prussia was fixed by the laws of 1873 and 1876. See art. PRUSSIA.]

UNION EVANGELICAL CHURCH. See above.

UNITARIANISM. The origin of this system of theology was in the rejection of the Trinity, or the doctrine of three persons — the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit — existing in the Godhead, and constituting one God. As monotheism was the antipode of polytheism, Unitarianism is the antipode of Trinitarianism. But associated with this fundamental doctrine are the denials, in general, of the fall of man in Adam as the federal head of the race, the total depravity of human nature, the vicarious atonement of Christ, and eternal punishment; and the affirmations of the mission of Christ to make a revelation of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man; of the dignity of human nature, but its elementary and incomplete condition; of man's natural sonship to God; of sin, not as natural, but unnatural, to man; of the two great spiritual laws, love to God and love to man; and of the destiny of all mankind to holiness and happiness by the grace of God, and man's moral discipline here and hereafter. The Unitarians regard the atonement as a moral agency designed to draw men to God, and reconcile, or make them at one, with God, as the term signifies, rather than as a legal or governmental expedient, or as a vicarious substitute in a literal sense to cancel human sins. Jesus, speaking of his cross, said, "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Christ is variously regarded as a being between God and man; or as a man superhumanly endowed, impeccable, and infallible; or as a mere man on the natural plane, but a natural religious genius of great power. The second view is the more common one among modern Unitarians. The Holy Spirit is identified with God himself, as the spirit of man constitutes man. The Holy Spirit indicates the holy influence which the mind of God exerts upon the mind of man. The prevailing views in regard to a future life are that of the inborn immortality of the soul, that of perpetual progress, and that of the hopeful, rather than the assertive, belief of the eventual restoration of all men to holiness and happiness,—conditions which Unitarians believe to be inseparably connected.

The methods of attaining these results, and the working principles of this body of believers, are, (1) The Protestant canon of the right of private judgment; (2) Reason, or the moral and religious nature of man, as the final arbiter where creeds clash, or the doctors disagree; (3) The interpretation of the Scriptures after the spirit rather than the letter. This method of interpreting the Bible as an Oriental book, poetical, parabolical, and often paradoxical, has justified many of the Unitarian as well as Protestant conclusions in general, in regard to theological doctrines. Thus the expression, "I and my Father are one," is taken not literally, as teaching identity of nature, and personality with the Father, but that union of will, love, and purpose with the Father, which is also predicated in the oneness of Christ and his apostles. "Labor not for the meat that perisheth," etc., is a Hebraism to exhort to seek spiritual ends in life more earnestly than material interests. "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," is not a lesson of the actual presence, but of the necessity of nourishing the soul with the teaching of Jesus, and blending it with the whole spiritual constitution as thoroughly as food is digested, and assimilated to the body. The delivery of the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and his authorization to bind and loose, are explained and qualified elsewhere by the same distinction being granted to the whole body of the apostles. The declaration that a man must hate his father and his mother in order to be an accepted disciple of Christ, is well understood by the Hebrew scholar to signify, not the literal hatred of parents, a sense the farthest possible from the spirit of Jesus, but the preference of spiritual ties to natural ones when they come into competition. This method is not, as often charged, regarded by this body of Christians as explaining away the true sense of the Word, but, on the contrary, as giving its true and intended meaning. In this connection it should be stated, that one distinguishing characteristic of the Unitarian Church is its hostility to creeds, or dogmatic statements of belief. They are regarded as prisons to the mind, as opposing the progress of truth, endangering the conscience by insincere or partial assent or subscription, embroiling churches in strife and persecution, and turning off attention from the fundamental truths and plain duties of religion to intellectual and metaphysical definitions of subtleties beyond the reach of man. Hence the form of church union generally adopted by them has been that of a covenant rather than a creed. The body has no one central symbol, or statement of belief. Its creed is to be found in its literature. The bond of church union is made to consist in a pledge to live the Christian life, and to co-operate with others in the same calling, in worship, in philanthropy, in supporting religious institutions, and spreading the kingdom of God on earth. Faith, as a sentiment of the heart, is the uniting tie, rather than the declaration of a series of intellectual and dogmatic propositions. This was the original Puritan method. In this light it is remarkable that the identical covenants used by some of the primitive churches in New England in the first settlement of the country have been still in active use down to the present day, though those churches are now Unitarian.

The history of Unitarianism is claimed to date back to the time of Christ and his apostles as preachers of pure monotheism. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," is declared by the Master to be the first and great commandment. Early church Fathers and writers, under varying forms of language, held the essential unity of God. The term "trinity" as applied to the Godhead is not found in the Scriptures, nor was it employed by any writer till Tertullian, about A.D. 200. It is argued that the thing did not exist, because the name descriptive of the thing did not come into use till that time. Unitarians, accordingly, regard the whole system of theology known as Trinitarian, or Orthodox, as a gradual development from the time the Gentiles, imbued with Oriental speculation or Greek philosophy, entered the Christian Church. The school of Alexandria hellenized Christian thought, and the Platonic doctrine of the Logos led to the gradual deification of Christ. But alongside of this tendency, step by step, proceeded a counter-movement—led by Theodotus, Artemon, Paul of Samosata, Arius, and others of the early writers—to maintain the strict unity of God in Christian belief. In the battle of words between homo- and homoiousian, of the same substance or of like substance, as applied to the nature of Christ, Arius maintained that he was a created being. The climax was reached at the Council of Nicæa (A.D. 325), when, after an embittered debate, the doctrines of the unity of God and the subordinate nature of Christ were anathematized, and the Godhead of the Son with the Father was established. It is an opinion held by many Catholic and some Protestant advocates of the Trinity, that this dogma came in the development of the church, rather than as a doctrine revealed or taught in the Scriptures; also it is a remarkable fact, that no single passage or verse of the Old or New Testament is received as an assured proof-text of the Trinity by the unanimous consent of all Trinitarian writers: some ground their faith on one passage, some on another. Griesbach and Tischendorf, two of the most distinguished Trinitarian critics of the text of the New Testament, reject as spurious 1 John v. 7, and read (Acts xx. 28) "the church of the Lord," instead of "the church of God," and (1 Tim. iii. 16), "he who was manifest," instead of "God was manifest." These emendations remove some of the most decided proof-texts of the Trinity. Unitarians also claim that John i. 1 and Rom. ix. 5 are erroneously quoted and interpreted as proofs of the Trinity. The new revised translation in general favors their criticism and interpretation.

Before the Reformation, Unitarian opinions, though not under that name, were in existence in various parts of Christendom. Some suffered martyrdom for the faith. Adam Duff, for his denial of the doctrine of the Trinity, was burned alive near Dublin, Ireland, in 1326. William Taylor, a priest, was put to death in England in 1422. But, when the Reformation broke up the torpor of religious conformity in Europe, Unitarian sentiments received a new impulse, and led to new martyrdoms; for both Catholics and Protestants united to destroy the heresy. Among these confessors and martyrs were Ludwig Hetzer, Michael Servetus, and Gentilis in Switzerland; Palaeologus, Segar, Guirlanda, and hundreds of others in Italy; Flekwyk in Holland; George von Parris, Joan Bocher (called "the Maid of Kent"), Bartholomew Legate, Hammont, Lewes, Ket, Wright, Wightman, and many others in England; Thomas Aikenhead in Scotland; Catharine Vogel, at the age of eighty, in Poland; and Dolet in France. The Socini and others were banished from Italy: John Biddle died in prison in England, and Francis David in Transylvania.

In Poland the Unitarian faith was spread by refugees from less tolerant lands. In 1552 the Bible was translated, chiefly by Unitarian scholars and divines, into the Polish tongue. Faustus Socinus came hither from Italy. All ranks of society, nobles and commoners, felt the power of the faith, and awakened the bitter jealousy of Rome. In the city of Racow a catechism of the doctrines of the Unitarian Church was printed and widely circulated, and drew so much attention that it was publicly burned in London by order of Parliament. The king of Poland, Sigismund II., became a convert himself to the faith. Such was its flourishing condition for a century, till 1690, when Cardinal Casimir, a Jesuit, coming to the throne, burned the houses of its disciples and believers, and drove them to exile or death, thus by the same blow killing a church and a nation. The theological works of the Polish Brethren, in eight thick volumes folio, remain as the monument of their zeal and faith. Driven from Poland, many Unitarians took refuge in Transylvania. Faustus Socinus and Georgio Blandrata were prominent leaders. Transylvania tolerated four forms of faith,—the Roman Catholic, the Reformed Evangelical, the Lutheran, and the Unitarian. The bishop Francis David, however, under subsequent persecution, was cast into prison, where he died in 1579,—an event which received in 1879 its tercentenary celebration in the land of his martyrdom. In their most flourishing condition the Unitarians of Transylvania possessed four hundred church-buildings, eleven colleges, and three universities; but during the last two centuries the hand of imperial power and Jesuit intrigue have dispossessed them of their schools, lands, funds, colleges, and universities, and denied them their civil and religious rights. But the nineteenth century has brought some relief; and they are slowly regaining the heavy weight of tyranny being partially removed, their ancient prosperity. They have an increasing population of sixty thousand, a hundred and twenty-six churches, a university at Kolaszvár with twelve professors and three hundred students, and two smaller colleges at Thorda and St. Kereztur. Their present bishop is Joseph Ferencz. Their church government is a combination of Episcopalianism and Congregationalism. They are planting churches in Hungary, where the writings of Channing have been widely circulated.

The Unitarian faith was known in England before the Reformation; but at that period it received a new impulse and diffusion, so that in 1610 the synods of London and York issued a canon against Socinianism. In 1655 Dr. Owen writes: "The evil is at the door: there is not a city or town, scarce a village, in England, wherein this poison is not poured forth." Milton, Locke, and Newton wrote works in favor of Arian or kindred sentiments. Dr. Isaac Watts, the hymnist, has passages in his writings which are capable of a similar construction. Churches existed among the dissenting bodies of Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, from an early period, which were in substance Unitarian. But one of the first churches nominally so called was established in Essex Street, London, in 1774, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey. Dr. Joseph Priestley was the pastor of a church in Suffolk, and afterwards in Birmingham, from which place he was driven to America in 1792; his books, manuscripts, and philosophical and chemical apparatus being destroyed by a mob on account of the popular odium attached to his political and religious opinions. In 1813 the Unitarians were admitted by law to the privileges of other dissenting bodies. The Unitarian occupants of dissenters' chapels first had their claims admitted to the possession of these bequests and foundations by the Act of 1844. In England are about three hundred and fifty Unitarian churches, ten in Scotland, twenty to thirty in Ireland, in Wales thirty-four, and in the British Colonies—Canada, India, Australia—several more. Divinity schools for the education of ministers are established in Manchester, Carmarthen, and London. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was formed on May 24, 1825,—the same year, month, and day as the American Unitarian Association in Boston, though without concert. The National Unitarian Conference of Great Britain was first organized at Liverpool in the spring of 1882. The periodicals are the Modern Review, the Inquirer, the Unitarian Herald, the Christian Life, and some local papers. Among the eminent leaders, lay and clerical, may be mentioned Drs. Price, Samuel Clarke, Priestley, Belsham, Lardner, Sharpe, Bowring, Tayler, Thom, and especially James Martineau, one of the greatest living exponents of a Christian spiritual philosophy against materialism and agnosticism.

In America, while the church of the Puritans was strictly Calvinistic and Trinitarian at the outset, the keynote of progress had been struck by John Robinson in his famous farewell to the Pilgrims of "The Mayflower," that "there was more light to break out from God's word." Dr. Gay of Hingham, ordained in 1717, was probably the earliest preacher of Unitarianism. Dr. Mayhew, of the West Church, Boston, advocated liberal sentiments. In 1783 Dr. James Freeman, of King's Chapel, Boston, the grandfather of Dr. James Freeman Clarke, removed from the Book of Common Prayer all references to the Trinity, or the Deity, and worship of Christ; and his church from that time became distinctively Unitarian. In 1801 the Plymouth Church, the oldest of the Puritan faith in America, declared itself, by a large vote, Unitarian. Organized usually on the basis of covenants instead of creeds, the New-England churches, without any violent change in their articles of union, gradually adopted the new faith. Dr. Henry Ware, a Unitarian, was chosen professor of divinity at Cambridge. Zealous controversies were waged between Dr. Woods and Dr. Ware, and Dr. Channing and Dr. Worcester.

Dr. Channing, in 1819, in his Baltimore sermon at the ordination of Jared Sparks, gave the Unitarian Declaration of Independence. From that date he became the foremost leader of this faith, not only in America, but throughout the world. His works have been translated into the languages of Europe, and are known and read throughout the East and West. Bunsen, in his work entitled God in History, says of Channing, "A grand Christian saint and man of God, nay, also, a prophet of the Christian consciousness regarding the future." In April, 1880, the centenary of his birth was celebrated in America and many other countries; and an issue of a hundred thousand copies of a complete edition of his works was circulated in a cheap and popular form in England; and a Channing Memorial Church was dedicated at his birthplace, Newport, R.I. On May 24, 1825, the American Unitarian Association was formed, whose headquarters are in Boston, Mass., whose purpose is declared to be "to diffuse the knowledge, and promote the interests, of pure Christianity." Besides many home missions, Rev. C. H. Dall and associated laborers are employed in a foreign mission at Calcutta in India. On April 5, 1865, the National Unitarian Conference was organized in New-York City, for the promotion of "the cause of Christian faith and work." The Western Conference was created in 1852. Thirty-nine state, local, auxiliary, ministerial, benevolent, or Sunday-school associations and conferences express the activity of the missionary, educational, and philanthropic work of the body. There are two theological schools,—one at Cambridge, Mass., and the other at Meadville, Penn. The periodicals are the Unitarian Review, the Christian Register, Unity, the Day-spring, and several local papers. The number of Unitarian churches in America, according to the Year-Book of 1883, is three hundred and sixty. The actual Unitarian faith of the country, so far as the doctrine of the Trinity is concerned, has been computed to number at least three thousand churches, including not only the Unitarians proper, but the Universalists, the Christians (so called), the Hicksite Quakers, the Progressive Friends, and some other minor bodies.

UNITARIANS. This title is given to those who believe that God exists in one person, and who deny the Trinity, or that God exists in three persons, but one God,—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. The term appears to have been used first in Poland and in Transylvania, and derived from Unitas Fratrum (United Brethren), the name employed by the Moravians. There is also a political party in Buenos Ayres, South America, devoted to centralization in government, called Unitarians. A. A. LIVERMORE.

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST, a denomination of evangelical Christians, Arminian in doctrine, founded by Philip William Otterbein in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Mr. Otterbein, a man of thorough learning and liberal culture, came to America, in the year 1752, as a missionary of the German Reformed Church. His first charge was at Lancaster, Penn.; afterward he served congregations at Tulpehocken in the same State, Frederick, Md., York, Penn., and Baltimore City,—the last from 1774 to the time of his death, in 1813. At Lancaster he experienced what he regarded as his first real change of heart, and his ministry thenceforward assumed a deeply spiritual character. Impelled by a fervent desire to save men, he began early to hold frequent evangelistic services, a practice which he continued until late in life. He instituted, also, special prayer and experience meetings, and encouraged believers to give expression to their faith and spiritual experience. In pursuing his evangelistic labors, he made numerous visits to surrounding places, near and remote, often conducted largely attended open-air meetings, and invited to a hearty co-operation all spiritually minded persons of whatever name or church. He found congenial association with such men as Asbury of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, Boehm of the Mennonite Church, and others of other names. His broader labors resulted in the organization of numerous societies of converts, who, because of their warmer and more earnest spiritual life, frequently found it difficult to remain in harmonious connection with their parent churches. To supply these people with the ministrations of the word, he appointed or approved for them teachers, who visited them at irregular intervals, expounded to them the gospel, and encouraged them to continue faithful in their religious life. As the work extended, it became necessary to devise a regular system of supply; and conferences of ministers, chiefly for this purpose, began to be held. Finally, in the year 1800, at one of these conferences, these scattered societies were organized into one body; and the name "United Brethren in Christ" was adopted as the official title of the denomination thus formed. Mr. Otterbein and Mr. Boehm were chosen bishops. The people thus organized spoke at that time almost exclusively the German language: at the present time that language is used by less than four per cent of the congregations.

The government of the church is vested primarily in a General Conference, holding quadrennial sessions. The delegates are ministers only, but are chosen by the church at large. There are also annual conferences, whose powers are chiefly executive, and of which laymen may be members; each pastoral charge being entitled to one lay-representative. The bishops are elected by the General Conference quadrennially, as are also the editors, publishing-house manager and the several general boards with their executive officers. The churches are supplied with pastors on the itinerant plan, the ministers being appointed to their charges by a stationing committee. Presiding elders, elected by their respective conferences, have general supervision over districts, or subdivisions of the annual conferences. The denomination has 10 colleges, 5 seminaries and academies, and 1 theological seminary, 99 instructors, and 1,775 students, 43 of the students being in the theological seminary. The church owns, and through the General Conference controls, a publishing-house, located at Dayton, O., whose net capital on April 1, 1883, was $192,562.89. The house publishes 9 weekly, monthly, semi-monthly, and quarterly periodicals, with an aggregate average circulation of 232,221 copies for the year ending as above. The house is free of debt, and has a surplus fund in its treasury. A thoroughly organized missionary society for home, frontier, and foreign work, has been in existence since 1853. Its foreign missions are in West Africa and Germany. The moneys raised and expended by this society in the period of its existence amount to about $2,000,000. A woman's missionary society, organized in 1877, also has missions in Africa and Germany. The operations of both these societies, especially in West Africa, have resulted in most marked success. A general Sunday-school board was organized by the General Conference in 1865, and a church-erection society and a general educational board in 1869.

The general statistics of the church for 1882 show a membership of 159,512; itinerant ministers, 1,257; local ministers, 963; scholars in Sunday schools, 165,743; teachers and officers in Sunday schools, 25,690. On questions of reform, such as temperance and slavery, the historical attitude of the church is that of strong radicalism; its position on the latter question preventing, before the war, any considerable extension in the Southern States. The church also forbids its communicants from holding membership in secret societies. The territorial range of the denomination is chiefly from Pennsylvania, Maryland, Northern Virginia, and Western New York, in nearly parallel lines westward, and extending to the Pacific coast.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Religious History. I. HISTORICAL REVIEW.—In the discovery, settlement, and historical development of the country, scientific curiosity, bold enterprise, ambition, self-interest, as well as religious motives, have conspired. Columbus was a religious enthusiast, and intended his discoveries should spread the Christian religion among heathen peoples, in which plan he had the hearty co-operation of Queen Isabella of Spain. Indeed, he designed the dedication of a portion of his expected gains to the fitting-out of a crusade to the Holy Land; so that the solution of the Occidental question should lead to the solution of the Oriental question in its greatest extent, and the ends of the earth should be brought under the banner of the cross. Still more decidedly did the religious factor enter into the beginnings of the North-American settlements, but this time in the interest of English Protestantism, and not of Romanism. The great discoveries of the fifteenth century plainly stand in providential connection with the Reformation of the sixteenth; since they opened a new and boundless field for the further development of the religious, social, and political principles of Protestantism. It is important also to notice, that the northern half of the New World was first discovered, under the auspices of England, by the two Cabots. This was in 1497, or a year before Columbus set foot upon the mainland of South America. In this way that half was from the beginning brought into closest connection with the nation which a century later was to be the greatest naval power and chief bulwark of Protestantism.

The religious history of North America begins in 1607, with the settlement of Virginia, or more exactly with the landing of the Pilgrims in Massachusetts Bay (1620). From then on, America was, on an immensely larger scale, what Geneva was under Calvin.—a refuge for persecuted Protestants of all lands. Puritans, Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, Huguenots, Salzburg Lutherans, Moravians, Lutherans and Reformed refugees from the Palatinate, Mennonites, etc., emigrated thither in order to find there a quiet place to practise their religion, and showed in their new home predominantly that religious earnestness, and at the same time tolerance, which sprang, not from indifferentism, but from bitter experience of unrighteous persecution. English Roman Catholics, also, who then were subjected to severe penalties in England, found in Maryland an asylum. These were joined by the Dutch Reformed in New York, and the English Episcopalians in Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia, who, however, had not come for conscience' sake. Thus the American Colonies were made up of almost all branches of European Christianity, mostly Protestants, with a small number of Roman Catholics. Of course these churches were all weak; but they were strong enough to produce a people able to defend themselves against the demands of England, and under the leadership of George Washington,—the purest and most unselfish of American patriots,—by the aid of France, to carry on a successful war of seven years' duration, which issued in their complete independence of the British crown.

With the peace of 1783, or even with the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the colonial period of the country closed. The nation was then composed of thirteen Colonies, loosely bound together, and numbering scarcely three million inhabitants. The representatives of the free people, assembled in Philadelphia in 1787, drew up a constitution, modelled, indeed, upon that of England, but further developed upon its principles. A sharp line was drawn between Church and State. Upon this constitution they stood united as a compact nation, with a sovereign national government. At their head was a president, elected every four years. The happy issue of the War of Independence compelled those churches, as the Episcopal and the Methodist, which had formerly been united with the English bodies, to make separate organizations, on the basis of universal civil and religious liberty. Favored by the uncommon fertility of the soil, the exhaustless mineral wealth, numberless avenues of trade, and free institutions which afforded the fullest play to individual enterprise, and at the same time guaranteed complete security to person and property, the United States has ever since, but particularly during the last fifty years, advanced in a way unparalleled in history. The number of inhabitants has grown since 1800, when it was 5,000,000, until, according to the official census of 1880, it was 50,152,866, distributed as follows: Whites, 43,404,876; blacks, 6,577,151; natives, 43,475,506; foreign-born, 6,677,360; males, 25,520,582; and females, 24,632,284. The number of States in the same period has increased (mostly through the purchase of Louisiana in 1803, Florida in 1820, California and New Mexico in 1848, and the organization of the North-western Territories) from thirteen to thirty-eight; and besides these there are nine Territories and the District of Columbia (the seat of the national government).

Of course, emigration, which is favored by the most liberal naturalization laws, is the explanation of this enormous growth. This began to be larger after the close of the Napoleonic wars, and now pours a steady stream into the country. In the year 1820 the number of emigrants from Europe, especially from Ireland and Germany, was 5,993; in 1830, 23,071; in 1840, 83,584; in 1850, 279,980; in 1853, 368,643; in 1854, 460,471; in 1881, 740,000, of which sixty per cent were Germans and Scandinavians. And yet the available land is by no means all taken up. From the Alleghanies to the Pacific Ocean, there are unnumbered acres ready for the tiller's hand. Emigration keeps pace with immigration; and the dwellers in the older States are continuously removing to the newer, especially to Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, Colorado, California, and Oregon.

Hand in hand with the increase in the number of States and inhabitants go industry, wealth, and general culture. The United States has not had to struggle through two thousand years, out of barbarism to civilization, as the countries of the Old World have done. It fell heir to their progress, but with it have come the Old World's evils. And the New World has also its troubles, arising from haste after wealth, from reckless speculation, and those misunderstandings between capital and labor which issue sometimes in blood. It is almost incredible how quickly the chaotic confusion of so many different peoples thrown together under one general government is reduced to order, how thoroughly the new dwellers are assimilated in the body politic. Thus it has come about that the type of American civilization is Anglo-Saxon, and the speech English, — the predestined world-tongue.

Only two races have resisted this assimilating process, — the Indians, who are driven gradually into smaller territory, and who are slowly civilized; and the Chinese, who do not come to stay, and whose coming, national legislation has endeavored to check. The two will, in the providence of God, be brought under the influence of Christianity. As for the negroes, so long held under slavery, they are already Christianized, and have attained to a measure of civilization. Those of them who emigrate to the West-African republic of Liberia, founded for them particularly by American friends of that race, will carry thither the blessings they have obtained in the United States, and thus lighten the "dark continent."

The enormous increase of population adds, of course, proportionally to the field of labor and to the membership of the different churches. America is the land of church-erection, congregation-forming; and of every conceivable ecclesiastical and religious experiment, in which there are not missing the elements of fanaticism, hypocrisy, and humbug. It is the seed-plot of almost all branches of the Christian Church, and there is no check put upon their fullest development.

The religious life in the United States is in general like that of other lands; but it presents some peculiar features, of which the chief are, —

II. THE SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE AND THE UNIVERSAL FREEDOM OF BELIEF AND WORSHIP WHICH FOLLOWS. — A distinction must, however, be made between the General Government and the individual States. (1) The General Government has been from the beginning limited to political affairs, and has nothing to do with the internal arrangements of the several States, and especially with any thing relating to religion. The Constitution, adopted under Washington in 1787, provides, "No religious tests shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States" (Art. vi. § 3). And even more emphatically speaks the First Amendment, made by the first Congress, 1789: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the rights of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." Cf. GALE's edition of Debates and Proceedings in the Congress of the United States, vol. i. pp. 729 sqq.

In this way there was secured, on the one hand, the separation of the Church from the government, and, on the other, the free, unhindered exercise of religion in every way which does not endanger the State or public morals. The above-quoted articles are not only a declaration of independence of federal control, they are also a declaration of the independence of the Church from the civil power. They originated in no indifference respecting religion, on the contrary, in so great respect, that their framers would separate religion permanently from the defiling influence of politics, and guarantee to the whole people in a solemn manner religious along with civil liberty. The two institutions Church and State were not set opposite to each other as foes, but side by side, as the two different spheres of the social life, in the conviction that each had best restrict its jurisdiction to its own immediate concerns, because the attempt of one to rule the other was sure to issue disastrously. The power of the State is consequently, in the United States, reduced to narrower limits than in Europe, where it controls the Church also. The American status of the Church differs from the hierarchical patronage of the State by the Church, from the imperial and papal patronage of the Church by the State, and also from the pre-Constantinian separation and persecution of the Church by the heathen State; hence the United States presents a new phase in the history of the relation of the two powers.

This separation between Church and State is not to be understood as a separation of the nation from Christianity; for the State represents, in America, only the temporal interests of the people. The independent churches care for the religious and moral interests; and the people are religious and Christian as no other, and express their sentiments in different ways, — by the voluntary support of their very numerous churches and sects; by benevolent organizations of every kind; by attendance upon church, and respect for the ministry (who are second to none in dignity and influence); by a strict observance of Sunday, which is not equalled elsewhere, except in Scotland; by constant zeal for home and foreign missions; by reverence for the Bible; by a steady stream of edifying books, tracts, and periodicals; and by their public morals. Congress nominates chaplains, of different confessions naturally, and opens every sitting with prayer. The President appoints chaplains for the army and navy. Fast-days have been frequently observed in particular emergencies: thus in 1849, during the cholera; in 1865, on the assassination of President Lincoln; and in 1881, on the death of President Garfield. A thanksgiving-day is yearly celebrated in November in all the States, on the proclamation of the President and the concurrent action of the different governors. Indeed, religion, it may be justly claimed, has all the more hold upon the American character, just because it is free from political control. No one is forced to make a religious profession: that is a matter of personal conviction and voluntary action.

(2) As far as the individual States are concerned, Church and State are now separated; but this has not been the case from the beginning. Nor is the separation the consequence of independence of England. In some Colonies it existed long prior to that event: thus (at first) in Maryland, founded in 1634 by the Roman-Catholic Lord Baltimore; in Rhode Island, settled in 1636 by Baptists under Roger Williams; and in Pennsylvania, which William Penn acquired in 1680 from the English crown in payment of a debt, and which he made an asylum for his persecuted Quaker co-religionists and all other Christian brethren. Each of these three representatives of Christian toleration adopted it, not in consequence of vague philosophical theories, still less out of religious indifferentism, but because of bitter experience of intolerance, and practical necessity. And this toleration was limited to the different confessions of the Christian faith, and did not apply to infidels or blasphemers, who were excluded from civil rights. In the other and older Colonies, Church and State were from the beginning closely connected. In Massachusetts and the other New-England Colonies, except Rhode Island, the Congregational form of Puritanism was the State religion; and the civil rights, in imitation of the Jewish theocratic State principles, were dependent upon a certain religious adherence. The Roman Church not only was excluded, but also, until the close of the seventeenth century, all Protestants who could not accept the Established creed were dealt with as strictly as the Pilgrim Fathers had themselves been by the bishops of Old England. Massachusetts banished the Baptist Roger Williams and other Baptists, and the followers of the Antinomian Anne Hutchinson; the Quakers were tried, and condemned to public scourging, ear-slitting, nose-boring, and even (by a vote of twelve to eleven in the Boston Legislature) to the gallows. It should be remarked, however, that the Quakers in New England between 1658 and 1660 had acted fanatically. They had publicly denounced, in the churches and upon the streets, the civil and spiritual authorities. They thus provoked persecution and martyrdom by their impetuous zeal. Four such fanatics (one a woman), who had been already banished as Antinomians, obstinately rushed into martyrdom, and were hanged in 1660. But the people were opposed even then to such treatment; and the authorities were obliged to defend their action in a published statement, in which they justified themselves by quotations from the Old Testament, and the English laws against the Roman-Catholic Church. The Quakers, thus driven out, found a retreat in Rhode Island until the establishment of Pennsylvania. Gradually the bond between Church and State was in New England relaxed; but in Connecticut it was first broken in 1816, while in Massachusetts the last traces remained until 1833.

In Virginia and other Southern Colonies the Church of England was the State Church, and all other denominations felt the pressure of the English laws against dissenters. Nevertheless, the latter increased, especially the Baptists, Presbyterians, Quakers, and, later, the Methodists; and it was from them that the first impulse in Virginia proceeded to separate Church and State. Even before the Declaration of Independence, the Presbyterians and Baptists presented petitions to the Colonial Legislature to that intent. The measure found a defender in Thomas Jefferson, who in the interest of free-thinking, not out of any sympathy with the dissenters, or out of love for Christianity, favored putting faith and unfaith upon the same political level. Through the exertions of the dissenters, the liberal Episcopalians, and the unbelieving Jefferson, the principle of separation between Church and State was, in December, 1776, and, more completely, in 1779, 1785, and the following decade, carried through the Virginia Legislature. Cf. SEMPLE: History of the Rise and Progress of the Baptists in Virginia, Richmond, 1810, pp. 25 sqq., 62; BURKE: History of Virginia, 1804-16, p. 59; JEFFERSON: Writings, vol. i. p. 44; HAWKS: Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States, vol. i., History of Protestant-Episcopal Church in Virginia, New York, 1836, pp. 150 sqq.

Soon after the close of the War of Independence (1783), and the adoption of the National Constitution by the several States, the connection between Church and State in Maryland, New York, and South Carolina, and the other Colonies where the English Episcopal Church was the predominant State Church, was broken, and complete religious freedom proclaimed. Last of all, and only very gradually, did the New-England States, where Puritanism was deeply rooted in the mass of the people, adopt the new order of things. Now the principle of entire separation is universally operative. Only among the Mormons in Utah are Church and State combined. But the Mormons are powerless to prevent other sects coming among them; and, indeed, in Salt Lake City there are already four or five.

III. THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM OF CHURCH SUPPORT IS THE NATURAL CONSEQUENCE OF SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE. — There is in the United States no obligatory baptism or confirmation. There are, on the contrary, thousands of grown persons who have not been baptized; but there are comparatively few who hold themselves aloof from all church attendance and from all contributions for religious purposes. And the churches independent of State control are more particular as to the conduct and beliefs of their members than State churches are; so that the churches of America are more orthodox, and more faithful to their avowed principles, than the mother-churches in Europe.

The different churches are, almost without exception, dependent entirely upon voluntary subscriptions and contributions. The most prominent exceptions are Trinity Church (Episcopalian) and the Collegiate Church (Reformed Dutch), both in New-York City, which have inherited property from the colonial period. But, speaking generally, the churches look to their membership for the means to carry on their work, and support their ministers. The theological seminaries are the foundations of churches or individuals. The minister's salary is paid by the pew-rents or collections. Voluntary payments support the Bible, the tract, and other societies, and send out colporters and missionaries in city and country. It is considered a general duty and privilege to support religion as a necessary and useful element of society. The average salary of ministers in the United States is about seven hundred dollars; of theological professors, a thousand dollars. A few ministers in large cities receive from five to fifteen thousand dollars.

The voluntary system has its drawbacks, especially in the new congregations formed of emigrants who are accustomed to the European system of State support. But, on the other hand, it promotes liberality and individual enterprise; and the result is a yearly increase in churches, ministers, and ecclesiastical organizations of all sorts, while the old are maintained with vigor. On the average, it is said, each minister serves a thousand souls; but of course there is great disproportion. The Irish and the Germans are most destitute of ministers, because emigration swells their numbers out of proportion to the supply. This free, self-regulated and self-supported Christianity and church existence is one of the most characteristic features, and one of the greatest glories, of the United States, and constitutes a new leaf in church history; but it has its antecedents in the first three centuries and in the history of dissenters and free churches in Europe.

IV. THE LEADING DENOMINATIONS. — It is impossible here to go into the details of the various denominational histories: for these, reference must be made to the several articles of this en-cyclopædia. But a few general remarks will be in place.

Almost all American denominations are of European origin; but those which in Europe are divided by geographical and political boundaries are in the United States found thrown together. In England there are as many sects as in the United States; but all Christians outside the Church of England are classed together as dissenters. In America, there being no State Church, there can be no dissenters. Churches of many denominations are found in all the large cities. Thus in the city of New York, which has a population of 1,206,590, there are 500 congregations, of different nationalities and creeds, each of which has its regular place of meeting, or church-building. Until recently the Greek Church also had a chapel in New York. She has now chapels in San Francisco and in Alaska.

The American denominations may be divided into three groups. (1) The Evangelical churches; i.e., those which stand upon the principles of the Reformation theology, and accept the Bible as the sole guide of faith and life, and the confessions of the sixteenth or seventeenth centuries as a rule of public teaching. They embrace the great majority of the Christian population, and exert the strongest influence upon society. The Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and Episcopalians have the most intelligence, theological culture, and social influence with the middle and upper classes. The Methodists and Baptists are the most numerous among the middle and lower classes and in the Southern and Western States. The Episcopal Church is the oldest and proportionally the richest, and dates from 1607, the year of the settlement of Virginia; next come the Congregationalists, from the landing of the Pilgrims (1620); then the Dutch Reformed, from 1628, the year of the formation of the first congregation in New-York City. The first prominent Baptist in America was Roger Williams, the founder of Rhode Island, 1636. The Quakers date from 1680; and the Methodists, from 1766. The German churches, in their organized state, date from the middle of the last century. Among them the Lutheran Church is by far the largest and most influential; then come the German Reformed, the Evangelical United, and the Moravians. A considerable number of Germans belong to the different branches of the Methodist Church, which also sends missionaries to Germany.

(2) The Roman-Catholic Church was a century ago inconsiderable, but, through the enormous emigration, now outnumbers any other single denomination. Yet it does not keep pace with the Roman-Catholic migration, which is reported to form forty-seven per cent, or nearly one-half, of the total immigration to the United States. The emigration from Ireland is predominantly, that from Germany largely, and that from Southern Europe almost exclusively, Roman Catholic.

(3) A third class consists of those denominations which reject the doctrines of the oecumenical creeds and the confessions of the Reformation churches, and strike out in new paths. The most respectable among these are the Unitarians, whose headquarters are in Boston and Cambridge, and who are distinguished by high literary and social culture, and active philanthropy; the Universalists, who teach as one of the three articles of their creed the ultimate restoration of all men to holiness and happiness; and the Swedenborgians, who believe in the divine mission of the great seer of Sweden, and accept his revelations of the spirit-world.

V. THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION.—This differs with the different denominations, but on the whole has greatly and rapidly improved of late. It is carried on in theological seminaries, endowed and supported by free gifts. Each respectable denomination has one or more, and in all there are a hundred and forty-two. We mention those at Andover, New Brunswick, Princeton, Cambridge, New Haven, Hartford, New York (the Union Seminary of the Presbyterian Church, and the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church), Madison (N.J.), Rochester, Philadelphia (two,—one Episcopal, one Lutheran), Gettysburg, Lancaster, Allegheny, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago (which has four, representing as many denominations), and San Francisco (which has two). The faculties number from two to seven regular professors: some have as many as a hundred students and over. The libraries comprise from a few hundred to fifty thousand volumes. The course of instruction lasts three years. Greater stress is laid upon practical gifts and moral and religious character than in the ministerial training-schools of State churches. Each lecture is preceded by a short prayer, and every day is closed by divine service, which all the students attend. The theological literature of the United States is growing very fast, both by translations of foreign works (especially German), and original productions.

VI. STATISTICS.—Since the official ecclesiastical statistics of the last census (1880) have not yet (December, 1883) appeared, no attempt at a complete statement is here made; but the following carefully compiled table is interesting as showing the denominational growth in the first century of the United States' independence:—

PHILIP SCHAEFF.

UNIVERSALISM is the form of faith which they hold who declare that all souls will finally be saved, that evil is temporary, that good is permanent, and will achieve a complete and perfect triumph in the divine economy.

1. Universalism begins in a peculiar conception of God. Agreeing with Christians generally in the attributes ascribed to him, it holds that love is not merely an attribute, but the very nature, of the Deity, and that all his attributes and activities spring out of and are controlled by it. Thus the sovereignty of God is infinite and eternal: it is exerted everywhere and always, to secure, not a formal and arbitrary obedience, but one that is voluntary and filial, and it will work until the harmony of the moral universe is secured.

2. Christ belongs to the category of the supernatural; although his manifestation in time, and his work, are in perfect accord with nature and reason. Universalism holds, as to the nature of Christ, that it is identical with God's; as to his relationship, that it is that of a Son; as to his office, that it is mediatorial, i.e., that he is the connecting link between humanity and God, that he is the way by which humanity is brought into the presence and fellowship of God. His existence, as declared in the proem of John's Gospel, has been from the beginning. From the beginning also, as taught, not only in the proem aforesaid, but in the Epistles,—notably in Heb. i. 2, also 1 Cor. viii. 6,—he is the instrument through whom God works. Having the same nature as God, and being actuated by the same spirit, he is literally "God manifest in the flesh," he is literally "the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person." But not only is he the Son of God in the highest and most complete sense, he is the Son of man in a sense equally complete. He is the expression, the type, of perfected humanity. He entered fully into the human condition. He had not alone the form of manhood, but the attributes and motives. He was in all respects like one of ourselves, except in the matter of sin. His freedom from sin, however, was due, not to any abridgment of his humanity, but to the perfect use of that moral choice which is the distinguishing characteristic of humanity. He is here, then, as the revealer of God and the healer of men, as the Teacher and Saviour, or, finally, as the living, immortal Word.

3. Concerning man, Universalism holds that he is made in the image of God, that he is the child of God. He has a moral sense. He instinctively distinguishes between right and wrong, between virtue and vice. The feeling of obligation is native to his mind. He knows that he is responsible for his conduct: at the same time he is free; he may choose whatever course he will. Here is the origin and essence of sin,—that a man knowing the difference between right and wrong, knowing the responsibility under which he acts, deliberately chooses the wrong, that he puts himself voluntarily in an attitude of disobedience to the moral law. There is no other definition to be given of it than the scriptural one, "Sin is the transgression of the law." It is conditioned, first upon the fact of man's freedom, and secondly upon the fact that he is under law, the inexorable law of the moral universe. This is true of every man; and every man, whatever may be his theory of God, or providence, or of his own essential being, knows that it is true. But law without a sanction is no law. Penalty, therefore, is an indispensable instrument in that moral mechanism by which men are brought from every dereliction to the recognition and performance of duty. But penalty is not arbitrary, neither is it vindictive. It is not designed to soothe the offended majesty of Heaven. It is remedial. It reminds the offender that he is God's child, and that he has broken God's law. He is not on trial in this life, to be handed over, if the verdict shall be against him in the end, to a punishment that is remediless and hopeless; but he is under discipline, and in a disciplinary state freedom remains. No condition can ever arise, so long as man has sanity, which will permanently interrupt the spontaneous activity of the will. Penalty will be repeated with every violation of law. "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished." So long as man sins, his chastisement will endure; but no form of punishment can destroy freedom. He may choose to sin as long as he is willing to take sin and penalty together; but, whenever he is moved to a different choice, the door of opportunity is open. This is the fundamental condition of moral activity; for, if it be impossible for a soul to turn from evil to good, no matter how this impossibility arises,—whether it be by the application of an arbitrary and extraneous force, or by the self-determining power of habit,—the moral attributes of that soul are extinguished. It no longer has control of its own actions, and therefore is no longer accountable. Moreover, freedom cannot interrupt the relation which exists between the human creature and the divine Creator. Whatever he does, whatever he suffers, man is still God's child. Nothing can permanently efface from the soul the image of the Father. The moral government of God, therefore, is not a temporal affair merely, it reaches forward into eternity. It was instituted for man's sake, that he might receive his moral development under it, and that, when he had sinned, he might be reconciled to God.

4. These views foreshadow the Universalist doctrine of destiny. Universalism holds that the sovereignty of God will be completely vindicated in the ultimate harmony of the moral universe. No power on earth or in heaven can defeat the purpose of God to bring all things into subjection to himself. The process by which this result is to be secured is neither violent nor mechanical, but it springs out of those natural relations which God has established between the different parts of his economy. It involves, to be sure, the happiness of souls; but happiness is reached only through voluntary obedience. Righteousness, in reality, is the end: happiness is only an incident. That which God demands of every soul is rectitude, moral purity, spiritual submission. This is the end towards which he works, and there will be no pauses until the end is reached. Man's freedom cannot defeat the beneficent intentions of the Deity, for that would be a poor sort of freedom which practically dooms men to endless sin. Neither can the power of evil habit become so strong, that it will be impossible for men any more to make effectual choice of the right: for that would be to contradict every theory on which the recovery of souls is sought in this world; the uniform assumption being, that no case is so desperate as to be beyond the saving efficacy of infinite grace. Such a conclusion savors both of fatalism and atheism. It is fatalistic in so far as it fixes, beyond all hope of amendment, the condition of any soul. It is atheistic, in so far as it puts the final destiny of man entirely in his own keeping. Equally futile, according to Universalism, is the claim that death determines the moral condition of humanity. It is absurd to suppose that death will change either the nature of man, or the disposition and purpose of God. Death, to be sure, may be, and doubtless is, a very important factor in the discipline and development of the soul. It can scarcely fail to change inconceivably the whole environment of the soul. The conditions and circumstances which are earthly and sensual will disappear. Conditions and circumstances which are alone adapted to the new state in which the soul finds itself will come into being. New relations will undoubtedly appear, or the old relations will be revealed in an entirely new light. It may also be, that a complete set of motives, unknown to time and sense, will have active operation. The methods for teaching and moral influence may also be unspeakably enhanced. But the nature of man as a moral agent, and the nature of God as a moral governor, must remain the same after death as before; and there is no Scripture, which, rightly interpreted, warrants a different doctrine. So long as man is man, he may forsake evil, and embrace righteousness. So long as God is God, he will certainly restore the penitent, and welcome the returning prodigal. Looking at the object which has been steadily pursued in the giving of the law and the promulgation of the gospel, the Universalist feels that the poet manifests a profoundly philosophic insight when he sings, —

"I can but trust that good shall fall
At last — far off — at last, to all,
And every winter change to spring."

He sees the whole creation, in one vast, resistless movement, sweeping towards the grand finality of universal holiness and universal love.

History. — The Universalist denomination traces its origin directly to James Relly, a London preacher in the middle and latter part of the eighteenth century, who wrote a book called The Union, and who had for his disciple John Murray. The latter came to this country in September, 1770, and immediately began preaching at various places along the Atlantic seaboard, from New Jersey to Massachusetts, establishing himself at Gloucester four years later. Through the efforts of Mr. Murray, and a few who entertained similar views, churches were established at important points in the New-England and Middle States. But the doctrine spread somewhat slowly. In the year 1800, there were scarcely more than twenty Universalist ministers in the country. At that time the Rev. Hosea Ballou, who is justly called the father of Universalism in its present form, was approaching the maturity of his powers. He already entertained views which differed widely from those of Mr. Murray and his fellow-laborers. He had ceased to base his convictions of the universal holiness on Calvinistic principles. He had wrought out a system of theology which was clear, consistent, rational, and biblical throughout; and he was proclaiming it with a vigor and an earnestness which have not been surpassed by any American preacher of the nineteenth century. Universalism, with the rise of Hosea Ballou (although it has undergone many modifications, and made important developments, since his time), entered upon a new epoch; and its growth was rapid, not only in numerical strength, but in organic life and power. The General Convention, at its session in Winchester, N.H., in 1803, adopted the following Profession of Belief: —

"ART. I. We believe that the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments contain a revelation of the character of God, and of the duty, interest, and final destination of mankind.

"ART. II. We believe that there is one God, whose nature is love, revealed in one Lord Jesus Christ, by one Holy Spirit of grace, who will finally restore the whole family of mankind to holiness and happiness.

"ART. III. We believe that holiness and true happiness are inseparably connected, and that believers ought to be careful to maintain order, and practise good works, for these things are good, and profitable unto men."

This brief creed has been regarded as embracing the essential features of Universalism, in a phraseology sufficiently elastic to cover the most divergent views; and it has been made the test of fellowship in churches and conventions. A large and respectable minority of Universalists to-day are not satisfied with the language of some of these articles; and a special committee of the General Convention is at present (1883) engaged in considering whether a modification of them may not be desirable and practicable.

The polity of the Universalist Church is republican in form, embracing both the clerical and lay elements. In each State of the Union, there is a convention made up of the ministers in fellowship residing within the State, and of lay-representatives from each parish. Each State Convention has jurisdiction within its own borders in matters of fellowship, and has charge of local missions. Over all is the General Convention of Universalists, which meets annually, and is composed of delegates, clerical and lay, in definite proportions, chosen by the State conventions. This body has a national charter and a permanent board of trustees, who hold sessions during the interim of the conventions, have charge of the funds, direct the general missionary operations of the church, and dispense scholarships to theological students. The permanent funds now belonging to the General Convention amount to $150,000. The resources are still further enhanced by annual contributions in all the churches. Many State conventions also have funds of considerable amounts.

The latest statistics (1883) of the denomination give 23 State conventions, 939 parishes, 36,528 families, 36,248 communicants, 683 Sunday schools with 51,793 members, 780 church buildings, a total valuation of parish property, above indebtedness, of $6,443,010, 713 clergymen, and 10 licensed lay-preachers. During the last forty years the denomination has made great progress in educational matters. There are now in New England and in the State of New York five academies, the most of which are well equipped and endowed. In the whole country, there are four colleges and three theological schools. Over one thousand pupils, during the year 1882, were enrolled in these different institutions. Altogether they represent a permanent investment of at least two and a quarter millions of dollars. Organized Universalism is confined chiefly to this continent; but the doctrine is widely diffused, not only in England and Scotland, but in Germany, Switzerland, and Sweden. Many of the leading scholars of Germany in recent times have strongly advocated it. Conspicuous teachers, both within and without the English Establishment, have championed it ardently. It has had some of its ablest defenders among the Scotch clergy. A mission-church of the denomination has been established in Glasgow by the Women's Centenary Association of America, and for some years it has had regular pastoral care. There are organizations and churches at other points in Scotland.

The literature of Universalism is very voluminous. The following are some of the leading works: Dialogues on Universal Restoration, by ELIHANAN WINCHESTER, London, 1788; A Treatise on the Atonement, by HOSEA BALLOU, 1805; Letters and Sermons, by JOHN MURRAY, Boston, 1812; Union, by JAMES RELLY, London, 1759; The Complete Works of HOSEA BALLOU, published in 1851; An Inquiry into the Scriptural Import of the Words Sheol, Hades, Tartarus, and Gehenna, by WALTER BALFOUR, 1st ed., 1824, revised ed., 1854; Plain Guide to Universalism, by T. UNIVERSITIES. 1. Greek.—The universitas is a literary corporation, either of teachers or scholars. The first university was founded in Athens, under Hadrian, in which rhetoric, philosophy, and political eloquence were taught. That in Constantinople was founded in 425, with twenty-eight teachers of the Greek and Roman languages and literatures, one of philosophy, and two of law.

Law schools existed in imperial times in Rome and Berytus.

2. Medieval.—Universities were founded in the twelfth century. The instructors were mainly clergymen: hence the terms "rector" and "dean." Celibacy was generally demanded of the teachers. Paris, where the theological faculty dates from 1213, took the lead in theology and philosophy; Bologna, whose law-faculty dates from 1158, in canonical and civil law. The bulls of Innocent III. (of 1209 and 1213) first gave the Paris university independent corporate existence. A university comprised four "nations,"—French, Norman, Picard, and English,—according to the nationality of the scholars in democratic Bologna, according to that of the teachers in aristocratic Paris. Gradually the four faculties of theology, medicine, canonical law, and arts, acquired individual corporate rights, the theological latest (about 1300). The first three dominated the fourth, because it was considered preparatory to one of the three. Each nation and faculty formed a little corporation, with seal, banner, funds, and disciplinary institutions. The more general interests were decided by a general council. Every four years a university rector was chosen, every month a "national" procurator. The popes and kings gave the universities great privileges,—independent jurisdiction over the students, immunities, inviolability of their property, etc. One of the most important was the right to confer degrees,—bachelor (in theology, at first after eight, but, after the fourteenth century, after fourteen years' study), licentiate (the right to lecture), and in the same year master.

The instruction was given by lectures and disputations. In theology the subjects were Bible-texts expounded, with the help of glosses, tropically, analogically, and allegorically; and the Sentences of Peter Lombard. The students attached themselves to their respective masters; but the discipline was lax, and disturbances frequent. (For the famous Sorbonne, which excelled all other theological schools, and was almost identical with the Paris theological faculty, see art.)

The dates of the medieval German universities are, Prague, 1348; Vienna, 1365; Heidelberg, 1386; Cologne, 1388; Erfurt, 1393; Leipzig, 1409; Rostock, 1419; Greifswald, 1456; Freiburg, 1457; Basel, 1460; Ingolstadt, 1472; Mayence and Tübingen, 1477; Wittenberg, 1502; Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1506. The instruction was broad rather than deep; novelties were shunned; tradition ruled: Paris gave laws to all the others. The humanities were not encouraged; so that, although in Paris there was, after 1514, a professor of Greek, he complained that least impulse to his department was given by the university. The universities conspicuously showed their hide-bound character. Prague opposed Wiclif and Hus; Paris thundered against Luther (1521) and against R. Stephen's edition of the Bible (1545), and drove him from the city.

[The great English universities are Oxford and Cambridge, founded in the thirteenth century; the Scotch universities,—Edinburgh, founded 1582; Glasgow, 1450; St. Andrews, 1411; Aberdeen, 1494.]

3. The Protestant Universities since the Reformation.—Only in theology have these universities substantially altered, and down to the end of the seventeenth century the ecclesiastical interests were dominant. Promotions in all faculties were, until this century, held in churches. The head of the university is still called the "rector," invested with princely honors and the "sceptre" of judicial authority: by his side is the chancellor. The faculty of arts still takes the lowest position. The governing body is called the "senate." Holders of the much coveted degree of doctor of theology were in the seventeenth century styled "your Excellency;" and until the eighteenth century the degree was never honorary, but always after "a most rigorous examination." It once cost two hundred thalers.

The distinction between ordinary and extraordinary professors dates from the rise of the Protestant universities. The pay of the teachers originally came from the Pope and bishops, but, in Protestant countries, from the confiscated convent property, gifts of real estate, and government subsidies. The amount received was, until the middle of the seventeenth century, very small; and a great amount of gratuitous work was required. Thus at Rostock the professor of theology formerly received eighty gulden, and the professor of medicine, only thirty. The salaries were, however, eked out by the patronage of princes in return for dedications of books, the fees for disputations and promotions, and, but seldom, by ecclesiastical benefices.

Instruction was by lectures and disputations, and it was said that by the latter one could learn more than by twenty lectures. The professors, in their own pecuniary interest, paid more attention to their private than to their public lectures and disputations. Even after the invention of printing, the dictation of lectures was the rule; and many students earned their living by revising and improving reports. The exclusive language of these exercises was Latin, until Thomasius, at Leipzig, set the example, quickly followed, however, of using German. Yet Leipzig was among the last to abandon the old custom. After the Reformation the professors married, and the students began to take rooms in the city generally. The most radical departure from old methods and modes of life was made in this century when Berlin University was founded (1810).

4. The Theological Animus and Influence of the Different Lutheran Universities.—The Lutheran Church counts the following universities: Wittenberg, Erfurt (since 1525), Rostock (since 1531), Tübingen (since 1535), Leipzig (since 1539), Greifswald (since 1545), Königsberg (1544), Jena (1558), Helmstadt (1576), Altdorf (1578), Giessen (1607), Rinteln (1621), Strassburg (1621), Kiel (1665), Halle (1694), Göttingen (1737), Erlangen (1743), Berlin (1810), Bonn (1817). The German Reformed Church counts the following: Heidelberg, (since 1559), Frankfort (1591), Marburg (1607), Duisberg (1656). The Prussian universities, however, are no longer exclusively Lutheran, but evangelical or united, since the introduction of the union of the two confessions in 1817.

In the sixteenth century humanism, in connection with the practical and biblical character of the Reformation, effected great changes, not only in the subjects taught, but in their presentation. The so-called philosophical course in an improved form, either by reading Aristotle in Greek or in the better Latin translation of Argyropolus and others, and by the use of the excellent Melancthonian text-books, was considered the foundation of theological study. And, in this course, arithmetic, geometry, music, astronomy, history, geography, and poetry were introduced. The study of Greek received a new impetus from Melancthon's grammar; that of Hebrew, from Munster's. The usual time given to these studies was from three to five years. For the first century of Lutheran theology the Scriptures in the original languages were dogmatically and practically expounded. The chief of the universities, in numbers and authority, was Wittenberg. The majority of German churches waited for it to speak the final word. The great theological question of this period related to the Form of Concord (1577).—Wittenberg had in this period as many as three thousand students at once, most of them in theology.

In the first half of the seventeenth century, after the christological controversy between Tübingen and Giessen was ended, no other theological question arose. The Concord theology became triumphant. At the end of the second half of the century, in theology, Wittenberg still maintained its position at the head of the orthodox conservatives under Calovius' mighty influence. But these theologians were opposed by the Calvinians, influenced by Spener's pietism, who were dominant at Altdorf and Königsberg, and represented in Kiel and Jena. The pietists ruled in Giessen.—The principal universities of this period were Wittenberg (twelve hundred students), Leipzig (between three and four thousand, most of them in law), and Jena (twenty-five hundred).

In the eighteenth century Wittenberg began to wane, and Halle (where pietism ruled) and Jena to assert their authority. But if the expansive power was wanting to confessional orthodoxy, so was it also, after 1740, to pietism. In Halle, Baumgarten started a new phase of the theological movement,—the Wolffian. The doctrines were not substantially changed; but they were supported by logical demonstration, not by appeal to the word of God, nor to the testimony of the Spirit. The result of this dry scholasticism was rationalism. But in Halle, Semler lectured; and his historico-critical studies made an epoch, and put the university at the head, in point of number of theological students. These, in 1780–90, averaged eight hundred.—In the last decade of the century Göttingen exercised the most influence upon theology. Her professors were noted for a certain moderate and dry orthodoxy, easy-going and tolerant.

5. The Reformed and Roman-Catholic Universities.—These were few in numbers, and several were disbanded during the Thirty-Years' War. Heidelberg, after its destruction in 1622, was restored as a Roman-Catholic university in 1629, but, after a long period of decadence, was made a Protestant university in 1803, and the Roman-Catholic faculty removed to Freiburg. Marburg, which in 1624 fell to the Lutherans, was in 1653 restored to the Reformed. Herborn was dissolved in 1629. Frankfort, in 1633, had only one theological professor. Reformed theology, by virtue of its practical and biblical character, did not pass through pietism to rationalism, on the contrary, vigorously opposed the latter. Out of fear lest the Roman-Catholic universities would not sufficiently instil Tridentine ideas into their students, the bishops organized theological seminaries. Indeed, their fears were well grounded; for in Vienna, Freiburg, and Landshut, Josephinism ruled; and in Bonn, Breslau, Freiburg, Tübingen, and Gießen, the Roman-Catholic faculties rivalled the Protestant in scientific theological training.

UNIVERSITY IN AMERICA. Educational terms are so much confused in the United States, that at one time we hear it said that there are "no American universities;" at another, that there are so many as to be ridiculous. The difference is between the real and the nominal. By name, the printed lists record many scores of institutions which call themselves universities: in fact, there is not one score which a jury of American scholars would acknowledge to be worthy of this designation, and a still smaller number which would be called universities according to the English or the German standard. The confusion is injurious to the progress of education in the United States. A seminary which would be respectable under a modest name seems pretentious under a lofty title: worse than this, the proper object of a college is in danger of being forgotten, and the legitimate office of a university wholly lost sight of. A study of European universities will show, that, with many differences in their formal organization, they have generally, for a long time past, adhered to certain fixed principles.

1. They have furnished liberal education in the most advanced branches of knowledge, — usually in law, medicine, and theology, — and also in the various studies which are called philosophy, including mathematics, the natural and physical sciences, the historical and moral sciences, and philology; and this instruction has been given to young men who have been fitted for it by long-continued training in subordinate colleges, gymnasias, and lycées.

2. They have encouraged scholars of exceptional powers to devote a considerable part of their time, while engaged as teachers, to the advancement of human knowledge by researches in libraries and in laboratories, and to the publication of their results for the benefit of mankind.

3. They have retained the right to bestow academic degrees, and have bestowed these honors with rigid restrictions; so that the public may have some assurance of the intellectual ability of young men engaging in intellectual pursuits, and so that young students may be encouraged in their most advanced intellectual work by the approbation of an incorporated society of scholars.

4. They have built up, by their direct and indirect agencies, libraries, museums, observatories, laboratories, and other costly agencies for increasing and perpetuating knowledge.

Judged by these high standards, there are few, if any, institutions in the United States which can be called complete universities; but there are some strong, well-planned, and prosperous foundations, which are full of promise, and which are likely, within the next few years, to be developed into universities differing from the English, the German, the French, the Scotch, or the Italian type, but having distinctive American characteristics. Among their peculiarities will doubtless be a readiness to study the experience of all other countries, and to apply the lessons thus learned to the peculiar civil, ecclesiastical, and social conditions of the United States. These American universities will differ from one another as the requirements and the history of different parts of the country differ. Generous pecuniary gifts have already been made for university purposes in distinction from collegiate, and other large endowments are known to be forthcoming. Before 1900, or, in other words, before the youth who are now in their cradles are ready to graduate, there will be several institutions worthy to be called universities, and to be compared with like foundations in the most enlightened countries,—probably one in or near each of the ten or twelve great cities of the country, and a few others developed in the older States from the present collegiate foundations, and, in the newer, established by legislative aid or private munificence.

The older colleges, originally organized on the type of English colleges, began early in this century to unfold into universities. Thus Harvard, in addition to its college, has now its schools of law, medicine, and theology, its museum of comparative zoology, its botanic garden, its astronomical observatory, its scientific school, its agricultural school, its dental school. Yale has, besides its college, its schools of science, law, medicine, theology, and of the fine arts, and its astronomical observatory. Columbia has its schools of law, medicine, and mines in addition to its college. A like development, if not as wide, may be seen in several others of the older foundations.

Another promising group of universities includes those which have been organized under the auspices of State governments, largely maintained by public appropriations. The University of Virginia, initiated by Jefferson, was one of the earliest of this class, and has always borne the marks of freedom and individuality which he impressed upon it. The States of Georgia, North and South Carolina, and Louisiana followed, to some extent, the lead of Virginia. Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, and other Western States, have likewise initiated strong foundations.

Within a few years a third variety of university foundations has sprung up, the result of private gifts,—as at Boston, Ithaca, Baltimore, and New Orleans,—free from historic traditions and from governmental superintendence. These three varieties of organization are not unlikely to present perpetually three types,—the collegiate university, the state university, and the independent university.

There is a fourth form of university organization, that of the State of New York, which has the distinctive function, that, without giving instruction from its own forces, it has a sort of advisory and even supervisory charge of the colleges and academies of the State.

The points to be aimed at by those who are endeavoring to organize universities should be these,—broad and comprehensive arrangements for the advancement of knowledge, and for the education of superior minds; ample funds, free as possible from petty restrictions; a careful adaptation to the conditions of American society, especially to the schools and colleges already established. If the universities could recover the exclusive right to confer degrees, it would be a great gain.

UPHAM, Thomas Cogswell, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Deerfield, N.H., Jan. 30, 1799; d. in New-York City, April 2, 1872. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1818, and at Andover Seminary, 1821; taught Hebrew, 1821–

23; and from 1825 to 1867 was professor of mental and moral philosophy in Bowdoin College. He was a voluminous writer. Among his works may be mentioned Elements of Mental Philosophy, 1839, 2 vols. (abridged ed., 1864); Outlines of Disordered Mental Action, 1840; Ratio discipline, or the Constitution of the Congregational Churches Examined, Portland, 1844; Life of Madame Guyon, New York, 1847; Life of Faith, 1848; Principles of the Interior, or Hidden Life, 1848; Treatise on the Will, 1850; Divine Union, Boston, 1851; Religious Maxims, Philadelphia, 1854; Method of Prayer, 1859; The Absolute Religion, 1872.

UR OF THE CHALDEES, the land of Abraham's ancestors (Gen. xi. 28, 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7). Schrader thus writes respecting it: "In the extreme south of Babylonian Chaldea, west of the Euphrates, from unknown times there existed a very famous seat of the worship of the moon-goddess Sin, called Uru upon the Babylonian cuneiform inscriptions, to-day represented by the ruins of Mugheir. It is certainly natural to identify this Uru with the Ur of Abraham's ancestry. And this conjecture is supported by considering that (1) the name Abrahā in the pronunciation Aburamu is Assyrian-Babylonian; (2) Ur, whence Abraham emigrated, and Haran, where he rested, were alike seats of the worship of Sin, the moon-goddess; (3) the West Semites and the Hebrews also had the same religious ideas and traditions as the Babylonians; (4) Hebrew poetry in its parallelism and methods resembles Babylonian poetry." URBAN is the name of eight popes. — Urban I. (223–230), a native of Rome, is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, and is commemorated on May 25. — Urban II. (1088–June 29, 1099). He was born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, studied at Rheims, entered the monastery of Clugny, and was by Gregory VII. called to Rome, and in 1084 sent as legate to the Emperor Henry IV. After the death of Victor III. he was elected Pope by the Gregorian party; and, at a council in Rome (1089), he excommunicated both Henry IV. and Clement III. Expelled from Rome in 1091 by the emperor and the antipope, he fled to Count Roger of Benevent; but the rebellion of Conrad against his father enabled him to return to Rome in 1093, and from that time till his death he vindicated the dignity and rights of his position with uninterrupted success. The greatest event in his life was the Council of Clermont (1095), where his speech to the multitude became the actual starting-point of the first crusade. His letters and a life of him are found in MANSI: Conc. Coll., vol. 20; [M. F. STURN: Zur Biographie des Papstes Urban's II., Halle, 1883]. — Urban III. (1185–Oct. 19, 1187). He was a native of Milan, and made archbishop there by Lucius III. His whole policy was dictated by one single motive,—his hatred to the Emperor Friedrich Barbarossa; but all his rash undertakings against him were foiled. See Gesta Trevirorum, ed. Wytttenbach and Müller, Treves, 1836, vol. i. — Urban IV. (1261–Oct. 2, 1264). He was a native of Troyes, studied in Paris, was made bishop of Liège, went as Papal legate to Germany, and was by Alexander IV. made patriarch of Jerusalem. The great aim of his policy was to overthrow Manfred of Sicily. He summoned him to Rome; and, when Manfred refused to appear, the Pope gave his land to Charles of Anjou. But Manfred expelled the Pope from Rome, and Urban died on the flight. His bulls and letters are found in MANSI: Conc. Coll., vol. 23. — Urban V. (Oct. 28, 1362–Nov. 13, 1370). He was born in the diocese of Menda; became abbot of Auxerre in 1353, and of St. Victor in 1358; taught canon law at Montpellier, Avignon, Toulouse, and Paris; and was sent as Papal legate to Naples and Sicily. He was the last pope who resided at Avignon. In 1367 he determined to return to Rome, and on Oct. 16 he entered the city; but he left it again in September, 1370, and died at Avignon. The confusion of Italian politics he could not master. Bernabo Visconte, who seized several cities belonging to the States of the Church, he excommunicated; but he was nevertheless compelled to pay him half a million of gold guildens in order to have the cities restored. His life has been written by MAGNAN (1862), ALBANES (1872), and CHARBONNEL (1872). See also MANSI: Conc. Coll., vol. 26. — Urban VI. (April 8, 1378–Oct. 15, 1389). He was a native of Naples, and was archbishop of Bari, when, after the death of Gregory XI., he was elected pope. But his arrogance and arbitrariness very soon brought him into conflict with the cardinals, a party of whom repaired to Anagni, declared the election of Urban invalid, and chose Clement VII. pope: thus the great schism began. Clement VII. took up his residence at Avignon; while Urban succeeded in vindicating himself in Rome, supported by Catherine of Siena and Catherine of Sweden, and recognized by England, Denmark, Germany, and Poland. He espoused the cause of Charles of Durazzo against Johanna of Naples and Sicily, but fell out with Charles, too, was besieged by him in Nocera, and barely escaped (1385), first to Sicily, then to Genoa. After the death of Charles he tried to take possession of Sicily as a vacant fief; but his soldiers abandoned him in Perugia (1388), and he had to give up the scheme. See MANSI: Conc. Coll., vol. 26. — Urban VII. (Sept. 15–27, 1590) died before he was consecrated. — Urban VIII. (Aug. 6, 1623–July 29, 1644). He was a native of Florence; studied in Rome and Bologna, under the Jesuits; entered the service of the curia, and was made archbishop of Nazareth in 1601, and sent as apostolical nuncio to France. In his policy he was an Italian prince, rather than the head of the Roman Catholic Church. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain, and was thus indirectly in alliance with the Protestants. The Emperor Ferdinand II. complained bitterly, and even the cardinals thought of convening a council against him. He canonized Ignatius Loyola, and Philip of Neri, and beatified Francis Borgia, Andreas Avellino, and others. His poems—paraphrases of psalms in metres of Horace, and hymns to the Virgin—appeared at Antwerp, 1634, and Paris, 1642. He is also the author of those epigrams which appeared in Rome in 1643, with commentaries by Dornalius. [Urban VIII., while Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, was a friend and admirer of Galileo; and, after his elevation to the pontifical throne, he continued to show the astronomer marked favor, who, in turn, dedicated to the new Pope (October, 1623) his Saggiatore, a polemical treatise upon comets, directed against the Jesuit astronomer in Rome. In January, 1632, Galileo issued his Dialogo dei due Massimi Sistemi del mondo, repeating the "heresies" of the Copernican philosophy, which in 1616 he had promised not to do; and in October, 1632, Urban, in indignation at Galileo's supposed ingratitude and insubordination, summoned him peremptorily to Rome, and handed him over to the Inquisition. He was treated, however, with great leniency, kept only a few days in captivity, and at last suffered to depart unharmed, after he had renounced his "heresy" June 22, 1633. Urban never signed the sentence of the Inquisition. See GRISAR: Galileistudien, Regensburg, 1882; INQUISITION, p. 1100.] A life of Urban (Gesta Urbani) appeared at Antwerp, 1637. See RANKE: Die römischen Päpste, Berlin, 1836 (vol. iii.). NEUDECKER.

URIM AND THUMMIM (אֲרִיִּים וְתֻמִּיִּים; LXX., ὄφθαλμοὶ καὶ ἀλάθεια [command and truth]; Vulgate, doctrina et veritas) are mentioned first in Exod. xxviii. 30, in connection with the "breastplate" of the high priest, and in a manner to imply that they were sensible objects, at least two in number, which were put into the "breastplate," which was, indeed, a sort of bag. This is all we know about them. They were used as a sort of divine oracle, probably with certain traditional ceremonies: sometimes no answer could be obtained from them (1 Sam. xxviii. 6). See art. "Licht u. Recht," in RIEM'S Handwörterbuch d. bib. Alt., pp. 911–918.

URLSPERGER, Johann August, founder of the German Christian Association (Deutsche Christenthumsgesellschaft); was b. in Augsburg, Nov. 25, 1728; d. in Hamburg, Dec. 1, 1806. After studying at Halle, he became pastor at Augsburg, where he retained his official position till 1776. He was an earnest defender of the faith in an age of neology and deism, and wrote several works. The chief labor of his life was the organization, after many discouragements, of an association of Christians for the promotion of "pure godliness," at Basel, which has continued to this day as a fruitful source of blessing, and out of which have grown the Basel Bible (1801) and Missionary (1816) societies. The last years of his life were saddened by disappointments, and spent in restless travels.

URSICINUS, Antipope; was chosen pope by a minority of the Roman clergy in 366, the majority having declared in favor of Damasus. In consequence of the continued division among the clergy, he was driven from Rome, and went to Cologne. Returning to Italy in 381, his appearance was again the occasion of violent commotions, until he was finally banished from Italy by the Council of Aquileja. NEUDECKER.

URSINUS, Zacharias, was b. at Breslau, July 18, 1534; d. at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt, March 6, 1583. Descended from poor parents, he was forced to rely for his education upon friends and his own efforts. He matriculated at Wittenberg University in 1550, and remained there till 1557, being on terms of intimacy with Melancthon. At the latter's invitation he was present at the Diet of Worms, whence he went to Geneva (where he met Calvin), and to Paris, where he pursued the study of Hebrew under Jean Mercier. In 1558 he accepted a professorship in the Elizabeth school at Breslau. The sacramental controversy reaching that city, he published Theses de Sacramentis, de Baptismo et de Cena Domini ("Theses on the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper"), in which he ranged himself on the side of Calvin and Melancthon. The opposition these views aroused was the occasion of his leaving Breslau; and, as Melancthon had died, he went to Zurich, where he found a friend and teacher in Peter Martyr. In 1561 he accepted a call to Heidelberg as professor in the Collegium Sapientiae. In September, 1562, he began his lectures on theology, which he continued till Feb. 10, 1568. In 1563 he was appointed to deliver the sermon on the Catechism on Sunday afternoons, and was called in to take part in the preparation of the church discipline of the Palatinate, of which the Heidelberg Catechism (see art.) forms a part. In connection with Olevianus, he made the preliminary draughts of the latter; and upon him principally devolved its defence. He was the author of the two works in defence of the Catechism which appeared in 1564, — Verantwortung wider die ungegründeten aufgaben und verkerungen mit welchen der Catechismus Christlicher lehre, zu Heidelberg im Jar MDLXIII. ausgegangen, von etlichen unbilliger weise beschweret ist, and Antwort auff etlicher Theologen Censur über die am rand dess Heyleberg Catechism auss heiliger Schrift angezogene Zeugnisse. The same year he issued two works on the Lord's Supper, — Antwort vnd Gegenfrag auff sechs fragen von dess Herrn Nachtmal, and Gründlicher Bericht von heiligem Abendmahl, etc. He enjoyed the full confidence of the elector, Frederick III., and was constantly called in to defend him against theological opponents. But, like Melancthon, he shunned controversy. Broken down in health, he was relieved of his theological professorship, and Zanchius made his successor (1568). The apostasy of Sylvanus, Neuser, and others, from Calvinism, and their rejection of the Trinity and divinity of Christ, were hailed by the Lutherans as a proof that Calvinism led to fatalism and Mohammedanism, and called forth a work on these subjects from Ursinus' pen, — Bekennnuss der Theologen und Kirchendiener zu Heydelberg von den einigen waren Gott in dreyen Personen, den zweyen Naturen inn der einigen Person Christi, etc. (1574).

In 1576 Ludwig succeeded to the electorate, and completely overthrew the Reformed government of his father. [More than six hundred preachers and teachers lost their places on account of their adherence to the Reformed faith.] The Collegium Sapientiae was abolished the year following, and Ursinus left without a position, in spite of the request of Frederick III., before his death, to his son, that he should be retained. In 1578 he accepted a position in the Collegium illustre Casimirianum at Neustadt-on-the-Hardt [which formed a part of the domain of Frederick's second son, John Casimir]. In 1577 he was appointed by the synod of Frankfurt to unite with Zanchius in drawing up a confession for the Reformed churches of Europe, but he declined. In 1581 he published, in the name of the theologians of Neustadt, a forcible criticism of the Formula of Concord (Admonitio Christiana de libro Concordia). Ursinus was, beyond doubt, a Calvinist, but refused to acknowledge a human leader, saying at the Colloquy of Maulbronn, "We are not baptized in the name of Luther, or Zwingli, or of any other, but of Christ alone." He fully accepted the doctrine of predestination, and taught his pupils to regard it as the pillar of their Christian faith and life. See HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, (OLEVIANUS.

LIT. — A complete edition of the works of Ursinus was edited by Quirinus Reuter in 1612, 3 vols. His Life has been treated by SUDHOFF: C. Olevianus und Zacharias Ursinus, Elberfeld, 1857; GILLET: Crato von Crafftheim, Frankfurt, 1860. [There is an English translation, by H. Parrie, of his Summe of Christian Religion, Lond., 1587, and another by Rev. G. W. Williard, Columbus, O., 1851 (now published by the Reformed Dutch Church Board of Publication, New York), under the title Commentary on the Heidelberg Catechism. See also HUNDESHAGEN: Ursinus, in Lives of the Leaders of our Church Universal, 1879; NEVIN's historical preface to Williard's edition, mentioned above, translated into German, with additions by P. SCHIAFF in his Kirchenfreund, iv. (1851), pp. 335-356.] GILLET.

URSULA, a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church. According to a legend of the church of Cologne, contained in Siebert von Gemblours' Chron. ad an. 453, Hagen's Reimchronik (about 1275), the Cronica van der hilligen Stat van Coellen (about 1495), the Legenda aurea, or Lombardica hystoria (Strassburg, 1496), Ursula was the only daughter of the Christian king, Deonotus, or Diogenetus, of Britain. Sought in marriage by the heathen prince Holofernes, she put off the marriage for three years, and in the mean time started on a pilgrimage, with ten close companions and eleven thousand other virgins. They crossed the sea to Tila, on the coast of Gaul, went up the Rhine to Cologne, thence to Basel, and from there to Rome. Returning, Pope Cyriacus accompanied the party, which, as it approached Cologne, was totally annihilated by the Huns, with King Ezzel at their head. Ursula, who, on account of her beauty, was spared to become the wife of the king, resisted, and was killed with an arrow. The Huns were immediately compelled to flee by hosts of angels. The city of Cologne, thus delivered, buried the martyred virgins' bodies, and placed over each grave a stone bearing the name of the occupant. The palmer Clematius subsequently built the St. Ursula Church on the spot. The credibility of the legend in this form was doubted in the middle ages by Jacobus a Voraigne, in the Legenda aurea, and Gobelinus Persona, in his Cosmodromium (about 1418), on the ground that no Pope Cyriacus lived in the reign of Maximinus Thrax (235-238) or Maximianus Herculeus (284-305), that the Huns had not appeared in Europe at that early date, etc. Baronius himself (Annal. ad an., 383, 384) felt compelled by these considerations to reject the legend in its German form, and to receive that of Geoffrey of Monmouth, in his Hist. regum Britan. According to this, Deonotus, king of Cornwallis, sent over seventy-one thousand virgins to Gaul, at the requisition of the usurper Maximus (383-388). Driven upon islands inhabited by barbarians, they were slain by Huns and Picts (!).

The foundation of the Ursuline legend is to be decided from the martyrologies written prior to the twelfth century. The most of them, belonging to the eighth and ninth centuries, and bearing the names of Beda, Ado of Vienne, Rhabanus Maurus, etc., contain nothing about Ursula. Wandelbert of Prüm (d. about 870) was the first to refer to her, and says, "Thousands of virgins were cut down with ruthless fury near the city of Agrippa, on the banks of the Rhine." (See the passage in D'Achery: Spicileg., ii. 51.) If this passage suggests the idea of interpolation, we read in Usuardus of St. Germain (about 875), of the martyrdom of Martha and Saula, "with many others" (alii pluribus, at Cologne. A much later church calendar of Cologne (edited by Binterim, Cologne, 1821) mentions eleven virgin martyrs by name. A Treves calendar of the eleventh century (see Hontheim: Prodrom. hist. Trevir., i. 385) was the first to speak of thousands of such virgins (sanctarum virg. millia); and two later calendars (Hontheim, pp. 392, 399) put the number at eleven thousand. The change of the number is explained by Rettberg, Gieseler, and others as a false interpretation of the words S. Ursula et vii M. Virgines ("St. Ursula and the eleven martyred virgins") to mean "St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins."

URSULINES, The. This order was founded by Angela Merici (b. March 21, 1470; d. Jan. 27, 1540; beatified by Clement VIII. (1768); and canonized by Pius VII. (1807) as Angela of Brescia) in Brescia, Nov. 25, 1535. It did not bind itself by strict conventual rules, and vows of chastity or poverty. Its object was to instruct girls, and to care for the poor and sick. Angela drew up the original twenty-five articles governing the order. The Papal confirmation of the order was granted by Paul III. in 1544. Cardinal Borromeo took it under his special patronage. The rules became more strict; and the Ursulines, who began to spread in France (Paris, 1611) and Germany, also established convents, which was not the idea of the founder. Many still live in their own homes. Their chief work lies in the education of girls, and catechetisation. They wear a black dress bound by a leather girdle, and a black cloak without sleeves, and a tight-fitting fabric about the head, with a white veil and a longer black veil. The St. Ursula mentioned above is their patron, hence the name. USSHER (or USHER), James, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland; was b. at Dublin, Jan. 4, 1581; d. at the residence of the Countess of Peterborough, Ryegate, Surrey, March 21, 1656. In 1594 he entered Trinity College, Dublin. Stapelton's Fortress of Faith, in which the high antiquity of the Papal Church is asserted, led him to the study of the Fathers, in whose writings he read systematically every day for eighteen years. His father had set him apart for the study of the law, but his death in 1598 left Ussher free to pursue the study of theology. In 1600 he became fellow of Trinity, and in 1603 he was sent with Dr. Chaloner to England to purchase books with the eighteen hundred pounds which Parliament had given for the foundation of a university library. In 1607 he was made professor of divinity at Trinity College, and in 1614 vice-chancellor of the university. The hundred and four articles of the Irish Church, with their strong Calvinism, which were passed by a synod held in Dublin, 1615, were probably from Ussher's hand. They were never ratified by the Irish Parliament. Ussher was frequently obliged to visit England, and stood on good terms with the king in spite of the suspicion that he was a Puritan. In 1621 he was appointed bishop of Meath, and in 1625 archbishop of Armagh, and primate of Ireland. Ussher had preached sternly against the Roman-Catholic Church, and as primate declared himself in opposition to all toleration of the Catholics. Wentworth, however, the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, counteracted his influence in this regard, and introduced, against his will, the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. Ussher does not seem to have been equal to the emergencies of his diocese, and, longing for literary occupations, retired to England in 1640, never returning to Ireland. Arriving at London about the time of the opening of the Long Parliament, he became involved in the discussion of prelacy. In The Directions of the Archbishop of Armagh concerning the Liturgy and Episcopal Government, which was printed without his consent, he advocated the view according to which the bishops would be simply superintendents and synodal presidents. He accompanied Lord Stafford to the scaffold, and was appointed bishop of Carlisle in commendam, as some reparation for the loss of his library on its way to London. In 1643 he was invited to sit as a member of the Westminster Assembly, the Puritans being contented with his plan of a "reduced episcopacy," above referred to; but, the king refusing his consent, he never took part in the proceedings, [but exerted a decided influence upon it through his Body of Divinity, the Irish Articles, and other works]. In 1642 Ussher retired to Oxford, where he remained till 1645, preaching nearly every Sunday. In 1646 he followed an invitation of Lady Peterborough to London, and in 1647 was made preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He remained true to the king till his death, but was received with marks of respect by Cromwell. At Cromwell's command a splendid funeral was held at his death, and his remains interred at Westminster Abbey. His fine library went to the university of Dublin.

Ussher was a man of unusual gifts of mind and heart. Selden [whose funeral-sermon he preached] speaks of him as vir summa pietate et integritate judicio singulari usque ad miraculum doctus et literis severioribus promovendis natus. He was a declared Royalist, and ardent advocate of passive obedience, but stood well with the Puritans, on account of his strict Calvinism, and his advocacy of a modified episcopacy. His life was blameless, his personality imposing. Impressive as a preacher, he was more learned as a scholar. He did excellent service in discovering and securing old manuscripts, as, for example, the Samaritan Pentateuch from Aleppo.

Ussher's writings, which were numerous, may be divided as follows. (1) Apologetic writings: Gravissimæ questionis de christianarum ecclesiarum in Occidentis præsertim partibus ab apostolorum temporibus ad nostram ætatem, continua successione et statu, hist. explication, 1613 (in which the thousand years in which Satan was to be bound are declared to have ended with Gregory VII., when Satan was loosed in the Church of Rome); An answer to a challenge made by a Jesuit in Ireland wherein the judgement of antiquity in the points questioned is truly delivered and the novelty of the now Romish doctrine plainly discovered, 1625 (a master-work, in which the principal points of difference between the Catholic and Anglican churches are discussed with great learning); Reduction of Episcopacy unto a form of a Synodical government received in the ancient church, and proposed in 1641 (ed. Bernard, 1657). (2) Historical writings. Ussher was a pioneer in the department of the early church of Britain, and hoped to prove that the early British Church was independent of the Roman Church and its unscripural traditions. The principal works of this kind were, A discourse of the Religion anciently professed by the Irish and British, 1631; Britannicarum ecclesiarum Antiquitates quibus inscripta est Pelagianæ Hæreseos historia, 1639 (a work of twenty years' labor, great research, and critical penetration); Gottschalki et prædestinationis contror. ab eo motæ hist., 1613 (in which he published for the first time Gottschalk's Confessions, which he had had brought from Venice); Dissertatio non de Ignatii solum et Polycarpi scriptis sed etiam de Apost. constitutionibus et canonibus C. Romano attributis, 1614; Præfatio in Ignat.; Ignatii epistolæ genuinæ, etc., 1647; in which last works Ussher declared in favor of the shorter recension of the Ignatian Epistles, as against the larger, which is interpolated by the hand that corrupted the Apost. Constitutions, and surmised the existence of a Syriac recension which was found two centuries later. (3) Chronological writings: De Macedonum et Asianorum anno solari, dissert. cum Græcor. astronom. parapegmate ad Macedonum et Juliani annorum rationes accommodata, 1618; and especially the great work, Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, 1650-54. The dates of this work are given in the English Bibles. It places the creation 4004 B.C.; the flood, 2348 B.C.; the exodus, 1491 B.C.; Solomon's ascent to the throne, 1015, etc. An incomplete work, Chronologia Sacra, was published from his remains. (4) Miscellaneous writings: Body of Divinity, 1638; The Principles of the Christian Religion, 1651; The power communicated by God to the Prince, and the obedience required by the subject, 1665, etc.

Ussher's Complete Works were edited by ELINGTON (regius professor of divinity at Dublin) 1847-62, 16 vols. See the Life there prefixed, and those by BERNARD (1656) and RICHARD PARR (1686).

C. SCHOELL.

USTERI, Leonhard, a German theologian; b. in Zurich, Oct. 22, 1799; d. in Bern, Sept. 18, 1833. He studied in Zurich and Berlin (1820-23), where he was strongly influenced by Schleiermacher. Returning to Zurich, he engaged in private tutoring, and devoted himself to literary work. In 1823 he issued a Commentatio critica in qua Evangel. Joannis genuinum esse ex comparatis IV. Evangeliorum narrationibus de cæna ultima et passione J. Christi ostenditur, in which he vindicated John's accuracy concerning the last passover of our Lord. In 1824 he published his work on Paul's doctrinal system (Entwicklung d. paulin. Lehrbegriffs mit Hinsicht auf d. übrigen Schriften d. N.T.). The author lived to see four editions, and two appeared after his death (6th, 1851). This work at once gave him a wide reputation, and secured for him a call to Bern as professor and director of the gymnasium. The work would not be accepted as an authority now. His fundamental position, for example, is, that Paul's doctrinal system was developed from the fact of the contrast between the pre-Christian age and Christianity. He rightly affirms, however, that Paul, after his conversion, sought for righteousness in the grace of God alone, and was active in spreading the gospel, because he believed in Christ as the Son of God and the Redeemer. In 1833 a commentary on Galatians appeared from his pen, and was designed to be the first of a series on Paul's Epistles. [In connection with S. Vögelin he issued an excellent selection of Zwingli's works, Zurich, 1819-20, 2 vols.]

The work was first published in Rudimentum novitiorum, Lub., 1175; later editions, Antwerp, 1480; Venice, 1498; Padua, 1500; Cologne, 1515, 1521; Paris, 1536 (with notes by MOLANUS); Lyons, 1568, 1573; Antwerp, 1714 (critical edition by SOLLIER); Paris, 1718 (by BOUILLART). NEUDECKER.

USURY now means the taking of illegal interest, but originally it meant the taking of any interest at all. The Mosaic law absolutely forbade a Hebrew to take interest from a Hebrew, but not from a foreigner (Deut. xxiii. 20). The New Testament does not forbid to take interest, though it recommends to lend money gratuitously (Luke vi. 34). The Fathers unanimously condemned the taking of interest, — Tertullian: Adversus Marcionem, 4, 17; Cyprian: De lapsis; Ambrose: De bono mortis, 12; Augustine: Contra Faustum, 19, 25; Jerome: Ezech., 6, 18. The Popes followed the track of the Fathers, and canon law forbade, first the clergy, afterwards every member of the church, to take interest. The penalty was, for the clergy, suspension; for the laity, excommunication. Interest paid could be reclaimed, not only from him who had received it, but also from his heirs. An oath never to claim back the interest paid was not binding. Of the Reformers, Luther condemned the taking of interest, Calvin admitted it, Melancthon vacillated; but the universal practice of modern civilization has altogether abandoned the principles of canon law, and for good reasons. H. F. JACOBSON.

UTENHEIM, Christoph von, Bishop of Basel, and forerunner of the Reformation there; was b. in Alsace about 1450; d. at Delsberg, near Basel, March 16, 1527. It is not known where he pursued his studies. About the year 1472 he was appointed to a position at the Church of St. Thomas in Strassburg, which he resigned in 1491, and in 1473 chosen rector of university of Basel. In 1500 he was chosen administrator of the diocese of Basel, and in 1502, upon the death of the bishop, his successor. He immediately devoted himself to the improvement of the financial condition of his see, and the morals of the clergy, which were notorious as being more corrupt than those of any of the other five bishoprics in "the priest's lane" (Pfaffengasse; i.e., the Rhine). In 1503 he convened a synod of his clergy at Basel, and, without forsaking the Catholic positions, urged upon them the obligations of a moral and exemplary life. In 1512 he called Capito to Basel, and in 1515 (Ecolampadius; neither of whom, however, up to that time, had uttered any of the advanced views of the Reformation. With Erasmus he stood on the most intimate terms, and, after his sojourn there in the interest of his Greek Testament, urged him to return to Basel. Erasmus, in a letter to Thomas More, mentions the bishop's great cordiality and generosity to him. He makes special record of the gift of a horse, which, as he wrote More, he sold for fifty gold gulden. Utenheim also welcomed the first utterances of Luther, and seems to have thought well of him as late as 1519. In that year Capito wrote Luther that a certain honest bishop would afford him a place of security, by which Utenheim alone can have been meant. However favorable the bishop may once have been to some of the principles of the Reformers, he began in 1522 to take retrograde steps. The occasion was a carousal in which some humanists, most of them priests, had indulged on Palm-Sunday. He issued an edict forbidding the public mention of Luther's name, and the interpretation of the Scriptures in any other sense than the Fathers had understood them. In 1524 he joined the league of German bishops for carrying out the Edict of Worms. However, it is not to be supposed that he wholly shut up his heart to the principles of the Reformation. On a stained-glass window he presented in 1522 to the Magdalene convent of Basel, are the words, Spes mea crux Christi: gratiam, non opera, quero ("My hope is the cross of Christ: I seek grace, not works"). Some of Erasmus' letters to him in this last period of his life are preserved, and testify to the great humanist's regard for the bishop. Bowed down by his many cares, he resigned his see Feb. 13, 1527, but died a few weeks later. See HERZOG: Beiträge zur Geschichte Basels, Basel, 1839, pp. 38-93; Leben Ecolampadius, 1543.

HERZOG.

UTILITARIANISM. This term may be used as synonymous with hedonism (eudæmonism), but more commonly denotes a species of it. In the wider or generic sense it is the doctrine that actions derive their moral character from their consequences; that right in conduct is what tends to promote happiness, and wrong what tends to produce misery; that the ethical is dependent on, and derived from, the useful. This doctrine has four forms, because the consequences of actions must be personal or social, temporal or eternal. The distinction of consequences into personal or social is, however, the deeper and more essential distinction. It is a distinction of nature, which that into temporal or eternal is not. It therefore has to be taken as the principle according to which hedonistic theories should be distributed, and it divides them into the two classes of egoistic and altruistic. Egoistic hedonism is what is known as the selfish theory, and altruistic hedonism is what is commonly called utilitarianism. Hedonism is not a better term, however, for the generic doctrine than utilitarianism: on the whole, it is not so good, as pleasure (hêdonê) is per se, still less than utility, identical or commensurate with morality.

Egoistic hedonism, the selfish theory, the utilitarianism of personal interest, has assumed various phases. It was maintained both in the Cyrenaic and Epicurean schools of antiquity; but the ideal of happiness in the former was the greatest attainable sum of sensations of gentle motion, and, in the latter, of pleasures of rest (freedom from discomfort and anxiety). The self interest to which virtue is traced by Hobbes, Mandeville, and Paley, centres, according to the first of these writers, in the pleasures which spring from the sense of power; according to the second, in the satisfaction of the desire of applause; and, according to the third, in the hope of everlasting happiness and the fear of everlasting pain. But in every form the theory is subject to insuperable objections. It makes interest and duty identical both in idea and fact; whereas consciousness declares that they are quite distinct in idea, and experience testifies that they may be separated, and even opposed in fact. To act from a desire of personal advantage is felt by every one to be very different from acting from a sense of duty. The more self-love reigns, the less can conscience admit that virtue or merit is present. We approve of disinterestedness, and our approbation is itself disinterested. Duty may dictate, in direct antagonism to self-interest, the sacrifice of health, fortune, reputation, and life. Further: egoistic hedonism denies by implication the possibility of intentional wrong-doing, and so involves a reductio ad absurdum. It affirms that men always act from self-love, or with reference to their own good, and also that thus to act is right. The plain inference is, that, so far as purpose goes, men always act rightly, and that there is no intentional wrong-doing. Men always mean to do right, i.e., what is for their own advantage; and if sometimes they do what is contrary to their interest, it is only from error of judgment. Thus the hypothesis tends to obliterate the distinction which it professes to elucidate. It is, likewise, an hypothesis logically incompatible with a belief in God, providence, and eternal life, inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that sensation is the root and source of our entire mental being. Every proof of the Divine Existence involves principles of which sensation can give no account. The moral attributes of God specially transcend all powers of proof possessed by sensationism, and are specially irreconcilable with the system that self-interest is the motive-principle of all that is known as morality. According to this system, man possesses no truly moral attributes. But he can have no right to ascribe to God what he finds no trace of in the world, or history, or himself. And there being no proper principle of morality in man; there being no true moral judge over man; selfishness, not righteousness, being that which is deepest in the universe,—the moral arguments for immortality, which are far the most powerful ones, are overturned, and the hopes of a future life are rendered delusive. Those who have advocated the selfish theory have generally allowed that this was its legitimate conclusion. Historically it has rarely been found to exist apart from atheism and irreligion: logically it never can.

The utilitarian theory, in the special sense of the designation, is a decided advance on the selfish theory. It takes account of the social as well as of the personal consequences of actions. It has been the favorite theory of English ethical writers, and especially in recent times. Dr. Richard Cumberland, in his De Legibus Naturæ (1672), made a very elaborate and remarkable attempt to found the theory on a philosophical basis. Locke, Norris, and Hume were either almost or altogether utilitarians. Jeremy Bentham, James Mill, John Austin, John Stuart Mill, and Alexander Bain may be mentioned as among the chief defenders, during the present century, of utilitarianism in its immediately pre-Darwinian stage. Jeremy Bentham's utilitarianism, as presented in his Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation (1789), may be summed up in the following propositions: (1) The desire of pleasure and the fear of pain are the only possible motives which can influence the human will; (2) The supreme interest of every individual is the attainment of its own greatest happiness; (3) The supreme interest of society is the attainment of the greatest happiness possible to all its component individuals; (4) The principle of utility or of the greatest happiness is the only test of morality; (5) All adverse principles may be reduced to two,—the principle of asceticism, according to which actions are approved of in proportion as they tend to diminish human happiness, and disapproved of as they tend to augment it; and the principle of sympathy, according to which actions are approved and disapproved of as a man feels himself disposed; (6) The moral character of an action is to be ascertained by a calculation of the pleasures and pains involved in the elements which constitute it; (7) Pleasure or pain may be greater or less according to (a) intensity, (b) duration, (c) certainty or uncertainty, (d) nearness or remoteness, (e) fecundity, (f) purity, and (g) extent, i.e., number of persons affected; (8) The sanctions or sources of pleasure and pain are physical, political, moral, and religious; and (9) The moral faculty is constituted by good-will or benevolence, the love of amity, the love of reputation, the dictates of religion, and prudence. James Mill maintains, in his Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind (1829), these four positions: (1) The standard of morals is utility, and all moral rules are based on an estimate, correct or incorrect, of utility; (2) Useful actions are of four kinds,—acts of prudence, fortitude, justice, and benevolence; prudence and fortitude including those acts which are useful to ourselves in the first instance, to others in the second instance; and justice and benevolence, those which are useful to others in the first instance, to ourselves in the second instance; (3) The moral feelings are a complex product or growth, of which the ultimate constituents are our pleasurable and painful sensations; and (4) Disinterested sentiment is a real fact, but developed by association from our own personal interest, and at length detached from its original root. John Austin, in his Province of Jurisprudence determined (1832), assails the view that moral distinctions are perceived by an innate sentiment, moral sense, or intuitive reason, etc.; opposes to it the theory of utility, which he connects with a belief in the Divine Benevolence designing the happiness of sentient beings, utility being the index of the Divine Will; and endeavors to refute the various objections which have been urged against the theory. John S. Mill, in his Utilitarianism (1863), assumes that the criterion of morality, the foundation of morality, and the chief good, are identical, and affirms, among other propositions, (1) That the steadiness and consistency of the moral beliefs of mankind are mainly due to the tacit influence of utilitarianism; (2) that utilitarianism sets before men as chief aim the greatest happiness, not of the individual, but of the race; (3) That it rests on a distinction of pleasures into kinds,—high and low, noble and ignoble pleasures; (4) That it recognizes in human beings the power of sacrificing their own greatest good for the good of others; (5) That conscientious feeling invests utility with obligatory force; and (6) That justice is the animal desire to repel or retaliate hurt, widened so as to include all persons by the human capacity of enlarged sympathy and the human conception of intelligent self-interest. Dr. Alexander Bain, in his works on The Emotions and the Will and Mental and Moral Science, argues that utility or human happiness is the proper ethical standard; that moral rules are of two kinds, the first constituting morality proper, obligatory morality, duty, imposed by authority under a penalty for neglect or violation, and the second constituting optional morality, merit, virtue, or nobleness, having rewards for its only external support; that human beings are endowed with a prompting to relieve the pains, and add to the pleasures, of others, which is inexplicable by association, and irrespective of self-regarding considerations; and that prudence, sympathy, and some co-operating emotions, along with the institution of government or authority, give rise to moral ideas, their peculiar attribute of rightness being stamped on them by authority.

Jeremy Bentham is, perhaps, the best representative of those who have expounded and defended utilitarianism as a doctrine which takes into account only the quantitative attributes of pleasures and pains; and John S. Mill, of those who have held that their qualitative differences, their distinctions of kind and nature, are equally to be estimated. Neither form of the theory is consistent, and the latter form is extremely inconsistent. If regard be had merely to quantity of pleasure or pain, utilitarianism can never justify its separation from the selfish theory. Thus presented, it leaves out of account all the higher principles of human nature, and takes into account only what is measurable and calculable, which can only be what is animal and selfish. On the other hand, recognition of distinctions of kind or quality in pleasures and pains, when followed out, must lead, not to the confirmation, but to the destruction, of the theory. Quantity exclusive of quality must rule in a properly utilitarian system. Admit a qualitative gradation among pleasures, and you can no longer have a greatest happiness principle, but only a highest happiness principle. Now, what is highest happiness, if it be not a happiness which flows from a consciousness of doing what is right, if it be not a happiness which presupposes a right beyond itself? If, from devotion to what is right, a man sacrifice all other happiness in the world, this highest happiness will, it is true, still remain with him; but why? Is it because this happiness is set by him over against other happiness, and preferred? or is it because right is set over against happiness, and this particular kind of happiness springs necessarily from the very act of sacrificing happiness to right? It cannot be the former, which would transmute all martyrdom into selfishness. He who makes the pleasure which flows from virtue his end will never get it, for this plain reason, as Dr. Newman says, that he will never have the virtue. If the latter be the true supposition, utilitarianism is erroneous. It is in this case the rightness which explains the pleasure, and not the pleasure which explains the rightness.

Very serious objections may be urged against utilitarianism in every form. It mistakes what is, at the most, a criterion of rightness, for its foundation, the effect for the cause, a tendency or consequence for the constitutive essence. It is easy to prove that virtue is useful; but to prove that virtue is derived from utility, that utility is the source of virtue, is what no utilitarian seems to have accomplished. Austin and Bain plainly abandon utilitarianism at the central and critical point, — where the one appeals to the will of God, and the other to the authority of law. John S. Mill does so not less when he refers "the obligatory force of utility" to "conscientious feeling." The foundation of virtue should have its obligatory force in itself. The theory fails, even when it calls associationism to its aid to explain the origination of the idea of right, either out of sensations of pleasure and pain, or out of generalizations as to happiness and misery. This is admitted by the latest school of utilitarians. Darwin, in his Descent of Man, Herbert Spencer, in his Data of Ethics, Leslie Stephen, in his Science of Ethics, etc., concede that moral perceptions cannot be produced in a very limited time within each individual mind, as Bentham, the Mills, and Bain have maintained. They hold, however, that what the associationist utilitarians erroneously suppose to take place in each individual during the early years of life can really be effected, although only in the course of ages. But those who deny the associationist form of utilitarianism are not likely to adopt the evolutionist form of it, if they vividly perceive utility and duty to be essentially distinct. They cannot in this case be expected to grant that the one can pass into the other by mere length of development, or that the one can be traced back to the other, merely by being pushed out of sight into dim and distant ages. Their demand for proof that the one ever has passed into the other can certainly not be met by a reference to the general evidence in favor of evolution, for evolution does not necessarily imply the transition in question. There may have been a continuous process of evolution in psychical capacity, from the lowest animal to the highest man; and, if so, it must have been only at some definite point in that evolution that moral distinctions could be recognized, and moral feelings entertained: but, if moral distinctions be in themselves quite different from distinctions of expediency and in expediency, the apprehension of them cannot be said to have been derived out of experiences of expediency and in expediency, merely because these experiences helped to develop intellect to a stage at which it was capable of grasping something higher than themselves. If there be a moral law and moral distinctions, which are quite original and peculiar, a long process of evolution may be required before mind can apprehend them; and yet their apprehension may be no product of the process of evolution, but a thoroughly original and peculiar act, the reflex of the objective reality. Further: general presumptions in favor of evolution do not prove it to be without limits. It may be generally true, and yet have many limits. The distinction between moral and expedient may be one of its limits.

LIT. — The works of AUSTIN, BAIN, BENTHAM, CUMBERLAND, DARWIN, JAMES and JOHN S. MILL, SPENCER, and STEPHEN, already mentioned; JOHN GROTE'S Examination of the Utilitarian Philosophy, 1870; HENRY SIDGWICK'S Methods of Ethics, 1874; F. H. BRADLEY'S Ethical Studies, 1876. GUYAU'S La Morale d'Épicure et ses rapports avec les doctrines contemporaines (1877), and La Morale Anglaise Contemporaine-Morale de l'utilité et de l'évolution (1877), the history of utilitarianism is traced with great fairness, and the various phases of the theory criticised with much penetration.

R. FLINT.

UTRAQUISTS and TABORITES, two religious parties amongst the Bohemians in the fifteenth century. A strong movement in favor of ecclesiastical reform pervaded Bohemia in the fourteenth century, and found a worthy exponent in Hus, whose religious and philosophical ideas were largely derived from the writings of Wiclif. The execution of Hus at Constance set Bohemia in antagonism to the Roman Church, and the outward expression of this antagonism was found in the demand for the reception of the Holy Communion by the laity under both kinds. This demand had been mentioned in the teaching of the Bohemian Reformers, but was put prominently forward by Jakubek of Mies, when Hus was in prison at Constance. The chalice became the Hussite symbol; and the name given to the Hussite party was that of "Utraquist," or "Calixtines." When the religious was began in 1420, the Utraquists put forth their religious aspirations in the Four Articles of Prague. These articles demanded, (1) freedom of preaching, (2) communion under both kinds, (3) the reduction of the clergy to apostolic poverty, (4) severe punishment of all open sins. Their objects were practical, and they asserted the great principles of the Reformation. The first claimed for every man the right to search the Scriptures for himself, the second attacked sacerdotalism, the third cut at the root of ecclesiastical abuses, and the fourth claimed for Christianity the power to regulate society. But these articles were the result of a compromise, and were held in different senses. Parties sprung up amongst the Bohemians. The most moderate party — "The Praguers" as they were called, because they had their seat in the University of Prague — were content with these articles, and wished in all else to hold the orthodox practices. In opposition to this conservative party stood the radicals, who were called "Taborites," from their custom of meeting in the open air on hilltops, to which they gave biblical names, such as Tabor and Oreb. The most moderate of the Taborites were the followers of Zizka, who after his death were called "Orphans." They were more simple in their ritual than the Praguers, but joined the extreme Taborites, chiefly from political reasons. The Taborites proper set aside all ecclesiastical traditions, and stood only upon Scripture, which each man might interpret for himself. They denied transubstantiation, which the Praguers and Orphans held. Besides these were a group of extreme sectaries, Millenarians and Antinomians, who asserted that God existed only in the hearts of the believers. Most notorious of these were the Adamites, who lived a life of nature, which degenerated into shamelessness. They were exterminated by Zizka. The belief that it was a duty to punish sins led to intolerance of one party towards another, and also to great cruelty in war. The Hussite wars are amongst the most bloody which are recorded in history.

The religious zeal of the Bohemians formed the foundation of a military system which enabled them for ten years (1420-30) to defy the armies of Europe. But the Utraquists, though victorious against the enemy, were divided amongst themselves; and peace abroad only brought discord and anarchy at home. Bohemia exhausted itself in warfare, and longed for peace. To the necessity of negotiating with the Utraquists, the Council of Basel owed its existence. In 1433 Bohemian representatives went to a conference with the council. In the discussion of the Four Articles of Prague, the council gradually succeeded in shaking the union of the Utraquists and Taborites. The moderate party favored an agreement with the church; and, when peace was possible, its advocates increased in number. After much negotiation, the Bohemians agreed to be reconciled to the church on the basis of the "Compacts," which defined the sense in which the council accepted the Four Articles of Prague. (1) They admitted freedom of preaching by priests duly commissioned; (2) If the Bohemians received on all other points the faith and ritual of the church, those who had the use of communicating under both kinds might continue to do so with the authority of the church; (3) The clergy and the church might possess temporalities, but were bound to administer them faithfully; (4) Open sins ought to be corrected, but by those who had jurisdiction given them in such matters. It was clear, that, in accepting this compromise, the Utraquists abandoned their position. The Compacts were signed at Iglau in 1436, and were regarded by both sides as a temporary arrangement. The Utraquist leaders hoped to use them as the foundation of a national church: the Catholics regarded them as a peace-offering, to be withdrawn as soon as possible. The Catholics were right in their hopes of a re-action in Bohemia. The extreme Taborites dwindled away: the moderate Utraquists had not a sufficiently strong position from which to withstand the pressure of orthodoxy. The Bohemian movement had been, in the beginning, largely political, — a rising of the Tchecks against the Germans. When its force was spent, it left a church in communion with Rome, which practised a slight deviation in ritual from the common use. Moreover, the permission to exercise this peculiar ritual was given by a council, and received no papal sanction. For some years the Papacy judged it prudent neither to accept nor repudiate the Compacts. The Utraquists strove to consolidate their national church, and set-up Rokycana (q.v.) as its archbishop. The Papacy refused to sanction his appointment, and strove by every means to strengthen the Catholic party in Bohemia. George Podiebrad (q.v.) strove to re-unite Bohemia politically, and saw that this was only possible on the basis of the Compacts. But Pope Pius II. was alarmed at the successes of King George; and in 1462 declared the Compacts to be extinguished, and required George to unite his church with the Church of Rome. The majority of the Bohemians were still attached to Utraquism, and stood by their king against the enemies whom the Pope raised up against him. Utraquism still triumphed, and the machinations of the Catholics were likely to plunge Bohemia into another religious war. But a truce was made at Kutna-Hora in 1485, and the truce developed into a peace. Catholics and Utraquists lived peaceably side by side. Utraquism, however, had by this time lost its meaning, and was merely an empty protest. Its leaders had hoped to find in the Compacts the basis of a national church. The Catholics had been too strong for them: they steadily refused to unite with them. The Utraquists sacrificed their fundamental principles to gain peace, and the demand of the cup for the laity became a meaningless symbol when detached from the rest of the Utraquist beliefs. Yet Utraquism, in its decadence, threw out a sect which was important, — the Brethren of the Law of Christ, or Bohemian Brothers as they were afterwards called (q.v.). To the example and writings of the Utraquists, Luther owed much. But the Utraquists did not at first recognize Lutheranism. When they did, they accepted it entirely, and added nothing of their own. Utraquism vanished, and was absorbed in the full tide of the Reformation.

UYTENBOGAERT (WYTEMBOCARD), Jan, one of the most influential and distinguished leaders of the Remonstrants; b. at Utrecht, Feb. 11, 1557; d. at The Hague, Sept. 21, 1644. He studied in Geneva, under Beza; in 1581 was appointed preacher at Utrecht; deprived of his position in 1589, on account of his friendship for Arminius; appointed preacher at The Hague in 1590, and court-chaplain of Prince Moritz of Orange. He pleaded for a national synod, in which the Remonstrants should have an equal right of speech with the Calvinists, and, with Episcopius and others, met the opponents at The Hague in 1611 to discuss propositions of peace. A decree banishing him, and confiscating his goods, was passed. He fled to France in 1622, and returned in 1626 to Rotterdam, where he lay concealed for a time. In 1629 his goods were restored to him; and in 1631 he preached again at The Hague, but his enemies succeeded in having him silenced. UZZIAH (might of Jehovah), the tenth king of Judah; son of Amaziah and Jecoliah (2 Chron. xxvi. 1, 3); called in 2 Kings (xiv. 21, xv. 1, and elsewhere), except in four places (xv. 13, 30, 32, 34), Azariah (whom Jehovah helps). It is likely that the latter name was given to him in view of his great victories, so evidently the result of divine help. He was sixteen years old, when, by choice of the people, he succeeded his father. He justified this selection. He was a more pious and devoted servant of Jehovah than his father had been. During his reign of fifty-two years the prophets Amos (i. 1), Hosea (i. 1), and Isaiah (i. 1, vi. 1), and possibly Joel flourished. His piety is attributed largely to Zechariah's influence (2 Chron. xxvi. 5). He was warlike and victorious. His army was large, well appointed, and well drilled. He was the first Judite, apparently, to use stone and dart throwing machines (2 Chron. xxvi. 11-15). Under him Judah threw off all dependence upon Israel, the seaport Elath was captured, the Philistines and the Arabians conquered, the fenced cities rebuilt, Jerusalem fortified, towers erected, and wells dug, — the latter because "he had much cattle," and "loved husbandry" (2 Chron. xxvi. 6-10). But, lifted up by his successes, he essayed to usurp the priest's office, and burn incense in the temple. Resisted valiantly by Azariah and eighty other priests, he was effectually stopped in full career by the appearance of leprosy upon his forehead; and he died as a leper in a separate house from the palace, and was buried in the "field of burial." According to the usual chronology, he reigned from 810 to 758 B.C.

VADIAN, the Reformer of St. Gall, properly Joachim von Watt; b. at St. Gall, Switzerland, Dec. 30, 1484; d. there April 6, 1551. He was educated first at home, and then at Vienna, where he met Zwingli; and there he changed his name, according to the pedantic fashion of the time, first to Vadius, and then to Vadianus. His studies took a very wide range, embracing all the learning of the time. His proficiency and versatility are shown by his appointment as professor of the Latin and Greek languages and literature in the university (1510-18), his reception of the degree of doctor in medicine, and from the emperor the laureate's crown. But of more permanent consequence was his study of Luther's writings, in company with his two Swiss friends, Zwingli and Loriti (Glareanus). In 1518 he returned to St. Gall on a visit, but was induced to stay, and be physician to the city. Inbued with the Reformation doctrines, he used his position and influence to introduce them. He was in intimate correspondence with Zwingli, and presided at the conferences held at Zürich (1523) and at Bern (1526). He headed the Reformation party in St. Gall, vigorously opposed the Anabaptists, and in every way played the part of chief. In 1526 his fellow-citizens testified their appreciation of his services by electing him chief magistrate, and again in 1531. He was emphatically the people's friend. He stood by them in time of plague; he entered into their pleasures; he led them in religious thought. He died bewailed by the entire Reformed party. Among his writings is Aphorismorum libri sex de consideratione Eucharistie, Zürich, 1535. See his Life by Pressel, in vol. ix of the series: Väter der reformirten Kirche, Elberfeld, 1861.

HAGENBACH.

VAGANTES (clerici vagantes, or vagi) denotes, in ancient canon law, clerks who had received ordination without at the same time obtaining any office, and who consequently were roaming about in search of employment. Laws against the disgraceful behavior of such clerks were enacted as early as the fourth and fifth centuries; and the Council of Chalcedon (451) forbade, in its Canon 6, to confer an ordinatio absoluta sive vaga without any titulus ordinationis; that is, a general ordination without any corresponding office. Nevertheless, vagantes were soon again met with, especially in countries in which the establishment of Christianity had not yet been completed, or in the vicinity of such missionary fields. As it seldom was possible to appoint the missionary to a definite diocese, and as he was often thrown out of activity by Pagan persecutions or the mere fear of them, the safer neighborhood of the church might often swarm with such missionary bishops and priests, who recognized no jurisdiction of any settled authority, but hung loose on the Christian community, — clerici acephali (ἄκεφαλοι, "without head"). Aggravating circumstances were often added. Not seldom the vagantes had obtained their ordination by simony, and used it as a business opportunity. They hired themselves out to other bishops or priests who were in possession of benefices, and undertook to do the work, according to their idea of it, for a recompense; they entered the service of some rich lord or nobleman as his private chaplain, connecting with that position much underhand business; and sometimes they even became mere tramps. In the Carolingian period complaints of them were very numerous, and Charlemagne twice renewed the prohibition against ordinatio vaga. In the ninth century several councils enacted laws against the vagantes, such as the Concil. Mogunt., 847, and the Concil. Ticinense, 850 (MANZI, xiv pp. 906 and 938); and many bishops were zealous in denouncing them, such as Agobard of Lyons (De privilegio et jure sacerdotii), and Godehard of Hildesheim. (See his Vita, iv. 26.) In the twelfth century the complaints are repeated by Gerhoh of Reichersberg in his De corrupto ecclesie statu, and Adversus Simoniacos. But an effective remedy was finally found. It was enacted that a bishop, if he ordained a person without giving him any office, should support him at his own table, that is, out of his own pocket, until an office could be preserved. This principle was retained by the Council of Trent (1545-63, Sess. 23, c. 23); and the result is, that the Roman-Catholic Church has almost entirely freed itself from a class of pauper clergy. ZÖCKLER.

VALDÉS, Alonso and Juan de, twin-brothers, and strikingly alike both physically and intellectually; were b. at Cuenca, in Castile, about 1500, and educated at the Castilian court. In 1520 Alonso accompanied Charles V. to Germany, and was present at the coronation in Aix-la-Chapelle and at the diet of Worms. After witnessing the burning of Luther's writings, he wrote to Peter Martyr, his friend, "People think that now they are at the end of the tragedy, but I think they are only at the beginning." Having returned to Spain in 1524, he was active as secretary under the chancellor, Arbores da Gattinara, — a Piedmontese, who for a decade was the motive-power in the imperial policy, and made himself noticed by the zeal with which he defended Erasmus against the fury of the Spanish monks. In 1527 he wrote a dialogue between a courtier and an archdeacon, in which he defended the recent seizure of Rome and the Pope by the imperial army under the constable of Bourbon. Though as yet circulating only in manuscript, the dialogue fell into the hands of the papal nuncio, Count Castiglione, who denounced it in a most violent manner to the imperial government; but Alonso was protected by the chancellor. And, just as the embroilment reached its point of culmination, another dialogue appeared between Mercury and Charon. It was written by Juan de Valdés, and was chiefly political; though it also contained some very sharp criticisms on the Church and the papal policy. Both dialogues were first printed in 1529, anonymously; latest edition, 1850. In 1530 Alonso was present at the diet of Augsburg, where he translated the confession of the Lutherans to the emperor, and generally acted as mediator between the opposing parties. He gained the esteem and confidence, not only of Melancthon, but of the Protestants in general; and, indeed, he showed so much sympathy for the Reformation, that he afterwards found it advisable not to return to Spain. In 1531 he was at the imperial court in Brussels, and in 1533 he was still in the service of the emperor; but of his life after that time nothing is known. Juan also found it prudent to keep out of the reach of the Spanish Inquisition. In 1531 he staid in Rome, in intimate intercourse with Sepulveda, the imperial historiographer, and deeply interested in the study of natural science. In 1533 he settled in Naples, and published there in the same year his Diálogo de la lengua (last edition, Madrid, 1860), concerning the origin, history, style, and literary monuments of the Spanish language. In Naples he conversed much with Oehino, Peter Vermigli, etc.; and gradually formed a circle, which, though it never openly attacked the Roman-Catholic Church, stood in decided opposition to the leading principles of its constitution and policy. Juan de Valdés was a theologian both by talent and by study, though he had not enjoyed professional training; and his views on justification, on the authority of the Bible, and the importance of its study, etc., approached often very closely to those of Luther. His Alfabeto Christiano, a dialogue between himself and Giulia Gonzaga, who afterwards entered a Franciscan monastery, was translated into English, London, 1860; [his Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew, and his Spiritual Milk, in 1882.] His principal work is his Considerations, of which the original Spanish text has been only partially preserved. An Italian translation, by C. S. Curione, was translated at Basel, 1550; an English, in London, 1865. His early death, however (1510 or 1511), freed him from falling into the hands of the Italian Inquisition, which was established in 1511; but his influence was felt, for a long time after his decease, in Naples and its neighborhood. [See ED. BOEHMER: Lives of Juan and Alfonso de Valdés, London, 1882, in Commentary above.] ED. BOEHMER.

VALENS, Roman emperor from March 28, 364, to Aug. 9, 379; occupies a conspicuous place in the history of the Church, as the last champion of Arianism among the rulers of the Eastern Empire. Having put down the insurrection of Procopius, a relative of Julian, he prepared for a campaign against the Goths; and one of the preparations he wanted to make was to receive baptism. But the patriarch of Constantinople, Eudoxius, was an Arian; and the Orthodox had, at that moment, not one single church left to them in the capital. Thus the rude and ignorant man, who had no knowledge of the difference between the Nicæan Creed and Arianism, and no sense for such a distinction, fell incidentally into the hands of the heretics. As soon as he returned from his victory over the Goths, persecutions began, not in a systematic way, for Valens was unable to form a general plan and carry it out with consistency, but spasmodically, sporadically, incidentally. In Egypt, which was Orthodox throughout, nothing could be done, as long as Athanasius lived, without running the risk of losing the province; but, when Athanasius died in 373, his successor, Lucius, was an Arian, and shortly after began the massacres in the Nitrian desert. The Arians knew very well that the Orthodox party had its staunchest supporters among the monks, and the monks happened to be specially odious to the taste of the emperor. He repealed the decree which exempted them from military service, and then sent a detachment of soldiers into the desert, where the most wanton cruelties were perpetrated. The impression which Basil the Great made upon the emperor freed Cappadocia from persecutions; but in Antioch, where for a long time he resided, and in other places of Asia Minor, the Orthodox bishops were banished, and abandoned to the Arian mobs. In Constantinople, when Eudoxius died, an Orthodox patriarch, Euagrius, was elected, but was immediately expelled by the emperor, and superseded by an Arian, Demophilus. A deputation of eighty presbyters repaired to the emperor to protest; but he answered them by placing them on board a vessel, which, after reaching open sea, was set on fire. The sources to the reign of Valens are politically Ammianus Marcellinus and Zosimus, and ecclesiastically Theodoret, Socrates, Sozomen, and the three Cappadocian Fathers, — Basil and the two Gregories. H. SCHMIDT.

VALENTINE, St., a Roman presbyter who befriended the martyrs in the persecution of Claudius II., and was in consequence arrested, beaten with clubs, and finally beheaded (Feb. 14, 270). Pope Julius built a church in his honor, near Ponte Molle. Butler says, "To abolish the heathens' lewd, superstitious custom of boys drawing the names of girls in honor of their goddess, Februata Juno, on the 15th of this month, several zealous pastors substituted the names of saints in billets given on this day" (Feb. 14). Lives of Saints, Feb. 14. There was, therefore, originally no connection between the saint and the custom of St. Valentine's Day; but the custom is far older, probably of pre-Christian origin.

VALENTINIAN III. (Roman emperor 425-455) issued in 445 an edict which recognized the Bishop of Rome as the primate of the whole Christian Church, holding the highest judicial and legislative power in all church matters. The edict concerned, of course, only the West. The idea of the emperor was, that a strongly monarchical church constitution might form a band around the provinces of the Western Empire, now evidently falling asunder.

VALENTINUS, St. There are quite a number of saints of this name, — a presbyter of Rome, a bishop of Interamna an African, and a Belgian martyr, etc. (See Act. Sanct., Feb. 13, March 16, April 14 and 29, etc.) But the most important is the apostle of Rhoetia, the reputed bishop of Passau, and one of the first Christian missionaries active in south-eastern Germany. The first notice of him is found in the life of St. Severinus, in Pez (Script. Rer. Austriacar., i. p. 86), according to which he preached in Tyrol in the first half of the fifth century, and died Jan. 6. Venantius Fortunatus tells us that many churches in those regions were dedicated to him. Aribio, in his Vita Corbiniani (730), states that he was buried at Matsch, in the Tyrolean Alps, whence his bones were brought to Trent. In 768 the Bavarian duke, Thassilo, brought them to Passau. His acts (Act. Sanct., Jan. 7) date from the eleventh century. ZÖCKLER.

VALENTINUS THE GNOTIC. See GNOSTICISM.

VALERIAN (Roman emperor 253-259) showed himself quite friendly to the Christians in the beginning of his reign, but instituted in 257 a most violent persecution of them. Like the Decian persecution, it was principally directed against the bishops and the leaders generally of the church. The first edict simply forbade them to hold meetings and celebrate service; the second ordered all who disobeyed to be sent to work in the mines; and the third, of 258, enacted that all bishops, presbyters, and deacons should be put to death. Sixtus of Rome, and Cyprian of Carthage, fell as victims. But in 259 Valerian was defeated and taken prisoner by King Sapor; and his son and successor, Gallienus, immediately put an end to the persecution. See EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., VII. 10; CYPRIAN: Epp., 82, 83. ZÖCKLER.

VALERIAN, St., was Bishop of Cemele, a see belonging under the archbishop of Embrodumum, and situated in the Maritime Alps, but by Leo I. removed to Nizza. He flourished in the fifth century; was present at the synod of Riez, 439; signed the letter of the Gallican bishops to Leo I., 451 (see Leo: Opp., i. pp. 998 and 1110); and sided with the monks of Lérins in their controversy with the neighboring bishops. His writings (twenty-nine sermons of ascetic contents, and an Epistola ad monachos) were edited by Sirmond (Paris, 1612) and Raynauld (Lyons, 1633), and reprinted by MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., iii. ZÖCKLER.

VALESIUS, Henri de Valois, b. in Paris, Sept. 10, 1603; d. there May 7, 1676. He was educated in the Jesuit College at Verdun, and studied law at Bourges, but abandoned the juridical career, and devoted himself entirely to literary studies, enjoying, in the latter part of his life, a pension from Louis XIV. and the title of royal historiographer. He published critical editions of Ammianus Marcellinus (1636), Eusebius (1659), Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, etc. His life was written by his brother, Paris, 1677. See also Valesiana, Paris, 1691. NEUDECKER.

VALLA. See LAURENTIUS VALLA.

VALLOMBROSA, The Order of, a branch of the Benedictines; was founded in 1039 by Johannes Gualbertus in a valley of the Apennines, whence its name. The order, which never reached any considerable extension, was the first to introduce lay-brothers (conversi, in distinction to patres) in order to make it possible for the monks to keep the vows of silence and seclusion.

VANDALS (Vandali, Wandali, Vindili). The Vandals lived for a long time unnoticed in the present Lusatia. They appear for the first time in history, as the companions of the Marcomanni and other Danubian tribes, fighting with Marcus Aurelius. Later on they re-appear on the frontiers of Dacia, as the companions of the Goths and Gepids, fighting with Probus. Probus, however, induced them to settle in Dacia; and there they lived for a long time, unnoticed and peaceful, learning various arts of civilization, and adopting Christianity in its Arian form. In 406 they again began to move, probably on the instigation of Stilicho. In company with the Alani and Suevi they fell upon Gaul, and spread confusion and devastation from the Rhine to the Pyrenees. In 409 they crossed the Pyrenees, and founded a kingdom in Andalusia (Vandalitia). In 428 Genseric became their king, and under his leadership the tribe becomes of interest to church history.

Boniface, the Roman governor of Africa, rebelled, and asked for aid from Genseric. Genseric crossed over to Africa at the head of a motley crowd of fifty thousand Vandals, Alani, Goths, and Suevi, and conquered Mauritania and Numidia. Meanwhile Boniface had been reconciled with the government in Rome, through the mediation of St. Augustine; and he now wished to send back Genseric to Spain, but that proved impossible. In a very short time the whole Roman province of Africa was conquered, and the Vandals settled there as masters. Hippo was taken in 430; Carthage, in 439. Ten years later on the Vandal fleets swept the whole western part of the Mediterranean; and the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, Majorca, etc., were conquered. In 455 Genseric entered Rome, and from June 14 to 29 the city was given up to plunder. The Vandals in Rome, however, were not worse than the Vandals at home. Africa was devastated with a recklessness and cruelty which probably have no parallels in history. As Arians, the Vandals hated the Catholics; and the African Church, the most flourishing and influential branch of the Latin Church, was so completely undermined by their violence and cruelty, that it never recovered. Genseric closed or destroyed the church buildings, and confiscated all church property. The bishops and priests were banished, sent to the mines, tortured, beheaded, burnt. Rich and distinguished laymen were seized, fined, bereft of all their property, tortured, sold as slaves. Not only Italy, but also the Eastern provinces of the empire, swarmed with refugees from Africa. After the occupation of Carthage, the bishop, Quodvultdeus, and most of the clergy of the city, were stripped naked, and placed on an old rickety raft, which was set adrift on the open sea: fortunately it landed on the coast of Campania.

Under Genseric's son, Huneric (477-486), the persecutions abated for a short time, but then began again more violent than ever. He convened a council at Carthage in 484, under the presidency of Cyrilla, the Arian patriarch of the Vandals. The very arrangement showed the spirit of the undertaking. The Arian bishops were seated on elevated thrones, while the Catholic bishops were huddled together before a judgment-bar like criminals. Some ventured to remonstrate, but they were immediately brought to silence by one hundred lashes each. The result of the council was an edict which ordered all to conform to the Arian faith before June 1, same year. 80 bishops died under the torture, 46 were sent to work in the mines of Corsica, 302 fled into the desert. Again a period of peace intervened during the reign of Gundamund (486-496); but Trasamund (496-523) started the persecutions anew: 120 bishops, among whom was the celebrated Fulgentius from Ruspe, were banished to Sardinia. It was of no avail that Hilderic (523-531) allowed the Catholic bishops to return to their congregations, nor that Belisarius, the general of Justinian, reconquered Africa, and re-established the Catholic Church (531): the Vandal dominion had lasted long enough to annihilate almost every trace of Roman civilization, and to destroy almost completely the Christian Church in Africa.

VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY, located at Nashville, Tenn., is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and owes its existence to the munificence of Cornelius Vanderbilt of New York, who on the 27th of March, 1873, made, through Bishop H. N. McTycire (whom he named as president of the Board of Trust for life), a donation of five hundred thousand dollars; which amount he subsequently increased to one million. It has also received from Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, son of the founder, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and from other sources about seventy-five thousand. It has an endowment of nearly seven hundred thousand dollars. The buildings are commodious and well equipped; and the grounds, located on an eminence in the suburbs of the city, and consisting of seventy-five acres, are ample and beautiful. The university is organized into six distinct departments (academic, biblical, legal, medical, pharmaceutical, and dental), with a chancellor and forty-two professors and instructors. It enrolled on its last catalogue (1881-82) 603 students. It is the largest and best endowed denominational institution of learning in the South. W. F. TILLET.

VAN DOREN, William Howard, D.D., b. in Orange County, N.Y., March 2, 1810; d. at Indianapolis, Ind., Friday, Sept. 8, 1882. He was graduated at Columbia College, N.Y., and at the Western Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1832; taught until 1836, when he was licensed by the Louisville presbytery. For two years he was a missionary in Mississippi. In 1839 he entered the regular pastorate, and served in the Reformed Church, East Brooklyn, N.Y. (1839-51), in the mission which ultimately became the 34th-Street Reformed Church, and in the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis. In 1865 he removed to Chicago, and there began the preparation of his Suggestive Commentary on the New Testament, on an Original Plan, of which have appeared Luke (New York, 1863, 2 vols.), John (1879, 2 vols.), Romans (1870, 2 vols.). In 1875 he removed to Indianapolis. His Commentary is homiletical, and has been widely used.

VANE, Sir Henry, often called "Sir Harry Vane," was b. in 1612. His father was a statesman in the reign of James I. and Charles I., but lost court-favor by his opposition to Lord Strafford. Young Henry imbibed republican principles, probably strengthened by his Swiss travels, and in 1635 visited New England, when he was chosen governor of Massachusetts. The following year he returned home, and commenced a career which made him distinguished in the history of his country. He took part in all the important questions discussed by the new Parliament, and promoted the impeachment of Laud, and the adoption of the Solemn League and Covenant. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly, and a commissioner at the treaties of Uxbridge and the Isle of Wight. But he had little sympathy with Oliver Cromwell, either in his military or political views, being a staunch republican, and thinking more of the power of the tongue and the pen than of the sword and the musket. Cromwell was thoroughly practical, but Vane was a determined theorist. Cromwell was both soldier and statesman; Vane, little more than a dreamy philosopher. Vane, however, became one of the Council of State after the execution of Charles I. in 1649, and in that capacity, and as a member of Parliament, greatly displeased his colleague, who denounced him as "a juggling fellow," and exclaimed, as he broke up the House of Commons in 1653, "The Lord deliver me from Sir Harry Vane!" His book entitled A Healing Question Propounded and Resolved, published in 1656, so incensed the lord-protector, that he imprisoned the author in Carisbrooke Castle, Isle of Wight. Cromwell then tried gentle means to win over his intellectual antagonist, but in vain. The latter preferred, in his noble retreat at Raby, in the County of Durham, those speculative studies, which he always pursued with great mental earnestness, to any participation in public affairs during Oliver's protectorate. Vane's advocacy of republicanism afterwards was utterly in vain; and upon the restoration of Charles II. he was indicted for "compassing and imagining the death" of that monarch. He pleaded justly, that what he had done during the Commonwealth was no breach of the statute of treason, as that statute applied to a king regnant, not to him who could only claim to be one de jure. Charles wrote to the lord-chancellor, saying that "Vane is too dangerous a man to let live, if one can honestly put him out of the way." He was put out of the way by being beheaded June 14, 1662. His behavior on the scaffold was very noble, and his character has been eulogized by his admiring biographer, John Foster, in his Statesmen of the Commonwealth of England. Vane's Retired Man's Meditations, and his England's Remembrancer, contain many eloquent passages; but the tone of the latter is very violent. JOHN STOUGHTON.

VARIOUS READINGS are the differences in the text between the various manuscripts, translations, and patristic quotations of the Scriptures. In the case of the Bible manuscripts they are mostly accidental, arising from the scribe's not reading his copy correctly, or not hearing correctly when the passage was dictated to him, or, perhaps, from simple carelessness; such as copying the margin into the text, repeating a phrase or part of one. A few intentional variations have been claimed; but they are unimportant, and affect rather the form than the substance of the text. The various readings in the New-Testament manuscripts are in the aggregate very numerous. In Mill's time they were estimated at thirty thousand, and subsequent comparison has increased the number to about one hundred and fifty thousand. The statement once occasioned great alarm; but now it is generally understood that the variations are slight in the vast majority of cases, — mere differences in spelling, in the order of words, reduplication, etc.,—and that no doctrine is affected. In regard to the Old-Testament manuscripts the case is different. The source of the various readings is the same, but their number is very much less. The Hebrew manuscripts were copied by an official class, under strict regulations; and many deviations from the standard text occasioned rejection of the scribes' work. So the number of Hebrew variations is very small, being not more than 2,000. See BIBLE TEXT, pp. 263, 267, 270, 274; KERI and KETHIBH.

VASSAR COLLEGE, located at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., was incorporated by the General Assembly in January, 1861. It was founded by Matthew Vassar (b. in East Dereham, Norfolk, Eng., April 29, 1792; d. at Poughkeepsie, June 23, 1868), who had acquired a fortune by his own exertions, and, being childless, resolved "to found and perpetuate an institution which should accomplish for young women what our colleges are accomplishing for young men." By gift and bequest he placed in the hands of its trustees funds amounting to about $778,000. The whole property of the college now (1883) amounts to $1,149,572.57; of which $128,748.57 is in productive funds, $125,000 of this last amount being in funds for scholarships, and but $80,000 in endowments for instruction.

Its faculty consists of a president, a lady principal in charge of the domestic life of the students, and seven professors in the different departments of collegiate instruction. The departments of art and music are also in charge of two professors. There are also twenty teachers distributed in the several departments.

The course of study is similar to that in colleges for men. It is prescribed to the middle of the sophomore year; after that, elective under the regulation of the faculty. Latin is required, and one other language, which may be Greek, German, or French. Each student may take simultaneously three studies. It was found necessary in the beginning to provide for a preparatory course; and, though it is still continued, it is regarded as provisional and temporary. The degree of A. B. is granted to students who complete the collegiate course of four years. The degree of A. M. is granted to graduates who pass examination in studies approved by the faculty as equivalent to a post-graduate course of two full years. Twenty-three graduates have received this degree. No honorary degrees have been conferred. A diploma is granted in the schools of art and music to students who complete the full course of three years. The whole number of graduates is above 550. The annual charge for each student is $400.

The college opened to receive students in September, 1863, under the presidency of John H. Raymond, LL. D., who continued in office till his decease, in August, 1878. He was immediately succeeded by Samuel L. Caldwell, D. D., who is now in office. The whole number of students enrolled in its different departments for the first seventeen years has been over 6,000. It has a library of over 11,000 volumes; an astronomical observatory and a chemical laboratory, both amply equipped; cabinets of natural history valued at over $30,000; an art gallery of equal value; and a large and commodious building for the residence of students and instructors. The founder designed that the college should be entirely Christian, though unsectarian. S. L. CALDWELL.

VASSY, a town of France, in the department of Haute-Marne, on the Blaise; is famous in history as the place where the Duke of Guise, on his way to Paris, allowed his retinue to fall upon and massacre a Protestant congregation celebrating service in a large barn. This Massacre of Vassy (March 1, 1562) formed the occasion for the beginning of the religious wars in France.

VATABLUS, or VATABLE, VATEBLE, VASTE-BLED, QUASTEBLED, François, b. at Gamaches in Picardy, date unknown; d. as abbot of Bellezane, March 16, 1547; was by Francis I. appointed professor of Hebrew in the Collège de France in Paris, and attracted great audiences by his learning and his brilliant talent as a lecturer. He published nothing; but, in his edition of the Latin Bible of Leo Judæ, Robert Stephens published in 1515 a number of notes, which he pretended to have derived from the lectures of Vatablus. As, however, the notes in many cases are identical with those of Calvin, Fagius, and other Protestant commentators, it is probable that Robert Stephens sometimes used the name of Vatablus for the purpose of smuggling Protestant ideas into the Roman-Catholic studies. If so, he did not succeed. The Sorbonne condemned the notes; and not only he himself, but also Vatablus, was exposed to persecution. ARNOLD.

VATER, Johann Severin, b. at Altenburg, May 27, 1771; d. at Halle, March 15, 1826. He studied theology and philology at Jena and Halle, and was appointed professor of theology in the latter place in 1799. In 1810 he removed to Königsberg, but in 1820 he again returned to Halle. His grammatical works have considerable merit, and were much used, especially his Hebrew grammar. Of his theological works the most noted are his Commentary on the Pentateuch, his Synchronistische Tabellen der Kirchengeschichte, Halle, 1803, often reprinted, and his continuation of Henke's church history (1823). His stand-point was that of a moderate rationalism. ARNOLD.

VATICAN COUNCIL, the last oecumenical council of the Roman-Catholic Church. It was held in the Church of St. Peter, in Rome, from Dec. 8, 1869, to July 18 (or Oct. 20), 1870, but is not yet completed, and may be reconvened by the Pope, as the Council of Trent, which lasted, with interruptions, from 1543 to 1563. It is the twentieth in the Roman series of oecumenical councils, according to Bishop Hefele, who was himself a member of it. (See his Conciliengeschichte, vol. i. pp. 59 sq., of the second and revised German edition, 1873.) Bellarmine (De conc., lib. 1, c. 5) and the majority of Roman divines and canonists count the Council of Trent as the eighteenth, and this would make the Vatican the nineteenth. The difference arises from the disputed oecumenicity of the reformatory councils of Pisa (1409), Constance (1414), and Basel (1430), which are rejected by many in whole or in part. Hefele excludes Pisa, but accepts several decrees of Constance and Basel as oecumenical. The Old Catholics, under the lead of Dollinger, denied the oecumenical character of the Vatican Council; but they were excommunicated. It is as authoritative for the Roman Church as that of Trent. It marks the most important event in the doctrinal history of that church since the sixteenth century, and completes the system of papal absolutism. The Council of Trent was convened for the settlement of the questions raised by the Reformation, and ended with the condemnation of the Protestant or evangelical doctrines. The Vatican Council was convened for the condemnation of modern rationalism and liberalism within the Roman Church, and for the settlement of the question of final authority.

It was summoned by Pope Pius IX., in the twenty-third year of his pontificate, by an encyclical letter (Eterni Patris unigenitus Filius), June 29, 1868, solemnly opened Dec. 8, 1869, and indefinitely postponed Oct. 20, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German war, which broke out immediately after the passage of the Infallibility Decree (July 18), and ended in the destruction of the temporal power of the Papacy, and the establishment of the German Empire with a Protestant head, — the king of Prussia. The attendance was the largest known in the history of councils, and reached the number of 761 out of 1,037 dignitaries who are entitled to a seat and vote in an œcumenical synod of the papal communion. But, after the outbreak of the war, it dwindled down to 200 or 180. The Italians had a vast majority of 276, of whom 143 belonged to the former Papal States alone. The French and German bishops were weak in number, but strongest in learning and the importance of the dioceses which they represented. The deliberations were conducted in strict secrecy, but four public sessions were held for the solemn proclamation of the results.

The subject-matter of the council was divided into four parts. — faith, discipline, religious orders, and rites (including missions); and each part was assigned to a special commission (congregatio, or deputatio), consisting of twenty-six prelates, with a presiding cardinal appointed by the Pope. The decrees were prepared on the basis of schœmata previously drawn up by learned divines and canonists, discussed, revised, adopted in secret sessions by the general congregations, and then solemnly proclaimed in public sessions in the presence and by the authority of the Pope. The management was entirely in the hands of the Pope and his cardinals and advisers (Jesuits). The proceedings were conducted in Latin, the official language of the Roman Church.

The doctrinal results of the council are embodied in two sets of decrees, — the first against infidelity, the second against Gallicanism.

(1) "The decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Catholic faith" were unanimously adopted in the third public session, April 24, 1870. They are directed against modern rationalism, pantheism, materialism, and atheism, and set forth the orthodox doctrine of God, the creation, and the relation of faith to reason. The Roman Civiltà Cattolica praised these decrees as "a reflex of the wisdom of God;" the Paris L'Univers, as "a masterpiece of clearness and force;" Cardinal Manning, as "the broadest and boldest affirmation of the supernatural and spiritual order ever yet made in the face of the world." But, during the discussion, a Swiss prelate declared the schema de fide a work of supererogation, and said, "What is the use of condemning errors which have been long condemned, and tempt no Catholic? The false beliefs of mankind are beyond the reach of your decrees. The best defence of Catholicism is religious science. Encourage sound learning, and prove by deeds as well as words that it is the mission of the Church to promote, among the nations, liberty, light, and true prosperity." Bishop Strossmayer from the Turkish frontier, the boldest and most liberal member of the council, attacked the preamble to the scheme which made Protestantism responsible for modern infidelity, and said, "Protestants abhor these errors as much as Catholics. The germ of rationalism existed in the Catholic Church before the Reformation, and bore its worst fruits in the midst of a Catholic nation at the time of Voltaire and the Encyclopédistes. Catholics produced no better refutation of the errors to be condemned than Leibnitz and Guizot."

(2) Far more important are the "decrees on the dogmatic constitution of the Church of Christ," or the decrees of papal absolutism and infallibility, which agitated the council for several months, and, after a vigorous opposition and the departure of the anti-infallibilist bishops, passed, with two dissenting votes, in the fourth public session, July 18, 1870. This is the crowning act of the council, on which its historical significance rests. The question of papal jurisdiction and authority in relation to the general episcopate and the authority of an œcumenical council, had been left open by the Council of Trent, and was a subject of dispute for three hundred years between Gallicans and Ultramontanes, Jansenists and Jesuits, constitutional monarchists and absolute monarchists, until it was brought to final rest within that church. Ultramontanism and Jesuitism achieved a complete triumph over a powerful minority of liberal bishops, who at last gave up in despair, left Rome before the vote, and then submitted, one by one, to the decision of the council for the sake of unity and peace, which they esteemed higher than their personal conviction and the facts of history. Even Hefele, Kendrick, and Strossmayer submitted, and had to do so, or deny the infallibility of an œcumenical council, and share the fate of the Old Catholics. The council decided that the Roman pontiff has an ordinary episcopal authority and immediate jurisdiction over all the Catholic churches and dioceses; that he is the bishop of bishops; and that all bishops are simply his vicars, as he himself is the vicar of Christ; moreover, that the Roman pontiff, whenever he speaks ex cathedra, i.e., in his official capacity, to the Catholic world on any question of faith or morals, is infallible, and that his decisions are irreformable, that is, absolutely final and irreversible in and of themselves, even without the consent of an œcumenical council. VATICAN, Palace of the, the residence of the Pope. It is on the right bank of the Tiber, in that part of Rome called the "Leonine City," and on the Vatican Hill. It is not one building, but a group of buildings, dating from different periods; but as such it is the largest palace in the world, 1151 feet long by 767 wide, containing a number of rooms variously estimated at from 4,122 to 16,000. The name "Vatican" is from vates, a prophet, because the district was believed to have been the site of Etruscan divination. The name was once given to the whole district between the foot of the Vatican Hill and the Tiber, near St. Angelo. It was considered an unhealthy locality. In it was the Circus of Caligula, decorated by the obelisk which now stands in front of St. Peter's. It afterwards became the Circus of Nero; and in his gardens on the Vatican Hill he put to death many Christians ("an immense multitude," says Tacitus) on the groundless charge of setting fire to Rome, and in awful mockery nailed them, clad in garments dipped in pitch, upon stakes, and set fire to them. The apostle Peter is said to have been crucified there.

The earliest residence of the popes at Rome was the Lateran. But Symmachus (498-514) built a palace on the Vatican, near old St. Peter's; and in it Charlemagne is said to have resided when in Rome, during the pontificates of Adrian I. (772-795) and Leo III. (795-816). Innocent III. (1198-1216) rebuilt the palace, which had fallen into decay; and Nicholas III. (1277-81) greatly enlarged it, and it was used for state receptions, and by kings visiting Rome. When the papal schism was healed, and the popes returned from Avignon, the Vatican was chosen as the papal residence, because its nearness to St. Angelo made it safer than the Lateran, and it has ever so continued to be. The first conclave was held there in 1378. The present Vatican Palace is the work of several popes. John XXIII. (1410-17) joined it to St. Angelo by a covered passage. Nicholas V. (1447-55) began the work of its enlargement and adornment with the "Tor di Borgia," which Alexander VI. (1492-1503) finished. Sixtus IV. (1471-84) in 1473 built the Sistine Chapel. Innocent VIII. (1484-92) in 1490 built the Belvedere as a garden house. Julius II. (1503-13) united it to the palace by a courtyard, which Sixtus V. (1585-90) divided in two by the library-building. This latter pope began the present papal residence proper, and it was finished by Clement VIII. (1592-1605). The apartments occupied by the Pope are very plain. Immediately above them are the rooms of the cardinal secretary of state.

Of all the parts of the Vatican, the Sistine Chapel, built by Baccio Pintelli in 1473, is probably the most famous, by reason of the ceiling and the altar-wall, frescoed by Michael Angelo (1475-1564), who did the former in 1508-09, and the latter 1533-41. Upon the ceiling he put those wonderful pictures from the Old Testament, — from the first day of creation to the intoxication of Noah, and the prophets Jonah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Joel, Daniel, Isaiah, and Zechariah, and the sibyls Persica, Erythræa, Libyca, Cumæa, and Delphica. Upon the altar-wall is the famous fresco, The Last Judgment. The loggie and the stanze, different parts of the Vatican, are associated with the wonderful genius of Raphael, who painted them, and drew designs for them.

The Vatican includes the greatest collection of antique statuary in the world; and, although its paintings are said to be only fifty in number, among them are Domenichino's Communion of St. Jerome, Raphael's Madonna di Foligno and Transfiguration, and Titian's Madonna and Saints. The Vatican Library contains 23,580 Greek, Latin, and Oriental manuscripts, but under 50,000 printed volumes. The books and manuscripts are hidden from sight to the tourist, behind locked cases; but permission can be obtained, by the use of due influence, to examine the books. Most precious of the treasures of the library is the Codex Vaticanus designated B. It is written on seven hundred and fifty-nine leaves of very fine vellum (the New Testament covers a hundred and forty-two of them), in small but clear and neat uncial letters, in three columns of forty-two lines each to a page, ten inches by ten inches and a half. It is more accurately written than the Codex Sinaiticus, and probably is a little older, but not so complete. It dates from the fourth century. It was apparently copied in Egypt by two or three skilful scribes. It contains the Septuagint version of the Old Testament (with a few gaps and the omission of Maccabees), and the New Testament as far as Heb. ix. 14. The manuscript was brought to Rome shortly after the establishment of the library (1448), and appears in the earliest catalogue (1475). It was carried to Paris by Napoleon I., but restored after his fall. For further information, see BIBLE TEXT, p. 270; SCHAFF: Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 113 sqq.

But the treasures of the Vatican Library are not only biblical, but also classical and literary. These have not been examined as they should be. On the general subject of the Vatican Palace, see particularly HARE'S Walks in Rome.

VATKE, Johann Karl Wilhelm, b. in Belmdorf, near Magdeburg, March 14, 1806; d. at Berlin, April 19, 1882. He was privatdocent in theology at Berlin from 1830 to 1837, when he became extraordinary professor. He wrote Die Religion des Alten Testaments, Berlin, 1835, — the first part of a comprehensive work upon biblical theology, which was never finished. On account of the liberal views expressed and advocated in this book, he was debarred from becoming full professor. Vatke is one of the writers who first developed the present Wellhausen views of the Old Testament. His especial contribution related to the Pentateuchal regulations respecting offerings, which he declared were post-exilic; for before that time sacrifices were not regulated by law, and did not differ essentially from the heathen sacrifices, except that they were offered to Jehovah, and not to Baal or Molech. See art. OFFERINGS. Besides the book mentioned, he wrote Die menschliche Freiheit in ihrem Verhältniss zur Sünde und zur göttlichen Gnade, Berlin, 1841. He was a Hegelian. Benecke wrote his life, 1883.

VAUD CANTON (Switzerland), Free Church of the. In consequence of the abrogation of the Helvetic Confession and the practical subjection of the Church to the State, determined upon (1839) by the supreme council of the Vaud Canton, a strong desire for freedom and independence was excited among the clergy of the canton. In 1845 the radicals held control, and forbade all ministers of the Established Church to take part in the services of the Monniers, who had been forbidden to meet (1824), but were at work in the canton. Forty-three ministers refused to read the proclamation from their pulpits. The offenders were punished; but the result of the high-handed measures was the formation of the Free Church (Eglise libre évangélique), Nov. 11, 12, 1845. This church now (1883) numbers about four thousand members, under the care of forty-six pastors. Its support is derived exclusively from voluntary contributions. VAUGHAN, Henry, self-styled "The Silurist;" b. at Newton St. Bridget, in South Wales, 1621; d. there April 23, 1695; studied with his twin-brother Thomas at Jesus College, Oxford; went to London; acquired a medical degree; was imprisoned as a royalist; returned to Newton, and practised as a physician. He wrote in prose The Mount of Olives (1652) and Flores Solitudinis (1654); and in verse, Poems, with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englished (1646), Olor Iscanus (1650), Silex Scintillans (two parts, 1650-51), and Thalia Relioiva (1678). Parts of the last-named were reprinted with Silex Scintillans, and a biographical sketch by the poet H. F. Lyte, 1847, and again, 1858, in an edition now well known: on them his reputation chiefly rests. Vaughan admired and followed Herbert, and ranks next to him among the poets of that school, Archbishop Trench even preferring the disciple to his master; though Campbell thought him "one of the harshest, even of the inferior order of the school of conceit." His verses, long neglected, are appreciated now, as embodying genius and devotion, which sometimes rise to the loftiest flights. F. M. BIRD.

VAUGHAN, Robert, D.D., b. in Wales, 1795; was distinguished by a pre-eminent love for the study of history, of which he gave indication, when a boy of twelve, by the purchase of Raleigh's History of the World for half a guinea, which he had received as a birthday present. With few early advantages, he devoted himself to reading, and so laid a foundation for subsequent acquirements. In 1819 he entered the ministry, in connection with the Congregational body, as pastor of a church in the cathedral city of Worcester, and continued there for six years, working hard both in the study and in the pulpit. At the end of that period he accepted a call to Kensington, the court suburb of London, and there made a deep impression by his thoughtful and earnest exposition of the truths of Christianity, gathering round him persons of rank and of superior culture. In a few years his attainments procured for him the chair of modern history in the newly founded university of London; and in 1843 he was invited to the principalship of Lancashire College, — a rising institution just removed from Blackburn. In his new sphere he made his presence felt, not only by his influence over the students, but by his occasional sermons, and especially by his speeches at Manchester, in the outskirts of which city the college had been erected. He was decidedly a platform orator, and displayed more ability in that way than by his pulpit discourses, superior as they were generally acknowledged to be. He resigned his principalship in 1857, and retired to the town of Uxbridge, near London, undertaking the care of a small church in that place. He subsequently removed to St. John's Wood, and in 1867 went down to Torquay to preside over a newly formed congregation. There he died June 15, 1868. He was chairman of the Congregational Union in 1846, and visited America in 1865 as a delegate from that body. He is best known by his numerous works, especially his Life and Opinions of Wycliffe, in two volumes, 1828, and his Monograph of the Reformer, 1853. He was editor of the British Quarterly from its commencement in 1845 down to the year 1866. He delivered in 1834 the congregational lecture entitled Causes of the Corruption of Christianity, and published A History of England under the House of Stuart, 1840, also Revolutions in History, 3 vols., 1859-63. His publications altogether were very numerous.

VEHMIC COURT (Vehmgericht, a word of uncertain etymology, but probably allied to the Dutch ven, an "association," a "brotherhood") was the name of a peculiar judicial institution, which, according to tradition, was founded by Charlemagne and Leo III., and continued to exist, at least nominally, in Westphalia down to the present century, when it was suppressed (in 1811) by Jerome Bonaparte. The tribunal was composed of free men of spotless character, but not necessarily belonging to any certain social rank or state: both the emperor and the peasant could be members. The presence of seven members was necessary in order to form the court. When Duke Heinrich of Bavaria was sentenced (in 1434), over eight hundred members were present. The court took cognizance of all kinds of cases, and summoned all kinds of persons — with the exception of ecclesiastics, Jews, and women—to appear before it. Its sittings were partly public,—held under open sky,—partly secret; and its verdicts were executed by its own members. In the early middle ages, when might was right, and the will of the strong the only law in power, the Vehmic Court was an institution of great value; but, when the State became able to maintain its laws, the Vehmic Court became superfluous, and at the same time it degenerated into an outrageous tyranny. In the fifteenth century several emperors tried to circumscribe its authority, and alter its character; and in the sixteenth century it held its last open session. See WIGAND: Geschichte der Vehmgerichte, Wetzlar, 1847; WALTER: Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte, Bonn, 1857, ii. 632; comp. art. by H. F. JACOBSON, in 1st ed. of Herzog, vol. xvii. pp. 52–64.

VEIL is the translation of the Authorized Version for words properly meaning mantles or shawls in Gen. xxiv. 65, xxxviii. 14, 19; Ruth iii. 15; Cant. v. 7; Isa. iii. 23. Veils were rarely used among the Hebrews, the Egyptians, or Assyrians, as is abundantly proved by the absence of allusion to them in the writings of the first, and by the pictures upon the monuments of the last two nations. Women in the Bible lands to-day are never seen in public without a veil, or an apology for one; but the practice dates from Mohammed.

VEIL, Taking the, the ceremony of reception into a nunnery. On her first profession, the woman takes the “white veil,” and thus enters upon her year’s novitiate. If she still desire to become a nun, she takes the “black veil,” and pronounces the irrevocable vows.

VELLUM is a fine kind of parchment, which is made of sheep and other skins.

VENATORIUS, Thomas, b. at Nuremberg, about 1488; d. there Feb. 4, 1551. He studied mathematics, classical literature, and theology, and entered then the order of the Dominicans. But in 1520 he embraced the Reformation, was appointed preacher at St. Jacob’s in his native city, and contributed much to the establishment of Protestantism there. He wrote Axiomata rerum christianarum (1526), Defensio pro baptismo (1527), etc.; but his principal work is his De virtute christiana (1529), the first attempt at a Protestant ethics. E. VENCE, Henri François de, b. at Pareid about 1675; d. at Nancy Nov. 1, 1749. He studied theology in the Sorbonne; was for several years tutor in the house of Leopold of Lorraine, and became afterwards provost of the cathedral of Nancy. He was a good Hebrew scholar; and a series of essays he wrote were incorporated with the edition of 1718–50 of the Bible of Calmet, 14 vols. in quarto, whence that edition is often called La Bible de Vence.

VENEMA, Hermann, Dutch divine; b. at Wildervank, 1697; d. at Franeker, 1787, where he was professor of theology, and university preacher. He wrote voluminously. See list in WINER and in DARLING. His Institutes of Theology was translated by Rev. A. W. Brown, Edinburgh, 1850.

VENERABLE is the title of an archdeacon in the Church of England.

VENERABLE BEDE, The. See BEDE.

VENI, CREATOR SPIRITUS, an old church hymn, of unknown authorship, ascribed to Charlemagne, but with more reason to Gregory the Great (Mone). It is so highly prized in the Latin Church, that it is sung on the most solemn occasions; such as the election of a pope, the coronation of a king, etc. It has theological value as a pronounced statement of the procession of the Holy Spirit from both the Father and the Son. On this account it is emphatically the hymn of Pentecost. It is part of the office of consecration of bishops and ordaining of priests. There are several English translations. The two most commonly found in our hymn-books begin, “Come, O Creator Spirit blest,” translated by Rev. Edward Caswall in 1849, and “Come, Holy Ghost, all quickening fire,” translated by Bishop John Cosin in 1627.

VENI, SANCTE SPIRITUS, a sequence extant about A.D. 1000, and ascribed to Robert II. of France (972–1031), translated by Ray Palmer in 1858, “Come, Holy Ghost in love.” See ROBERT II., SEQUENCES.

VENN, Henry, a devout and evangelical preacher of the Church of England in a period of general ministerial indifference; the son of a clergyman; was b. at Barnes in Surrey, March 2, 1724; d. at Yelling, Huntingdonshire, June 24, 1797. Taking his bachelor’s degree in Jesus College, Cambridge, 1745, he became fellow of Queen’s College, 1749. After holding several curacies, he became curate of Clapham, 1754; vicar of Huddersfield, Yorkshire, 1759, whence he removed in 1771, to become vicar of Yelling. Henry Venn stands alongside of the foremost workers in the Christian ministry in England of the eighteenth century. He was upon intimate terms with Whitefield and Lady Huntingdon, who had an important share in bringing him to a pure knowledge of the gospel. His sympathies were broad and evangelical. According to Bishop Ryle, the best memorial sermon over Whitefield was the one he preached in Lady Huntingdon’s chapel at Bath. At Huddersfield, a large and immoral manufacturing town, he leavened the irreligious mass with gospel truth, and was among the first to carry the gospel with success to the manufacturing classes. He was an indefatigable preacher, delivering often eight or ten sermons a week, and wholly engrossed in instructing others in the doctrines of the cross. He published two works, The Complete Duty of Man (1763, etc.), and Mistakes in Religion (1774, etc.), a collection of essays on the prophecy of Zachariah, John the Baptist’s father. See JOHN VENN: Life and Letters of Henry Venn (of which Bishop Ryle says, “I know few volumes in the whole range of Christian memoirs so truly valuable as this one”), 1834, 7th ed., London, 1853; RYLE: The Christian Leaders of the Last Century, London, 1869; W. KNIGHT: Henry Venn, London, 1881.

VERCELLONE, Carlo, Italian theologian, b. at Sordevolo, Piedmont, Jan. 14, 1814; d. in Rome as president of the College of the Barnabites there, Jan. 19, 1869. He entered the order in 1829 at Turin. His fame rests upon his Varie lectiones Vulgatæ latine editionis bibliorum, Rome, 1860-64, 2 vols. (epoch-making in the study of the Vulgate); his edition (the best) of the simple Clementine Vulgate, 1861, and with Cozza, his edition of the Codex Vaticanus, 1868-81, 5 vols.

VERENA, a Christian virgin who came with the Thebaic legion of Mauritius from Upper Egypt to the West. In Milan, where she stopped for some time, she heard of the fate which had overtaken the legion; and shortly after she went to Switzerland, where she labored—first in the neighborhood of Solothurn, and afterwards in the region near the junction of the Rhine and the Aar—for the conversion of the Pagan population. She died at Zurzach, near Constance, where she lies buried. See Martyrologium Notkeri, in CASIUS: Lect. Antiq., ii., and Act. Sanct., Sept. 1.

VERGERIUS, Petrus Paulus, b. at Capo d'Istria in 1498; d. at Tübingen, Oct. 4, 1565. He studied law at Padua; entered the papal service, and was twice sent as nuncio to Germany by Clement VII. and Paul III., on which occasions he gave so great satisfaction, that in 1536 he was made bishop of his native city. Sent to the colloquy at Worms (Jan. 1, 1541), his speeches seemed to the curia to be too conciliatory, and he retired to his see. He then began to study the writings of the Reformers for the purpose of refuting them; but the result of his studies was his own conversion; and the reforms he introduced in his diocese, the manner in which he spoke of justification by faith, invocation of saints, etc., very soon roused the suspicion of the Inquisition. His frequent intercourse with Francesco Spiera finally induced the authorities to take measures against him; but he escaped, and fled into Switzerland, 1542. After laboring for several years in the Grisons as minister of Vicosoprano, he removed in 1552 to Tübingen, where he spent the rest of his life, enjoying a pension from the Duke of Württemberg. Though holding no office, he was, nevertheless, very active, and contributed much to the furtherance of the Reformation in Poland and Bohemia. He was also a prolific writer, especially of polemics, and translated a number of the writings of the Reformers into Italian. Considered simply as a character, he is one of the most interesting and most significant persons of his age. See his biography by SIXT, Brunswick, 1855.

VERONICA. According to the legend in its most common form (Act. Sanct., Feb. 4), St. Veronica was a pious woman of Jerusalem, who, when Christ passed by her on his way to Golgotha, took off her head-cloth, and handed it to him in order that he might wipe the blood and sweat from his face; and, when he returned the cloth, his features had become impressed upon it. One modification of the legend identifies Veronica (or rather Bepvicia, according to Johannes of Malala: Chronographia, p. 305) with the woman "disceased with an issue of blood" (Matt. ix. 20-22; comp. Euseb.: Hist. Eccl., VII. 17). Another represents her as sprung from royal blood, a grand-daughter of Herod the Great, evidently confounding her with Berenice, the niece of Herodias. The manner in which the portrait was brought to Rome is generally represented as follows. The Emperor Tiberius was sick; and, having heard of the wondrous cures wrought by the portrait, he sent for Veronica. She obeyed the call, and went to Rome, and, as soon as the emperor had touched the cloth, he was cured. Veronica remained in Rome; and, when she died, she bequeathed the costly relic to Clement, the successor of Peter. In the beginning of the eighth century, Pope John VII. asserted that the Church of St. Maria Maggiore was actually in possession of the miraculous portrait; but it was shown only to kings and princes, and only on certain conditions. Both Milan, however, and Jaen in Spain, claim to have the genuine head-cloth of Veronica; and, in unriddling this entanglement, it is worth noticing, that, in the thirteenth century (Gervasius of Tilburg: Otia imperialia, 25; Matthew Paris: Ad an. 1216), it was not the possessor of the cloth, but the cloth itself which was called "Veronica," that is, vera icon (εἰκών, "the true picture"), a circumstance which speaks in favor of Grimm's combination of the legend of Veronica with that of Abgarus. VERY, Jones, b. at Salem, Mass., Aug. 28, 1813; and d. there May 8, 1880; graduated at Harvard, 1836, and was Greek tutor there, 1836-38; was licensed as a Unitarian preacher, 1843, but took no charge, and lived in retirement at Salem. His Essays and Poems (1839) show a delicate religious genius, and contain "some of the best sonnets in our language." Seven of his lyrics appeared in Longfellow and Johnson's Book of Hymns, 1846; and at least one of them, "Wilt thou not visit me?" has been widely circulated. A complete edition of his writings is to be desired. See the Century magazine for October, 1882, article by W. P. Andrews, on "An Inspired Life."—His younger brother, Washington Very (b. VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, Roman emperor, 69-79; was born in a Sabine village near Reate, 9 A.D., in humble circumstances, but made a rapid and brilliant career. In 66 he accompanied Nero to Greece, and was thence sent to Palestine to quell the insurrection which the Syrian governor, Cestius Gallus, had failed to suppress. Drawing together an army of sixty thousand men from Antioch and Ptolemais, he took Sepphoris, the principal fortress of Galilee, in July, 67, and afterwards Jotapata, defended by Josephus. In 68 he gradually reduced the whole country, and finally encamped before Jerusalem. But there he halted. He could afford to wait while the furious hatred of the various parties made its havoc in the city, and very soon his attention was drawn towards Rome. After the death of Nero, Galba, Otho, and Vetellius followed in rapid succession. In the spring of 69 the legions stationed at Aquileia proclaimed Vespasian emperor; July 1, the legions of Egypt followed the example; July 11, the army of Palestine; July 15, that of all Syria; and soon after Vespasian left Palestine, having placed his son Titus in command of the army. In September, 70, Jerusalem was taken; and in the spring of 71, father and son made their triumphal entrance in Rome,—the public exhibition of the destruction of the national independence of the Jews. But Vespasian, though he was very prompt in putting down the Jewish insurrections in Egypt and Cyrene, was not cruel, and showed no desire for persecution. If the Christians suffered any thing during his reign, it must have been the reason that they were still confounded with the Jews. But the oldest Christian writers know of no persecutions during the reign of Vespasian; and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., III. 17) expressly states that it was a period of peace. The principal sources are TACITUS: Hist.; SÆTONTIUS: Vespasianus; and JOSEPHUS: De bello Judaico. TH. KEIM.

VESPERS (vespera, officium vespertinum, or, lucernarium) denotes the service celebrated in the Roman-Catholic Church at the hour of sunset or lamp-lighting, in imitation of the daily evening sacrifice in the worship of the Old Testament (ISIDORUS: De officiis eccles., I. 20), but with a mystical reference to the descent from the cross and the institution of the Lord's Supper (GREGORY NAZIANZEN: Orat. 42 in Pascha. DURANDUS: Rationale divin. officior., v. 9). It is not mentioned by Cyprian, who of the canonical hours knows only the terce, the sest, and the nones, but it is mentioned by Chrysostom (Hom. 59, ad pop. Antiochen) and Jerome (Ep. 22, ad Eustoch., c. 37), and in the monastic rules of Benedict, Columban, Isidorus, etc., in which the number of canonical hours has reached eight. In the oldest time it was celebrated with twelve hymns, which number was afterwards reduced to seven, — four for the vespers, and three for the completorium. The monastic service arranged by Benedict comprises a chapter of the Bible, a responsorium, the Ambrosian hymn of praise with corresponding versicle, the magnificat, kyrie, paternoster, and concluding prayer. The service of the congregation at large, as arranged in the Roman breviary, is an exact counterpart of the lauds, the congregation singing five hymns; that is, one more than the monks, on account of the lesser holiness of the members. VESTMENTS AND INSIGNIA IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The question whence the sacerdotal costume arose is answered alike in the history of all nations. It is simply the popular costume, or, more properly, that of the higher ranks, retained by the sacerdotal classes in its archaic form; while among the other classes it became subject to the changes of fashion. The same is the case in the Christian Church. The New Testament never hints at a peculiar, priestly costume, different from that of common people. We meet with such a distinction for the first time on a mosaic in the Church of St. Vitale in Ravenna, representing the Emperor Justinian with his retinue, and Bishop Maximinian with two clerks. The emperor and the courtiers wear over the short tunica the so-called paludamentum, which was coming into fashion just at that time, — a kind of loose mantle covering the whole body to below the knees, and held together and fastened on the right shoulder, purple-colored, and ornamented with gold and precious stones. The ecclesiastics wear long, plain white tunics, adorned with two black stripes descending from the shoulders, — the so-called oraria. Over the tunic the bishop wears a toga Græcanica, — a light-green mantle, which, in the first century of our era, superseded the heavy, old Roman toga: and under the toga the omophorion is visible, — a black scarf ornamented with crosses. But stripes on the tunic were very common, and so was the scarf; nor was it uncommon for laymen to adorn their garments with crosses. The first official ecclesiastical costume, in the strict sense of the word, we meet with on a mosaic in the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople, dating from the period between 558 and 573. The priest is there represented in plain white garments: only the broad omophorion, visible under the toga, shows different colors, — blue and red. The tunic has no orarium; and the toga is thrown in a free and easy manner around the shoulders.

From those two pieces of dress, — the tunic, or stola, tunica talaris, tunica alba, and the toga, or paenula, planeta, casula, — the liturgical costume of the Armenian, the Greek, the Roman-Catholic, and even the Abyssinian Church, developed. Christianity is said to have been introduced into Abyssinia in the time of Athanasius, about 330, and was probably brought thither from India or Arabia. At all events, a connection with Rome cannot be established. The Abyssinian priest wears a white tunic, called kamis, with sleeves, and which is opened behind. Now, in Rome, under the emperors, it became the fashion to put on several tunics, one above the other; and the first was called canisia. Nevertheless, scholars are inclined to derive the Abyssinian kamis from an Arabic root. When officiating, the Abyssinian priest wears over the tunic a toga of silk or satin, and many colored, — the so-called cappa; but the derivation of this word is also uncertain, however much it reminds one of the Latin cappa, the travelling-mantle of the Romans. The kamis is held together by a sash twenty to thirty yards long, and wound around the waist; and below that are visible the ample white trousers, called sanafil. On great occasions the priest wears a crown of metal, which, like the cappa, is the property of the church. His every-day head-dress is a turban made up of thirty to forty yards of white stuff. He is also provided with a fly-flap and crutch, as he often has to stand up, singing, for hours.

In the Greek Church the tunic has been retained under the name of sticharion, from στόιχος, "a line," referring to the black stripes. But the principal vestment of the Greek priest is the phelonion, the old toga, fitting closely around the chest, but falling in ample folds below and behind, and provided with a shoulder-piece, which stands up stiff behind the neck. The sticharion is always white; the phelonion, of various colors. Around the neck the Greek priest wears a kind of tie, from which hang down in front two stiff ends embroidered with crosses. As a personal distinction, he sometimes wears the epigonation, a square pouch, or satchel, richly embroidered, and fastened by a belt around the waist. It is the symbolical receptacle for the spiritual weapons with which he, like a well-armed soldier, shall defend the pure faith against heresy; and there is, indeed, not a little in the costume of the Greek priest which reminds one of the Turkish mollah, who steps into the pulpit with a drawn sword in his right hand. Instead of the phelonion, the bishop wears the saccos, — a piece of clothing of the same form as the sticharion, but shorter, of various colors, and richly embroidered with golden crosses. Originally the saccos was reserved for patriarchs and metropolitans; but, since the time of Peter the Great, it has been worn by all bishops. Over the saccos the mantia is spread, — a loose mantle fastened on the shoulder, blue or black, ornamented with stripes, signifying the streams of the living spirit, and provided in front with two small, stiff tablets, signifying the Old and the New Testament. When officiating before the altar, he wears the mitra, which is often of gold, and very costly; and in his hand he holds the paterissa, or episcopal staff, ending in a crook and a small cross.

The farther east, the more gorgeous the liturgical apparel becomes. In this respect the Armenian Church stands foremost in all Christendom. The principal articles of vestment are also there the tunic (shabig) and the toga (pilon). The shabig is white, adorned with lace, — except in the case of deacons and choir-boys, — and held together around the waist by a sash embroidered with gold. The pilon has the form of the paludamentum, and is black, or, in the case of bishops and catholicos, violet. When mass is said, all the clergy, from the priest upwards, wear the shartshar (a more or less richly ornamented mantle, of different colors, open in front, and falling down in ample folds) and the anzorot (a handkerchief of fine white linen, for use at the three ablutions). On the head the priests and the doctors of theology wear the sachaward, of the form of a crown, and made of pasteboard, covered with silk and gold; and the bishops and the catholicos wear the tak, — a magnificent and very costly specimen of the mitre. The bishop's staff reaches a little above his head, and is made of ivory, gold, silver, or ebony: it ends in a serpent, referring to the serpent raised by Moses in the desert. During service the shoes are often taken off, and replaced by a peculiar kind of slippers. On Maundy-Thurs day all ecclesiastical vestments are white; and during "the night of weeping and howling," "the night of darkness," the whole church is covered with black, and kept dark, one single lamp being lighted in front of the crucifix on the altar; also, the priests are clad in black, and service is celebrated in a peculiar, lachrymose manner. On solemn occasions the catholicos wears a great star of diamonds on his forehead.

The Roman-Catholic priest wears over the alba the casula. The alb, the old tunic, the Greek sticharion, is white, and made of linen: silk of various colors, embroideries, laces, and other ornaments, which were lavishly employed in the middle ages, have gone out of use. It is held together around with a belt (cingulum), which now generally has the form of a plain string; while in the middle ages it often appeared as a broad sash, on which inscriptions were embroidered. The casula corresponds to the Greek phelonion, and is, if possible, a still worse disfiguration of the old toga. Overloaded with heavy embroideries of gold, and ornaments of precious stones, the free and flowing folds of the toga gradually shrunk into that box-like, or coffin-like shape which the casula now presents, and which already Rhabanus Maurus noticed, parva casa. Its color is different, — white for the festivals of the Virgin, Christmas, Epiphany, Easter; red for the festivals of the Apostles and the Martyrs: black in Lent, etc. The manipulum, a small white band around the wrist, was, like the Greek orarion, originally a plain handkerchief with which the priest wiped the mouth of the communicants. The hat (birretum) is three-cornered in Italy, four-cornered in Spain, France, and Germany. The red hat of the cardinals (pileus) was introduced by Innocent IV. in 1215. The mitra, tiara, pallium, and other details of the vestments of the Roman-Catholic Church will be found described in special articles, their form and their history: we only add, that each piece of garment is put on with a special prayer, and that a number of Roman-Catholic writers, from Alcuin to the present day, have attempted to imbue them with a special mystical signification. The wildest of these mystagoges is, no doubt, Durandus, Bishop of Meaux, in his Rationale Divinorum Officiorum (thirteenth century).

As many of the vestments of the Roman-Catholic Church are most closely connected with the service of the mass, it was quite natural that the Reformation should cause considerable changes to be introduced. Luther's ideas are strikingly expressed in his letter of Dec. 4, 1539, to Georg Buchholzer, provost of Berlin, the pith of which is, If the elector will allow you to preach the pure faith, you may do it in frock-coat or gown, just as it pleases him best; and, "If he is not satisfied with one gown, you may put on two or three." Zwingli, offended at the worldliness and vanity which found expression in the costume of the Roman-Catholic clergy, was more severe. See his Ursachen und gründ der Schlussreden oder artikel, 1523. Nevertheless, the Lutheran Church taking the doctor-coat of Luther, and the French-Reformed Church, the robe de Calvin, for their models, the differences between the ecclesiastical costumes of those two branches of the Evangelical Church became very slight. The Church of England, with its cassock, rochet, surplice, stole, and cappe, kept in this respect, as in several others, a little nearer to the Church of Rome; while, on the other hand, the English Dissenters often abrogated ecclesiastical vestments altogether. [See the interesting essay on "Ecclesiastical Vestments," in A. P. STANLEY'S Christian Institutions, New York, 1881.] G. BUNZ.

VESTRY (vestiarium, sacristia, secretarium) was the name of an apartment in the ancient church-building, destined to receive not only the vestments of the officiating clergy, but also the sacred vessels and other treasures of the church. That the vestry often was of considerable size may be inferred from the fact that it was often used as an assembly-room for provincial synods. Thus the third, fourth, and fifth councils of Carthage, and the synod of Arles, are stated to have been held in secretario ecclesie. Hence the modern word in the Episcopal Church; a vestry meaning an assembly of all parishioners for the discussion of the affairs of the parish, regardless of the place in which the assembly convenes. The officers who manage the parochial affairs are called the "vestry-board."

VIA DOLOROSA. See JERUSALEM.

VIATICUM, from the Latin via ("a way"), is used in classical language generally as provision for a journey, but is by the Fathers, by mediæval theologians, and also by modern writers, applied specially to the Eucharist when administered to a dying person as the due provision for his journey through death. The Council of Nicæa (325), in its can., xiii., forbade the priest to withhold the Eucharist from any dying man who wished for it, even if he were an apostate or a parricide; and in that connection it designates the Eucharist as the viaticum, ἐφόδιον.

VICAR (vicarius), generally one qui alterius vices agit ("who plays another man's part"), more specially the substitute of an officer, secular or ecclesiastical. The whole subject of vicars, vicarages, vicariates, etc., received a very elaborate development in the Roman-Catholic Church. The head of the church is Christ: but Christ appointed St. Peter his vicar, and through St. Peter the vicariate was forever conferred on the bishop of Rome, who calls himself vicarius S. Petri, vicarius Christi, vices Dei gerens in terris, and is so called by others, for instance, in the confession of the Council of Trent. Then, again, the Pope has his vicars (vicarii Apostolicæ sedis); first, in a general way, all patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops; then, in a more restricted sense, the Roman curia; and finally, in the narrowest but most proper sense, the papal legates, nuncios, and missionary superintendents. And as the Pope has his vicars, so have the archbishops and bishops, coadjutors (vicarii in pontificalibus), vicar-generals (vicarii in jurisdictione), and officials (vicarii forani), not to speak of the capellani, members of the chapters, of whom the grand vicar (summus vicarius domini, or summi altaris vicarius) played a conspicuous part in the interval between the death of a bishop and the election of his successor. Finally, the priests or parsons themselves had their vicars (vicarii parochiales), and these were either vicarii perpetui, or vicarii temporales, according as the parson was perpetually or temporarily disabled. See the various commentators on the Decretals, i., 28, De officio vicarii. H. F. JACOBSON.

VICELIN, the apostle of Holstein, b. at Quernheim, a village on the Weser, in the latter part of the eleventh century; d. at Aldenburg, Dec. 12, 1151. Educated in the school of Paderborn, he was appointed teacher in the school of Bremen, and brought it into a flourishing condition, but left it again, and went to Paris, where he studied for three years under Anselm. After his return from Paris, he began to prepare himself for missionary work among the Pagan Wends of Northern Germany; and, having been ordained a priest, he repaired, together with Rudolf of Hildesheim, and Ludolf of Verden, to Henry, king of the Obotrites. Christianity had previously been preached among the Obotrites settled in Mecklenburg, and living also in Holstein, but not with permanent success. Relapses into Paganism had taken place, and were always accompanied with violent outbreaks of cruelty and ferocity. Henry was a zealous Christian, and received Vicelin well; but he died in the same year (1126), and Vicelin was compelled to return to Bremen. Shortly after, however, the inhabitants of Faldera, the present Neumünster, in Holstein, invited him to settle among them. His labor in that place was so successful, that the emperor Lothair was induced to come to his aid. In 1134 the fortress Segeberg was built; and, under its protection, a church was erected, and a monastery built in the city. Meanwhile new aspects of successful missionary labor among the Obotrites of Mecklenburg were opened up, when Henry, the Lion of Saxony, began to interfere in the affairs of the country, and gained ascendancy over the Pagan Niclot. The bishopric of Aldenburg was re-established; and in 1149 Vicelin was consecrated bishop. His health failed him, however, and the last years of his life he spent in retirement. See the Chronicles by Helmold, Adam of Bremen, Saxo Grammaticus, and HEFFER: Der Weltkrieg der Deutschen und Slaven. Hamburg, 1847. G. H. KLIPPEL.

VICTOR is the name of three popes and two antipopes.—Victor I. (185-197 according to Pagi, Brachiarum Paparum Rom., I., but, according to others, 187-200) occupied the papal chair between Eleutherus and Zephyrinus. He was an African by birth, and a rash and hot-headed man, as his interference in the Paschal controversy showed. In a letter addressed to Polycrates, the successor of Polycarp, he threatened with excommunication all those Oriental bishops who would not adopt the Roman computation of the Easter festival. The harshness of this measure, however, was condemned by many Western bishops who held the same views as Victor; among others by Irenæus, whose letter to Victor has been preserved by Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., V. 24. He was at last prevailed upon to recall the letter. Theodotus the tanner, the famous Monarchian leader, he excommunicated; but his adherents formed a party, the Theodotians, which lived on for a long time in Rome. [The spurious decrees which have been ascribed to him are enumerated in Jaffé: Regesta, edited by Wattenbach, Berlin, 1882.]—Victor II. (1055-57) was bishop of Eichstädt before his elevation to the papal see, a relative and intimate friend of Henry III.: his true name was Gebhard. According to Leo of Ostia (Chron. Casinense, ii. 89) it was Hildebrand who carried through his election, and, if so, it must have been Hildebrand's idea to produce a split in the imperial camp, and gain over to the side of the reform party one of the most determined opponents of the measures of Leo IX. The experiment succeeded. In his short reign, Victor held one council in Italy (Florence), and three in France (Lyons, Lisieux, Toulouse), against the two great weaknesses of the church,—simony and the marriage of the priests. The sources to his history are found in WATTERICH: Pontif. Roman. Vite. See also HOFFLER: Die deutsche Pöpste, Leipzig, 1839.—Victor III. (1086-87) was abbot of Monte Casino when the dying Gregory VII. designated him as the most worthy to succeed him. It was nearly a whole year, however, before Victor consented to accept the election by the cardinals, and his energetic reign, carried on completely in the spirit of his great predecessor, lasted only half a year. See the continuation, by Petrus Diaconus, of the Chron. Casinense, by Leo of Ostia.—Victor IV. was the name assumed by two antipopes in the twelfth century; first by Cardinal Gregory Conti (1138), who, however, was overthrown by Innocent II., through the exertions of Bernard of Clairveaux, after the lapse of two months; and then by Cardinal Octavianus, who was elected in 1159 by the Ghibelline party and Frederic Barbarossa, and maintained himself till his death at Lucca, in 1164, but never equalled his rival, Alexander III., either in actual power or in moral influence. See REUFER: Alexander III., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1860-61, 3 vols. ZÖCKLER.

VICTOR, Claudius Marius, also called Victorinus, was a poet and rhetorician; lived at Marseilles in the first half of the fifth century, and wrote, in hexameters, a Commentary on Genesis and an Epistola ad Solomonem Abbatem de peruersis utatis sua moribus, found in Bibl. Marc. Patr., Lyons, tome VIII.

VICTOR, Bishop of Antioch, was a contemporary of Chrysostom, and wrote a Commentary on the Gospel of Mark (Bibl. Patr. Marc., Lyons, tome IV), in which he defended the view that the Christian was perfectly at liberty to observe or not to observe the fasts.

VICTOR, Bishop of Capua, d. about 511; is generally considered the first Latin catena writer. He wrote De cyclo Paschali, of which only a few fragments have been preserved by Bede (Scholia veterum patrum), and a Latin translation of Ammonius Alexandrinus: Harmonia Evangeliorum, Cologne, 1532.

VICTOR, Bishop of Cartenna, flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and wrote Adversus Arianos ad Gensericum, De penitentie publica, and several other works, most of which, however, are lost.

VICTOR, Bishop of Tununa, d. about 566; suffered imprisonment and exile because he opposed the condemnation by Justinian of the so-called "Three Chapters." He wrote a Chronicle, of which the part treating the period between 441 and 465 has come down to us, edited by Scaliger, in Thesaurus Temporum Eusebii, Amsterdam, 1658, T. II., and by Basnage, in Thesaurus Monumentorum Eccles., Antwerp, 1725, T. I.

VICTOR (Vitenensis), Bishop of Vita, not, as it is often said, of Utica; wrote a Historia persecutionis Africane sub Censurico et Hunnerico, edited by RUTART, in his Historia persecutionis Vandaliacæ, Paris, 1694, Venice, 1732, and recently by M. PERSCHENIG, Vienna, 1881.

VICTORINUS (Petavionensis), Bishop of Pettau, a city of Panonia, on the Drave, in the present Styria, and not, as stated by Baronius and others, Bishop of Poitiers; flourished about 290. According to Cassiodorus and Jerome, he was a Greek by birth, understood Greek better than Latin, and taught rhetoric before he became a bishop. A fragment of his De fabrica mundi is still extant, and has been edited by Cave; but his other writings have perished. The Commentary on the Revelation ascribed to him, and found in Mar. Bib. Patrum, Lyons, 1677, T. III., is by some considered spurious, because it rejects the chiliastic views of Cerinthus, which, according to Jerome, Victorinus held. Others, however, consider the passages in question to be interpolations. See DUPIN: Nouvelle Bibliothèque, Paris, 1693, T. I.; and CAVE: Historia literaria, Geneva, 1693.

VICTRICIUS, St., was a soldier, and subjected to fearful tortures by his Pagan commander when he wanted to leave the army, and become a Christian, but was miraculously liberated, and became bishop of Rouen in 380 or 390. He undertook some missionary-work in Hainaut (Belgium) and went in 391 to England, on account of the troubles caused there by the Pelagians. But his own orthodoxy became suspected, and he had to go to Rome in order to vindicate himself before Innocent I. He left a work, De sancte Sanctorum, edited by Lebeuf, Paris, 1739. He is commemorated on Aug. 7.

VIENNE, one of the oldest cities of France, and the cradle of the Church of Gaul; stands on the Gère, near its influx in the Rhone, in the department of Isère, and has been the seat of a number of councils, — the first in 471, the last in 1557, — most of which, however, are only of slight interest. One of 1112 cancelled the agreement of 1111 between Pascal II. and Henry V., according to which the Pope conceded the right of investiture to the emperor. (See HARDUIN: Acta Concilior., T. VI. pars ii.; MANSI: Concil. Coll., T. XXI.) Another, of 1199, executed the ban which Innocent III. had laid on Philippe Auguste for having repudiated his wife, Ingeborg. (See HARDUIN, l.c., and MANSI, T. XXII.) The most important, however, was that convened by Clement V., and generally recognized as the fifteenth oecumenical council. It was opened Oct. 16, 1311, attended by a hundred and fourteen, or, according to another report, by three hundred bishops, and closed May 6, 1312. The principal business transacted was the dissolution of the order of the Templars, besides a number of decrees, doctrinal and disciplinary, against Juan de Oliva, the Fratricelles, the Dolcinists, the Beghards, etc. See HARDUIN, T. VII., and Clementinarum, Lib. III. Tit. 16, de reliquiis. NEUDECKER.

VIGILANTIUS, b. in the latter half of the fourth century, at Calagurris, a village in southwestern Gaul, probably the present Casère in Commenges; was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona in 395, and went then to Jerusalem, carrying with him a letter of recommendation from Paulinus of Nola to Jerome. The visit to the East, however, seems to have made a similar impression on Vigilantius as the visit to Rome made on Luther. He and Jerome soon fell out; and the sixty-first letter of Jerome is evidently an answer to an attack made upon him by Vigilantius, perhaps during the latter's stay in Alexandria. Some time after his return to his native country, Vigilantius was denounced to Jerome by the presbyter Riparius as a teacher of unsound doctrines. Jerome answered, and finally he wrote his essay, Contra Vigilantium. It is not possible, from the quotations of Jerome, to form a complete conception of the theological system of Vigilantius; but its general tendency is perfectly clear, and of such a character as to give a satisfactory explanation of the conflict between him and Jerome, for it is an energetic protest against that whole development which is represented by Jerome. Vigilantius attacked the worship of the martyrs and their relics on doctrinal grounds: it seemed to him to be a relapse into Paganism. And he attacked monasticism on moral grounds: the flight from the world is not a victory over the world. He was especially severe upon the celibacy of the priests, on their vows of poverty, etc., and rejected altogether the idea of a higher morality for the monks and the clergy, and a lower for people of the world. The sources are, besides the above writings of Jerome, GENNADIUS: De script. eccles., 35, and the letter of PAULINUS. See also LINDNER: De Joviano et Vigilantio, Leipzig, 1840.

VIGILIUS (Pope 540–555) was a Roman by birth, and deacon during the reign of Agapetus, whom in 536 he accompanied to Constantinople. Ambitious and grasping, but without talent, or courage to realize his aspirations, he fell a prey to the intrigues of the Byzantine court. When Agapetus died, in Constantinople, he was appointed his successor, but on the secret condition that he should support the emperor's scheme for the reconciliation of the Monophysites with the orthodox Church. On his arrival at Rome, however, he found the see already occupied by one Silverius; but, in accordance with the bargain he had made with the emperor, Belisarius came to his aid, and Silverius was removed, partly by intrigues, partly by violence. Vigilius was not so prompt in fulfilling his part of the bargain. He wrote a letter to the three deposed Monophysite patriarchs of the East,—Theodosius of Alexandria, Anthimus of Constantinople, and Severus of Antioch,—in which he professed perfect agreement with their faith. But he demanded that the letter should be kept a secret, on the plea that he was able to do more for the Monophysite cause when he preserved the appearance of being in agreement with the synod of Chalcedon. Meanwhile the emperor had been persuaded that a condemnation of the three principal representatives of the Nestorian view—Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrus, and Ibas—would silence all the objections of the Monophysites to the synod of Chalcedon; and he consequently issued an edict to that end. But the edict met with resistance even in the East; and in the West it was generally condemned, the African Church taking the lead of the opposition. The emperor demanded of Vigilius that he should subscribe the edict, and Vigilius dared not. For three years he succeeded in escaping the dilemma by prevarications and subterfuges of all kinds. But in 547 he was peremptorily summoned to Constantinople. Synod after synod was convened, but the African bishops and the Western bishops in general continued to resist. Finally the Council of Constantinople, chiefly composed of Oriental bishops, proved pliant; and the imperial edict was formally accepted by the Church. Vigilius first tried his old game,—writing a judicatum in favor of the edict, but demanding that the document should be kept a secret. Pressed hard by the court, he fled from Constantinople; and from Chalcedon he issued a formal protest, the so-called constitutum, against the decrees of the synod of Constantinople. But he was too much frightened by the wrath of the emperor, and too anxious to return to his see, to hold out to the end. In 555 he publicly retracted, and accepted the Constantinopolitan decrees, in order to be allowed to return to Rome. He died at Syracuse, however, on the way home. The sources are (besides the Liber pontificalis by ANASTASIUS, and the pertinent acts in MANSI: Concil. Coll., vol. ix.) the Breviarium, by LIBERATUS, the Chronicon, by VICTOR of Tunnunum, and the Pro defensione trium capitulorum, by FACUNDUS of Hermiane, all three found in GALLAND: Bibl., vols. xi. and xii.

VIGILIUS THE DEACON, a native of Gaul, flourished, according to Gennadius (51), in the first half of the fifth century, and wrote a monastic rule, which has been published by Holstenius (Codex Regul., i.) and Migne (Patr. Lat., vol. 50).

VIGILIUS, Bishop of Tapsus, a city in the African province of Byzacene, is the author of several celebrated works against Eutychianism and Arianism. Of his personal life only one single fact is known to us: he was present at the synod convened at Carthage in 484 by Huneric, the king of the Vandals. (See VICTOR VITENSIS: De persecutione Vandalica, iv.) His principal work, and the only one published over his name, is the Five Books against Eutyches, which, however, when first printed (by Churrerus, Tübing., 1528), was ascribed to Vigilius of Trent. From this work an inference may be drawn with respect to the authorship of the Disputation between Athanasius, Photinus, Sabellius, and Arius, formerly ascribed to Athanasius; and from that, again, an inference may be drawn with respect to the authorship of the Polemics against Marivad, and the Twelve Books on the Trinity, both of which were published under the pseudonyme of Idacius Clarus. The first to bring light into this somewhat obscure and confused subject was the Jesuit Chiffletius, in his edition of the works of Vigilius, Dijon, 1664; they are also found in the Bibl. Max. Patr., vols. iv. and viii. The original value of these works is not great, but as a polemist the author was certainly one of the most prominent writers of his age.

H. SCHMIDT.

VIGILIUS, Bishop of Trent, is first mentioned by Gennadius (37) as author of In laudem martyrum, and a letter on the great exploits of the martyrs of his age. As the former work is dedicated to Simplicianus, the successor of Ambrosius, the author must have lived at the end of the fourth, or the beginning of the fifth, century, and cannot possibly be the author of the Five Books against Eutyches, formerly ascribed to him. According to legend, he suffered martyrdom in 400 or 405. See Act. Sanct., June 26.

VIGILS (vigiliae, pernoctationes, παραυχίδες) denotes, in the Roman-Catholic Church, a kind of preparatory service, consisting of processions, prayers, singing, and recitals, celebrated on the eve before a great church-festival. Originally the name was applied to the common nightly meetings of the Christians during the period of persecution; but as those meetings were continued after the persecutions had ceased,—partly as an imitation of the Jewish sabbath, which begins at sunset; partly as an imitation of certain nocturnal Pagan festivals,—the name was also retained. In the second century the vigils of Easter and Pentecost were considered specially holy; the former, because the coming of Christ to judge the world was expected to take place at that date; the latter on account of the communication of the Holy Spirit through baptism. In the fourth and fifth centuries the Easter-vigils were considered the most appropriate term for baptism, communion, and ordination. The vigils were at that time celebrated with great magnificence; but they gave occasion to so great scandals, that it was found necessary to exclude women altogether from them. They were, therefore, vehemently attacked, for instance by Vigilantius, and the time of their celebration was changed from evening to forenoon, or they were transformed into simple fasts. Easter-vigils, however, and Christmas-vigils, were still retained. [See BRIGHAM: Antiq., XIII. ix. 4.] NEUDECKER.

VIGNOLLES, Alphonse de, b. at Aubais in Languedoc, Oct. 29, 1619; d. in Berlin, July 21, 1744. He studied theology at Saumur and Oxford, and was in 1677 appointed pastor of Aubais, and, shortly after, of Caylar. Expelled from France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1684), he went first to Switzerland, and thence to Prussia, where he was appointed pastor of the Reformed Church at Halle. In 1701 he was called to Berlin, and was made a member of the newly founded academy of science, of whose mathematical division he became director in 1727. His Chronologie de l'histoire sainte, Berlin, 1738, 2 vols. in quarto, attracted the attention of the whole learned world. Less successful was his edition of Lantant's Histoire de la Papesse Jeanne, The Hague, 1720, with notes and additions, in which he defended that blundering legend as an historical fact.

VILLEGAGNON, Nicholas Durand de, b. about 1510; d. in 1571; the leader and the betrayer of the first missionary attempt of the Reformed church. He descended from a noble family in Brittany; was educated for the navy; distinguished himself in 1541 in the campaign which Charles V. made to Algeria; brought in 1548 the young Scotch queen to France in spite of the exertions of the English fleet to prevent it; took part in 1550 in the defence of Malta, and was made a knight of the order, etc. As vice-admiral of Brittany he fell out with the governor of the province, who was favored by the king. His position became difficult; and the glowing descriptions of South America which at that time circulated in Europe induced him to leave France, and try to found a colony in South America. But he knew that he could obtain the king's support only through the influence of Admiral Coligny; and that he secured by declaring in favor of the Reformation, and pretending that the colony should be a place of refuge to the Reformed faith. July 15, 1555, he left Havre; and in November he arrived at the Bay of Guanabara. On an island in the bay, where now stands the city of Rio de Janeiro, he built a fort, which he called "Coligny;" and, in spite of many difficulties, the colony seemed to prosper. Not only Coligny, but also Calvin, took an interest in the undertaking; and in 1557 a new lot of emigrants arrived. Dissensions, however, soon arose between the pastors from Geneva and a young pastor, Cointa, who had been educated in the Sorbonne. Cointa insisted that the Lord's Supper should be administered with the admixture of water, with the sacerdotal robe, etc.; and Villegagnon supported him. An embassy was sent to Europe to lay the case before the whole Reformed Church. But new dissensions arose. Under the influence of the displeasure which his undertaking had caused among the powerful Romanist party at the French court, Villegagnon completely relapsed into Romanism, and actually endeavored to convert the colony. He not only abrogated the existing church-establishment, organized on the model of Geneva, but he forbade the colonists to meet in private for prayer, and inflicted the most cruel punishments on the disobedient. Several were executed. The result was the speedy dissolution of the colony, though missionary work had already begun among the native along the Brazilian coast. Some of the colonist returned to Europe; others were scattered over South America. Villegagnon himself returned to France, and made several attempts at attracting attention; but he was generally considered inane, and died miserably in one of the houses of his order. VILLERS, Charles François Dominique de, b. at Belchen in Lorraine, Nov. 4, 1764; d. at Göttingen, Feb. 26, 1815. He was educated in the military schools of Metz, and entered the army in 1782, but studied at the same time classical literature, and philosophy. His La liberté (1791) proved too moderate for the Jacobins, and in 1792 he was compelled to flee. He settled at Lubeck, and became, in the course of time, thoroughly acquainted with German character and civilization, German language and literature, and became thereby a useful middle-man between Germany and France. Having written with great openness against the violence of Napoleon's generals, he was expelled from the Hanseatic States by Davoust in 1806. He went to Paris, and obtained from the emperor the repeal of the order. In 1811 he was made professor of philosophy at Göttingen, from which position, however, he was dismissed in 1814 by the returning Hanoverian dynasty. His principal work (Essai sur l'esprit et l'influence de la réformation de Luther) received the prize of the French Academy in 1804, and was translated both into German and English. He also wrote Philosophie de Kant, Metz, 1801.

VILMAR, August Friedrich Christian, b. at Solz in Hesse, Nov. 21, 1800; d. at Marburg, July 30, 1868. He studied theology at Marburg, and was appointed professor there in 1855. As member of the consistory of Cassel, he was one of the chief supporters of the Hassenpflug administration, and became one of the principal leaders of the religious re-action which followed the revolution of 1848. Most characteristic in this respect are Die Theologie der Thatsachen wider die Theologie der Rhetorik (1851), and Geschichte des Conversionsstandes der evangel. Kirche in Hesse, 1860. After his death, his lectures on exegesis, morals, and dogmatics were published. He was the author of an excellent history of German literature. See LEIMBACH: Vilmar nach seinem Leben und Wirken, Hanover, 1875; GRAU: Vilmar und von Hofmann, Gütersloh, 1879.

VINCENT OF BEAUVAIS (Bellovacensis, or the Speculator) flourished in the first half of the thirteenth century; a contemporary of Alexander of Hales, Thomas Aquinas, etc. He belonged to the Dominican order, and attracted great attention as teacher and preacher in the monastery of Beauvais. As a writer, he is a collector, condenser, systematizer, rather than an original author. His Speculum majus, consisting of three parts, — speculum naturale, doctrinale, and historiale, — is a stupendous work of learning, but also of great interest for the history of civilization: it appeared at Strassburg, 1473, and afterwards often. His De institutione filiorum regionum seu nobilium was much used book, and was translated into German by Schlosser, Frankfurt, 1819. NEUDECKER.

VINCENT OF LERINS, a monk in the celebrated monastery of Lerinum in Gaul; flourished in the fifth century; wrote his famous book, Commonitorium, according to a notice in its forty-second chapter, three years after the synod of Ephesus, that is, 431; and died, according to Genadius (De vir. ill., 64), during the reign of Valentinian I.; according to the Martyrol. Romanum, May 23, 450. Nothing more is known of his personal life. In the history of doctrines the Commonitorium occupies a prominent place. At the time of its authorship, Southern Gaul was the seat of a wide-spread and decided Semipelagian opposition to Augustine; and though the book is written with great calmness, and without the least trace of direct polemics, its Semipelagian character and its silent reference to Augustine are unmistakable. (See VOSSIUS: Hist. Pelagiana, p. 575; NORISIUS: Hist. Pelagiana, ii. 2, 3, 11; and the elaborate analysis by H. Schmidt, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie.) But a still greater interest the book acquires from the circumstance that it is the most complete representation of the Roman-Catholic doctrine of tradition. Feeling the necessity of having some external, irrefragable evidence of truth, Vincent passes from Scripture to tradition, as containing the true interpretation which alone can make Scripture infallible. But if Scripture needs the interpretation of tradition — quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus creditum est — is tradition exempted from misinterpretation? This last step, however, to make tradition dependent on the living church in its entirety, or on the infallible pope, Vincent refrained from taking. The book has been edited by Baluze, Coster, E. Klüpfel (Augsburg, 1843), etc. See Elpelt's monograph, Breslau, 1840.

VINCENT DE PAUL, b. at Pomy in Gasconne, April 24, 1576; d. in Paris, Sept. 27, 1660; beatified, 1727; and canonized, 1737. He was educated by the Franciscans, and ordained a priest in 1600. On a tour from Toulouse to Narbonne, he was captured by corsairs from Tunis, and sold to a Christian renegade; but the end of the adventure was, that he reconverted his master. After a short stay in Rome, he repaired to Paris, where he became one of the chaplains of Queen Marguerite. The surroundings, however, seem to have bred scepticism in him; but he soon left the court, and through his friend Berulle, who had just founded the order of the Pères de l'Oratoire de Jésus, he was appointed pastor of Clichy, and tutor in the house of Count Gondy. So great was his success as a pastor of souls, that the countess established a fund of sixteen thousand livres to provide better pastoral care for tenants. Nevertheless, feeling somewhat oppressed by the religious enthusiasm of the countess, Vincent left the house, and was appointed pastor of Chatillon les Dombes, 1617. There he formed the first Confrérie de Charité, — an association of women, who personally went to the aid of poor and sick people. Persuaded to return to the Gondy family, he formed several new confréries, for instance in Chatillon. He also began to visit the prisons, the galleys, and such places; and so irresistible was that message of Christian love he brought, that he melted even those half-petrified hearts. In 1619

Louis XIII. made him Aumônier royal des galères de France. In 1623 he founded at Macon in Burgundy the Society of St. Borromeo against begging; and in a very short time the beggars disappeared. His religious and philanthropic zeal was connected with a wonderful knowledge of human nature and great practical tact. No wonder, then, that every thing he undertook succeeded. His greatest institution was the order of the Priests of the Mission, confirmed by Parliament in 1631, and settled in the House of St. Lazarus in 1632. At first his order did not thrive so very well. After two years' hard work, it counted only nine members. But gradually it became customary for young priests to spend some time at St. Lazarus before they received ordination. In 1632 the Tuesday Conferences were inaugurated, where the younger clergy of Paris gathered for instruction and edification; and before long the priests of the mission were heartily welcomed, and even eagerly sought for, by all kinds of people. As most of the members of the Confréries de Charité were married ladies, whose domestic duties had the first claim on their attention, Vincent instituted a new order, — the so-called Filles de Charité, also called Sœurs Grises. They were not nuns. After their novitiate, they took a vow; but it bound them only for one year. "The hospitals were their cloister; the holy discipline, their veil." The influence of these institutions soon spread far beyond France, — to Ireland, Poland, Tunis, Algeria, Madagascar, etc.; and under great crises, as, for instance, during the war between France and the German Empire, it was felt as a great blessing. The life of St. Vincent has been written by Abelly (1664), Noiret (1729), Collet (1748), Capeique (1827), Bussière (1850), Maitrias (1851), Maynard (1860) [Loth (1881)]. W. HOLLENBERG.

VINCENT OF SARAGOSSA, one of the most celebrated martyrs of the ancient church; descended from one of the most distinguished families in Arragonia; was archdeacon of the church of Saragossa, and suffered martyrdom at Valencia during the persecution of Diocletian, about 303. Though the Passio S. Vincentii (Act. Sanct., Jan. 12) is overloaded with tortures and miracles, it must, nevertheless, be very old, as it was known, at least in all its most prominent features, to Augustine (Sermo, 4; 274; 275; 276), Prudentius (Peristephanon), Paulinus of Nola (Poem., 27), Venantius Fortunatus (Carm., i. 5), and Gregory of Tours (De glor. mart., 90).

VINCENT, Samuel, b. at Nîmes, Sept. 8, 1787; d. there July 10, 1837. He belonged to a family, which, through several generations, had been attached to the service of the Reformed Church of Nîmes; and, after studying at Geneva, he settled in his native city as pastor; and afterwards not even the most tempting offers could induce him to leave it. In 1829 he was made president of its consistory. His spiritual character, however, developed under the influence of English (Paley and Chalmers) and German (Breitschneider and Schleiermacher) Protestantism, rather than under that of French and Swiss Protestantism. After the Revolution, the French-Reformed Church gradually sunk down into the deism of Rousseau, and its theology became mere conventionalism without any true vitality. Vincent felt the evil; and it is his great merit that he procured the remedy. His first original production was an attack on Lamennais' Essai de l'indifférence; and his Observations sur l'Unité religieuse (1820); and Observations sur la voie d'autorité appliquée à la religion, created quite a sensation. From 1820 to 1824 he published Mélanges de religion, 10 vols., which made the French public acquainted with and interested in German theology. Of still deeper influence were his Vues sur le protestantisme, 1829, 2 vols., and Méditations religieuses (most complete edition by Fontanes, 1863); which latter work opened up new and rich opportunities to the preacher. His life was written by Antonin (1863) and Corbière (1873), besides a number of monographs by Fontanes, Prevost-Paradol, Coquerel fils, etc.

VINES, Richard, b. at Blason, in Leicester County, Eng., about 1600; d. February, 1655 (6). He was educated in Magdalen College, Cambridge; became teacher of a school at Hineckly in Warwickshire, after finishing his course at the university, and afterwards rector of Weddington. He was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643 from Warwickshire, and was very influential in matters of church government and the sacraments. He was chairman of the Committee of Accommodation with the Independents. He often preached before Parliament. During the session of the Westminster Assembly he was, in 1643, made minister of the parish of Clements Dunes, near Essexhouse; but, this proving too large for him, he removed to the rectory of Walton in Hertfordshire, and soon after became pastor of Lawrence Jewry, London. In 1644 he was also appointed master of Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, and held the position until 1649, when he was turned out for refusing the engagement. In 1653 he was appointed by Parliament one of the Committee of Divines to draw up the Fundamentals as a basis of Toleration. He died on sabbath evening, from bleeding at the nose, which was brought on by excessive labor in preaching, and administering the Lord's Supper. During his life a number of sermons were published; e.g., Impostures of Seducing Teachers Discovered, Commons Sermon, Nov. 30, 1642; Author, Nature, and Danger of Heresy, Commons Sermon, April 23, 1644. After his death a number of posthumous works were published by his friends; e.g., Treatise of the right institution, administration, and receiving of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, 4to, p. 376, London, 1657; God's Drawing and Men's Coming to Christ, 4to, p. 335, 1662. His funeral sermon was preached by Thomas Jacobbe, entitled Enoch's walk and change, and published 1656, with introductory remarks by Simeon Ashe and Edmund Calamy, followed by poetic epitaphs from William Spurstone, Matthew Newcomen, Matthew Poole, and others, all speaking of him in the warmest terms. He is represented as "a man of extraordinary ability, a smart disputant, well studied, a perfect master of the Greek, a real orator; his ministry solid, pithy, quick, and searching, having a clear head. He could dive deep into a knotty controversy, and was not afraid of men. He was a man of gracious, tender spirit." Fuller says of him, "He was most charitably moderate to such as dissented from him, though most constant to his own principles." See CLARK: Lives of Eminent Persons, p. 48 sq., 1683; REID: Memoirs of Westminster Divines, p. 191 sq., 1811; FULLER: Worthies, ii. p. 239. C. A. BRIGGS.

VINET, Alexandre Rodolphe, Swiss theologian; b. at Ouchy, near Lausanne, Switzerland, June 17, 1797; d. at Clarens, on the Lake of Geneva, May 4, 1847. He was educated at Lausanne. From 1817 to 1837 he was teacher of the French language and literature in the gymnasium and pädagogium at Basel, then extraordinary professor of the same in the university, and finally (1835) ordinary professor. In 1819 he was ordained; but it was not until 1823 that he came under the influence of those deeply spiritual views inculcated by César Malan. It was, indeed, the persecution of the Monniers (see art.) which aroused Vinet's attention to the subject of freedom of conscience, and led him to write for the Paris Société de la morale chrétienne his prize essay, Mémoire en faveur de la liberté des cultes, Paris, 1826. This book established his reputation as a thinker and writer. Not content with philosophizing, he took a prominent part in efforts to secure religious freedom in Switzerland, in consequence of which he was tried (1829), and condemned to pay a fine of eighty francs, and be suspended from his ministerial functions for a year. But of course such persecution had no effect upon his efforts or influence, except to increase both. He received, meanwhile, flattering calls elsewhere; but these he steadily declined, greatly to the delight of the Basellers, who showed their appreciation of his ability and devotion as preacher, professor, and pamphleteer, by giving him the freedom of the city (1829), and in 1835 creating for him a chair of French language and literature in their university, thus giving him the position of ordinary professor. In 1837, however, he received a call which he could not resist, and went to Lausanne as professor of practical theology. As a parting tribute of respect and regard, Basel gave him that year the degree of doctor of theology. Out of modesty, Vinet made no public use of it; and therefore Berlin, in 1846, bestowed the same degree upon him.

The second part of Vinet's career was destined to be shorter, but more important, than the first. Immediately on his coming to Lausanne, he was involved in the struggle against State interference in ecclesiastical affairs, incident to a re-organization of the church in the canton; and, being unable to accept the abject position of the church before the law as determined by the new order of things, he withdrew from the Vaud canton association of clergy (1840), but not — and this had been laid against him as an inconsistency — from the National Church, because he was on principle opposed to separation from existent churches. He exercised great caution in his professorial teaching, and did not obtrude his peculiar views upon the students. Life was moving on quietly and beneficently when the Vaudois revolution of Feb. 14, 1845, broke out, — an uprising of the masses against "superstition," a blind effort to do away with the "fanaticisms," as the "dissenters," and those of the National Church who taught "evangelical views," and favored "evangelical practices," were called. Vinet endeavored, unsuccessfully, to utilize the occasion to induce the authorities to grant religious freedom; and, since this came not, he resigned his professorship, May, 1845. A few weeks later he became professor of French literature in the Lausanne Academy. In December, 1815, the Free Church of the canton of Vaud was organized; and, after some hesitancy, Vinet joined it. In November, 1846, the teachers in schools in the canton, of all grades, were required to submit to the new church law referred to above, and therefore Vinet was forced to withdraw. He welcomed the leisure; and, full of plans concerning unfinished and projected works, he would fain retire for a couple of years into the country, but his plan could not be carried out. His students besought him to continue his lectures; and so, although sadly needing rest, he labored on. On Jan. 28, 1847, he gave his last lecture in theology. On April 19 he was carried to Clarens, and there he died.

Vinet won fame in the two departments of theology and literary criticism. The latter does not properly come up here. His theology has to be determined from scattered statements in sermons, etc., for he wrote no formal theological treatise. He held the "evangelical" views respecting the necessity of repentance, and salvation by faith. Christ was the centre of his teaching. He made much out of individuality, and dwelt upon the fitness of the gospel to the deepest needs of the heart, as proof of its divine origin. This theology was the staple of his preaching. As his teachers, he acknowledged Pascal and Kant. In practical theology there are several posthumous works derived from his notes and reports of students: Théologie pastorale, ou théorie du ministère évangélique, Paris, 1850; Homilétique, ou théorie de la prédication, 1853; and Histoire de la prédication parmi les réformés de France au dix-septième siècle, 1860. In the first, Vinet shows his fitness to have the care of souls, but takes radical ground; for he teaches that the ministerial office sprang out of the needs of the congregation, and had no formal, divine introduction. The minister, therefore, has no especial priestly character whereby he is separated from other believers: he is simply a Christian who does habitually what all Christians should do occasionally and in their way, but he does these things with that measure of authority which knowledge and practice give. In his Homilétique, Vinet defines a sermon as an address incorporated in public worship, and intended either to lead into Christian truth those ignorant of it, or to apply Christian truth to those familiar with it, or both. He dwells much upon the artistic construction of the sermon. The theme should be chosen first. The text is of much less consequence, as it is not essential to a discourse; yet one should be chosen out of reverence for the word of God. The strong points of the book are its emphasis upon the necessity of laborious preparation of discourses, upon the man behind the sermon, and its Christian warmth and enthusiasm. [It has been extensively used as a text-book and book of reference in American theological seminaries.] Vinet's History of Preaching is an excellent book upon a brief but important period in the history of French preaching. And of his teaching Vinet himself was a fine example. He never was a pastor; yet he preached frequently, on invitation, in the French Church at Basel and in the Free Church of the Vaud canton. Five volumes of these sermons and homilies have been published. He was greatly admired, and very influential. In short, he was a genius, full of ideas, glowing with Christian light, kindling enthusiasm in others, yet cautious, sensitive, learned, and æsthetic.

[The following works of Vinet have appeared in English: Latitude recommended to the Christian Minister, London, 1811; An Essay on the Profession of Personal Religious Conviction, and upon the Separation of Church and State, considered with reference to the Fulfilment of that Duty, 1813; Christian Philosophy, 1846; Vital Christianity, 1846, and, in the same volume, Gospel Studies, 1851; Selected Sermons, 1849; Pastoral Theology, 1852; Homiletics, 1853, again in 1858; History of French Literature in the Eighteenth Century, 1854; Evangelical Meditations, 1858; Studies in Pascal, 1859; Outlines of Philosophy and Literature, 1865; Outlines of Theology.]

VINTON, Francis, D.D., Episcopalian divine; b. at Providence, R.I., Aug. 29, 1809; d. in Brooklyn, L.I., Sept. 29, 1872. He was graduated at West Point, 1830; admitted to the bar at Portsmouth, N.H., 1830; left the army, 1836; took holy orders in New York, 1838; and was assistant minister at Trinity Church in that city, 1855-69. From 1869 till his death he was professor of ecclesiastical law and polity in the General Theological Seminary, New-York City. His principal works are, Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, New York, 1865, and Manual Commentary on the General Canon Law of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States, 1870. The latter is a standard work.

VIRET, Pierre, b. at Orbe, in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, May 4, 1511; d. at Orthez, Navarre, April 4, 1571. He studied theology in Paris, but embraced the Reformation, and was ordained a priest by Farel in 1531. Very active for the establishment of the Reformation in the French part of Switzerland, he worked for thirty years in Lausanne and Geneva. In 1561 he was called to Nismes, and shortly after to Lyons. Aug. 10, 1563, he presided over the fourth national synod of France. In 1565 he was compelled to leave Lyons; but in the following year he was appointed professor of the newly established academy of Orthez. He was a prolific writer. His principal work is his Instruction chrestienne en la doctrine de la loy et de l'Evangile, Geneva, 1564, 3 vols. fol., written, like most of his works, in the form of dialogue, and containing a complete system of morals and politics. His works, however, are literary rarities.

VIRGILIUS, St., noticed in church history as the opponent of Boniface. He was an Irishman by birth; joined Pepin at Chiersy in 743, and was by him recommended to Duke Odilo of Bavaria for the see of Salzburg, which he occupied from 744 or 745 to his death, Nov. 27, 784. Used to the freer forms of the church of his native country, he could not help coming into opposition to Boniface, who just at that time was active in establishing the strictest hierarchical forms in the German and Frankish churches. Twice Boniface complained of him to the Pope; and the last time he even accused him of heresy, as he held the view of the earth, that it was globular. But in both cases the Pope supported Virgilius, and in 1233 he was even canonized by Gregory IX. See the two letters from Pope Zacharias to Boniface in the Letters of Boniface (62 and 82), edited by Würdtwein.

VIRGINIA, Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of. This school, for the training of ministers for the Episcopal Church, is in Fairfax County, Va., two miles and a half west of Alexandria, and seven miles, in a straight line, from Washington, D. C. It was founded in 1823 by a number of churchmen of Virginia and Maryland, foremost among whom was Bishop Meade of Virginia. It was not, however, incorporated till 1854, owing to prejudice in the State against the incorporation of religious institutions. It opened in the city of Alexandria; and, for four years, instruction was given by the resident clergy and by the Rev. Dr. Keith. It was removed in 1827 to its present site, on a hill two hundred and fifty feet above the Potomac. The present buildings were erected by the munificence of Messrs. William H. and John L. Aspinwall of New York, John Bohlen of Philadelphia, and others. A beautiful chapel has been recently added by the contributions of the alumni and friends of the seminary. The first professor was the Rev. Reuel Keith, a graduate of Middlebury College, Vermont. He was a man of learning, and an earnest and impressive preacher. He translated Hengstenberg's Christology from the German. Dr. William Sparrow succeeded him as professor of systematic divinity in 1841, and was connected with the seminary till his death, in 1874. He was distinguished as a teacher and preacher. (See his Life and Correspondence, by C. Walker, D. D., Philadelphia, 1876; Selected Sermons.) Dr. James May succeeded Professor Lippitt in the chair of church history in 1841, and remained in office till 1861.

The number of students who have been connected with the seminary during its existence of sixty years is not far from seven hundred and fifty: of these about forty became foreign missionaries. The first missionary whom it sent out was the Rev. Dr. Hill, lately deceased, to Greece. Fifteen of its alumni have been connected with the China mission, among whom was Bishop Boone, a man eminently fitted for his work. Sixteen have been missionaries to Cape Palmas, West Africa, among whom was Bishop Payne, who bore the heat and burden of the climate for thirty-two years; and Colden Hoffman, of whom The London Christian Observer said, "The annals of missionary excellence do not furnish a brighter example than that of Colden Hoffman." The first missionary to Japan from any Protestant church, we believe, was from this seminary, as is also the present Bishop Williams.

There are now four professors in the seminary and an instructor in vocal culture. There is also a preparatory department, distinct from the seminary, for those who from any cause cannot go to a college, the course in which is two years. The number of volumes in the library is about twelve thousand.

VISITANTS, or NUNS OF THE VISITATION, a religious order which was founded in 1610, at Amcey, by St. Francis of Sales and Madame de Chantal. Originally the institution did not form an order, in the strict sense of the word, a religion, but simply a congregation, an association. No vow was made; no peculiar dress was put on. The ascetic exercises were very mild. The practical purpose was to visit the sick and the poor, and the association stood under the immediate supervision of the bishop. To prevent suspicion, however, it was found necessary, in 1618, to alter the constitution, and to transform the association into a regular order. The Augustinian rule was introduced, seclusion was enforced; and the only peculiar feature which was left untouched was the immediate supervision of the bishop. In 1626 the order was confirmed by Urban VIII. It grew rapidly. At the death of St. Francis it numbered thirteen houses, and at that of Madame de Chantal no less than eighty-seven houses, scattered over France, Italy, Switzerland, and Austria. Instead of visiting the poor and the sick, which became an impossibility by the introduction of strict seclusion in 1618, the practical purpose of the order became the education and instruction of young girls; and in that respect the order has acquired some reputation.

VISITATIO LINIMUM SS. APOSTOLORUM.

A visitatio lininum ex voto, that is, a visit to the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome, in consequence of a vow, seems to have been a very frequent occurrence in the middle ages. Pilgrims "who go to Rome for God's sake" are often spoken of, and much was done for their protection both in coming and going. The Pope put the ban on any one who robbed them, or in other ways molested them. There is also a considerable canonical legislation concerning the right to grant dispensations from such a vow, — a right which at one time the Pope tried to reserve to himself, but which finally became vested in the bishops. Of much greater importance, however, are the visits ex lege, demanded by law. As early as the eighth century, in 713, a Roman synod demanded that all bishops subordinate to the bishop of Rome as their metropolitan should meet personally in Rome once a year to give due account of the state of their dioceses. By Gregory VII. this demand was extended to all metropolitans of the Western Church; and finally Sixtus V. (by the bull Romanus Pontifex, Dec. 20, 1584) ordered the bishops of Italy, Dalmatia, Greece, and the adjacent islands, to visit Rome once in three years; those of Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Bohemia, Hungary, England, Scotland, and Ireland, once in four years; those from the rest of Europe, once in five years; and those from the other continents, once in ten years. By a constitution of Nov. 23, 1710, Benedict XIV. extended the demand to all abbots, friars, provosts, etc., having territorial jurisdiction.

VITALIAN, Pope (657–672), tried in vain to compel the bishop of Ravenna to recognize the authority of the see of Rome. He summoned Maurus to Rome; and, when Maurus did not come, he put him under the ban. But Maurus answered by putting Vitalian under the ban, and nothing was gained. More successful was his interference in the affairs of the Church of England, where he found a devoted ally in Archbishop Theodore of Canterbury.

VITALIS, properly ORDERICUS, b. at Attengesham, near Shrewsbury, Eng., Feb. 16, 1075;
d. about 1143. He came of a French family, and was sent to Normandy, where he became a monk at St. Evroul (1086), and assumed the name Vitalis in honor of St. Vidal. He took priest's orders 1107. He wrote Historia ecclesiastica, in three parts, from the creation to A.D. 1142. The third part is very interesting and important, especially because of its original information respecting Normandy and England. It was first edited by Duchesne, in his Hist. Norman. scriptoris, Paris, 1619, best by A. le Prevost, Paris, 1838-55, 5 vols.,
Eng. trans. by T. Forester, Bohn's Antiquarian
Library, London, 1853-56, 4 vols.

VITRINGA, Campegius, the most important of the older commentators upon Isaiah; b. at Leeuwarden, May 16, 1659; d. at Franeker, of apoplexy, after a long illness, March 31, 1722.
He was educated at Franeker and Leyden, and was professor in the former university from 1681 till his death,—first of the Oriental languages, then (1683) of theology, and finally, succeeding Perizonius, of church history (1693). He had only two literary combats,—one with Cocceius, his former teacher at Leyden, upon the form of Ezekiel's temple; and the other with Rhenford upon the so-called "men of leisure" of the synagogue.
His principal work is his Commentary on Isaiah (Commentarius in librum prophetiarum Jesaie, Leeu-warden, 1711-20, 2 vols., new ed., Basel, 1732, 2 vols.), a work of permanent value. Gesenius is especially emphatic in its commendation; declaring that it not only made an epoch in the study of Isaiah, but outweighs the earlier and a good part of the later expositions. Its faults, he says, arise from its following the Cocceian methods, and setting forth just where and how far the prophecies of Isaiah have been fulfilled. But in wealth of philological and exegetical learning, aptness of illustration, and fullness of historical information, he declares it is by no means superseded. [Nagelsbach, also, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Isaiah, in the Lange series, says of Vitringa's,
"This Commentary is distinguished as much by astounding learning, penetration, and sober sense, as by elegance of style and practical warmth." In a similar strain speak other great critics.]
Besides this Commentary, Vitringa wrote an important work upon the old synagogue (which appeared first under the title Archisynagogus obser-vationibus notis illustratus, Franeker, 1685, but subsequently, De synagoga vetere libri tres, 1696), and some other works of less or little interest. H.
Venema edited his posthumous Commentary upon Zechariah, Leeuwarden, 1731. ARNOLD.

VITUS (Veit), St., flourished, according to legend, in the time of Diocletian; was a native of Sicily, and the son of a Pagan father; embraced Christianity; fled to Italy, and was there tortured to death, as he would not recant. His remains were afterwards brought to St. Denis, and thence to Corvey. He is commemorated on June 15.

VIVES, Juan Ludovico de, b. at Valencia, in Spain, in March, 1492; d. at Bruges, in Flanders, May 6, 1540. He began to study philosophy in Paris, but became so disgusted at the empty subtleties of the Nominalists, Caspar Lax and Dullandus, that he left for Louvain, where he devoted himself to the study of classical languages and literatures. Soon he also began an open campaign against the reigning scholasticism; and his excellent work, Liber in Pseudo-Dialecticos, attracted general attention. Invited to England, he lectured with great success at Oxford; but, as he refused to support the king's schemes of divorce, he lost his favor, and was even for some time imprisoned. After his release he settled at Bruges, where he wrote his De disciplinis, Antwerp, 1531, and De veritate fidei christiane, which he intended to dedicate to Paul III. Though externally he remained a devoted son of the Roman-Catholic Church, he was suspected of inclining towards Protestantism; and many of his propositions, especially on morals and ascetics, could, soon after his death, not be repeated any more.
The best edition of his works is that of Valencia, 1782, in 8 vols. in quarto. Concerning his life his Letters contain much interesting information.

VOETIUS, Cysbertus, b. at Heusden, in the province of Holland, March 3, 1588; d. at Utrecht, Nov. 1, 1676. He studied theology at Leyden;
and was appointed pastor of Vlymen in 1611, and of Heusden in 1617, and professor of theology at Utrecht in 1634. He was a pupil of Gomarus, and, like his master, he assumed the attitude of an ecclesiastical Hercules, cleansing the Arminian Augean stable. A great scholar and an able dialectician, though of a somewhat scholastic turn, he was a strict Calvinist both in doctrine (Selectæ
Disputationes Theol., 1648) and in policy (Politie.
Eccles., 1663, 4 vols.). Arminianism, and its alliance with the liberal and republican party in politics, he considered as the greatest danger to the Dutch-Reformed Church, and he waged war against it to the bitter end. But his violent and protracted controversies with Cocceius (see MAX GÖBEL: Gesch. des christlich. Lebens in d. Rhein.
Westph. Evang. Kirche, ii.) and Cartesius (see Dis- quis. hist. theol. de pugna Voetium inter et Cartesium, Leyden, 1861) cannot fail to remind the reader that it is not necessary to belong to the Roman-Catholic Church in order to practise the maxim, that the end justifies the means. Among Voetius' other works are exercitia pietatis (1664), Diatribe de theologia (1668), etc. J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE.

VOLNEY, Constantin François Chassebœuf,
Comte de, b. Feb. 3, 1757; d. April 25, 1820.
After several years' travelling in the East, he wrote his Voyage en Egypte et en Syrie, 1787, which earned a great reputation for him; and in 1794 he was made professor of history in the normal school of Paris. As a man of the Revolution, he became a senator in 1794; and as an adversary of Napoleon, he was made a peer of France in 1814. In literature he is known as the author of a number of anti-Christian or anti-religious writings: Les Ruines, 1791 (often reprinted, and translated into several foreign languages; into English, New York, 1796, London, 1827); La loi naturelle, 1793; Histoire de Samuel, etc.

VOLTAIRE, b. in Paris, Nov. 21, 1694; d. there May 30, 1778. His true name was François Marie Arouet, to which he added in 1718, but from reasons not known, de Voltaire, which occurs among his maternal ancestors.

Voltaire was educated by the Jesuits in Collège Louis-le-Grand in Paris, where he learnt "nothing but Latin and nonsense," and was destined to study law. But his natural talent, no less than the levity of his disposition, drew him with irresistible force into literary life,—the theatre, the pamphlet, the salons, etc., where the efforts were short, and the triumphs rapid. He had wit, taste, a wonderful talent for turning every thing into verse, and a still more wonderful talent for dropping innuendoes, malicious or low, according to circumstances. He wrote small poems, satirical or complimentary, and said smart things at the supper-tables of dukes and abbés. In 1713 he obtained a diplomatic position as secretary to the French ambassador to Holland. But in The Hague he was most ridiculously taken in by a lady of semi-standing,—a certain Madame du Noyer, whose daughter he fell in love with, and tried to allure into an elopement. He was discharged, and sent back to Paris; and Madame du Noyer repaid herself for her troubles by publishing his love-letters. In 1714 he competed for the prize of the academy, but failed to obtain it. In 1717 some vicious lampoons on the regent and the Duchess of Berri were generally ascribed to him, and brought him to the Bastille, where he spent eleven months. But, soon after his release, his first tragedy, Œdipe, was brought on the stage with great success; and the success was followed up with still greater energy. The Henriade, a large epic on Henry IV., which he had begun in the Bastille, he printed, though he had not succeeded in obtaining the approbation of the royal censor, and it at once made his fame and his fortune. But Voltaire's ambition was always a little ahead of his powers, his impertinence a little ahead of his wit. Artémise failed completely; Marianne, partially; and one afternoon the Chevalier de Rohan, in order to avenge himself for some insolent repartee, had him beaten in the street by his footmen. Voltaire challenged him; but an hour after he was put in the Bastille, and released only on the condition that he immediately should leave for England.

From 1726 to 1729 he resided in London; and the acquaintance with English character and institutions, English literature and philosophy, exercised a great influence on him. It sobered down his temper a little; it gave him some respect for a solid argument; it developed his sense for practical results. He was much struck by the Newtonian construction of the universe. He studied Newton's works with great patience, for they lay, properly speaking, outside of his range; and by his Éléments de la philosophie de Newton (1738), and La métaphysique de Newton (1740), he contributed much to make the views of Newton accepted, not only in France, but on the European continent in general. From Locke he derived his whole psychology; from the English Deists, the metaphysical substructure of his general system of philosophy; from English history and institutions, his social and political ideas. There is a direct and demonstrable connection between the revolution of 1789 and his Lettres sur les Anglais, one of the brightest and most characteristic of his polemical writings. On his return to France in 1729, he soon found out that Paris was still an unsafe place for him to live in,—his Lettres had been publicly burnt by order of the Parliament as subversive to the State, the Church, public morality, etc.; and from 1731 to 1749 he made his home chiefly at Cirey, in the house of Madame du Châtelet, a lady for whose mathematical and philosophical talent he felt great respect, and for whose person he seems to have nourished a real feeling of tenderness; at least, he could for her sake sacrifice a good deal of his comfort, and not a little of his vanity. During this period he wrote some of his best tragedies,—Zaïre, Alzire, Mahomet, Mérope; two of his great historical works, Charles XII. and Siècle de Louis XIV., a score or more of polemical pamphlets, witty, malicious, indecent to an incredible degree; and an astonishing number of letters to all the most prominent persons in Europe. At the middle of the eighteenth century he stood as the greatest literary celebrity which the European civilization ever had produced, far exceeding Erasmus both in fame and power. And when, in 1750, he set out for Berlin, on the invitation of Friedrich II., it was not a pensioner threading his way to the table of his patron, but the king of the pen coming to visit the king of the sword. Voltaire and Friedrich admired each other. But Voltaire admired in Friedrich only the general, and Friedrich wanted to be admired as a poet; while, in Voltaire, Friedrich admired only the poet, and Voltaire wanted to be admired as a statesman. Ludicrous conflicts arose, almost from the hour of their first meeting; and soon the conflicts grew into a continuous warfare. At last Voltaire took to flight, 1753; but Friedrich pursued him, and had him actually arrested at Francfort. All Europe was ringing with laughter. The friendship, natural and necessary between those two men, served only to show to all the world what there was in them of weakness and vice, of frailty and fraud.

The last part of his life Voltaire spent at Ferney, an estate he bought in the county of Gex, conveniently situated near the Swiss frontier; and during this period some of the best features of his personal character came to light. There were forty-six miserable peasants at Ferney when he bought the estate: when he died, there were twelve hundred well-to-do inhabitants engaged in watch-making, silk-weaving, etc., and it was he who built their houses, bought their tools, sold their goods, etc. His defence of Jean Calas shows a courage and perseverance which are most admirable, and contributed more than many volumes could have done to convince people that religious toleration is necessary, not only for the development of truth, but for the very existence of good morals. But his writings — and among them are some of his most prominent works: Essai sur les Mœurs et l'Esprit des Nations, Dictionnaire Philosophique, etc. — show that his polemical passion had become intensified almost to the bursting-point, that his whole mental energy had concentrated itself around the famous motto, Ecrasez l'infâme, with which he ended every letter he sent to his friends. L'infâme meant, originally, the Roman-Catholic Church, then any church which has the support of the State for the enforcement of its doctrine and discipline, and finally it came to mean all religion, so far as it claims a supernatural origin. On this point his hatred is insatiable. It pervades all his writing, from Candide and Le diner du comte de Boulnevilliers to La Pucelle and L'Orphéline de la Chine; and in his minor pamphlets, newspaper-articles, letters, etc., it drags him not only below his dignity, but beneath decency. His own time, however, did not think so. When he went up to Paris in 1778, he was received with such enthusiasm and such ovations as the world had hardly ever seen before. But the excitement thereby produced was too much for his strength: he fell ill, took too big a dose of opium, and died in delirium.

Voltaire made his mark in literature as a poet. His Zaïre, Mahomet, and Mérope were considered the very acme of tragic art. Now, there cannot from those three long dramas be culled three single sentences in which the true accent of human nature is hit upon and rendered. Their poetical value is null, but their elegance is exquisite and perfect. When conventional rules are fulfilled with the same ease and spontaneity with which natural laws are obeyed, elegance is the result. To the public for which Voltaire wrote, tragic art was only a maze of intricate conventional rules; but he mastered those rules so completely, that his audience sat enchanted, transported, and gazed upon his tragedies as upon clouds of "woven wind" floating in the sunshine. Of more solid worth are his historical works. Robert Flint, in his The Philosophy of History in France and Germany, Edinburgh, 1871, vindicates him an honorable place in the development of the philosophy of history, and, no doubt, with right. But the true merit of Voltaire as an historian lies, not in his relation to the science, but in his relation to the public. He made history a part of all liberal education. With a few well-directed strokes he swept away the dull dreams and foul deceits of the monks, and fixed the attention of people upon that which had really taken place. Before him, history was to people in general a kind of moral picture-book, with examples to be imitated, and examples to be avoided; after him it became the principal material for the study of human nature and human affairs. To people in general his historical works opened up a new way to truth.

Finally, the philosophy of Voltaire. Strictly speaking Voltaire was no philosopher at all. The higher methods of extracting truth he had never learned, and he was by natural disposition incapable of that sustained effort of thought without which systematic views cannot be formed. Nevertheless, he is the true representative of the "Age of Reason;" and the great boast of that age was just its philosophy. Voltaire was not an atheist. He could sneer as heartily at the atheists as at the fanatics. He was a Deist, and started from the three well-known premises of Deism: God, the world, and between them no relation which can be represented under the form of divine revelation, special providence, etc. But to Voltaire God was only the result of a train of reasoning, an intellectual necessity. God is, because he must be: "if he were not, we would have to invent him." Of a personal relation between himself and God there was no trace; and, what is still worse, he did not understand that such a relation could truly exist. Whenever he met it, he felt inclined to attack it, no matter under what form it presented itself, — Judaism, Romanism, Protestantism, etc.; and of his general conception of God he often spoke with an undercurrent of cold indifference, illuminated now and then with sparks of cynicism, which, to men of strongly marked religious disposition, have made his works an outrage, an abomination. The world, on the contrary, was a very serious affair to Voltaire, and a thing he understood. He was a critic of the very highest rank. His instinct of truth was wonderfully sharp and vivid. He smelt a sham miles away; and he could make enormous exertions, and submit to exasperating annoyances, in order to hunt it down. With that instinct he combined a never equalled power of statement. Not that his wit is always enjoyable. In the service of his vanity, envy, and malice, and used to cover up deliberate falsehoods and lies, it is often shocking. But the directness, clearness, and precision of his statement of a fact or an idea has still more often made truth irresistible; and without entering into the details of his activity, his victories, and his defeats, it may be generally said that his criticism developed in modern literature a sense for that which is simple, natural, and clear. His best service was in the case of the Protestant Calas (see art). Outside of France, however, his works, his ideas, his influence, have ceased to act as a living spring. The waters have dried up. And, even within the bounds of French civilization, Voltairism is an active power only as battling with Jesuitism; the one or the other giving its color to the events, according as anarchism or despotism has the upper hand.

LIT. — Collected editions of Voltaire's works, as well of separate editions of his tragedies, histories, letters, etc., are very numerous: the latest and most complete of the collected editions is that of Paris, 1834, in 97 vols. The chief facts of his life are easily accessible, though not always incontroverted. CONDORCET was his first biographer (1787); JAMES PARTON (Life of Voltaire, Boston, 1881, 2 vols.), the latest and the best. The more obscure facts of his life, his relation to Madame du Châtelet, to the Berlin Jew bankers, etc., have been treated in a great number of special essays, but generally without any definite result. What might be called the anecdotes of his life, more or less authentic, but very instructive with respect to time and place, is found in BUNGNER: Voltaire et son temps, Paris, 1851; and JANIN: Le roi Voltaire, Paris, 1861, 3d ed. General surveys of his life, character, and influence, have been given by PIERSON, CARLYLE, STRAUSS, and MORLEY. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

VORSTIUS, Conrad, Arminian theologian, b. at Cologne, July 19, 1569; d. at Tönnigen, in Sleswick, Sept. 29, 1622. His parents were Roman Catholics; but he was refused the degree in the college of St. Laurentius in his native city, because he would not subscribe to the Confession of Trent; and soon after he openly embraced the Reformation. He distinguished himself as a student and lecturer in Heidelberg, Basel, and Geneva, and still more as teacher of theology in the gymnasium of Steinfurt. But some treatises he published (De predestinatione, De trinitate, De personis et officio Christi) made his orthodoxy suspected; and in 1599 he was called upon to defend himself at Heidelberg against the accusation of Socinianism. In 1610 he was appointed the successor of Arminius in the university of Leyden; but on account of his Tractatus de Deo, published in the same year, and containing many peculiar subtleties concerning the nature and attributes of God, his appointment was met with a violent protest by the Gomarists. James I. of England was drawn into the controversy, and made umpire among the contestants. He condemned Vorstius, and succeeded in having him expelled from Leyden. Vorstius settled at Tergow, but the controversy continued to rage. He was condemned by the synod of Dort as a heretic, and banished from the States, 1619. For a couple of years he kept himself concealed, but finally he found a refuge in Sleswick.

NEUDECKER.

VOSSIUS, Gerard, Provost of Tongern, papal prothonotary; d. at Liège, March 25, 1609; acquired a great reputation by his Latin translation of the sermons of Chrysostom, 1580, and his editions of the Gesta et monumenta Gregorii IX., 1586, of the works of Gregorius Thaumaturgus and Ephraem Syrus, 1589, of St. Bernard's De consideratione (with commentary), 1594, etc. Of his personal life nothing further is known.

VOSSIUS, Gerard Jan, b. near Heidelberg, 1577; d. in Amsterdam, March 19, 1649. He studied at Dort and Leyden; was first rector of the college of Dort, then of that of Leyden; and was in 1615 appointed professor of rhetoric and chronology at Leyden, and in 1633 professor of history in Amsterdam. He was originally a pupil of Gomarus, but in the course of the controversy he gradually approached the other side. In 1618 he published his Historia de controversiis quas Pelagius ejusque reliquia moerant, in which he showed that Arminianism was not identical with Semi-Pelagianism, and that the Calvinist doctrine of predestination was unknown to the ancient church. Persecutions were immediately instituted against him, and continued; though his De historicis latinis, 1627, contained a partial recantation.

VOTIVE-OFFERINGS consisted sometimes in objects of value, sometimes simply in tablets, which were placed in the temples as a thankful commemoration of some happy event or some great man. From the Greek-Roman Paganism, the custom was adopted by the Christians; and votive-tablets in the Christian churches are spoken of in the fifth century by Bishop Theodoret of Cyrus. As the worship of saints extended, the churches were crowded with votive-offerings, and in the Roman-Catholic Church the custom has not yet died out. Voltaire's brother placed a votive-tablet in the church in Paris in which Voltaire had been baptized, to expiate his infidelity.

VOWS. The conception of a personal God who has a will as well as the power, and the personal relation which necessarily springs up between God and man on the basis of this conception, naturally call forth the ideas of offerings which could and should be presented to God, and of solemn promises by which man binds himself to present such offerings. Thus arises the religious vow (votum, vœu). It may come forth as the simple result of man's desire to give a fit expression to his feeling of gratitude and devotion to God, and no expression could be more fit than the offering of something particularly dear or valuable. Or it may be made with a view to the obtaining of some great benefit, as, for instance, the rescue from some overhanging danger: the vows of the Old Testament very often show this character of conditionality. Or, finally, it may by man be considered as the most effective means by which to keep himself in the closest possible communion with God: no doubt, such a consideration lay at the bottom of the asceticism of the ancient church. But under all three forms the religious vow is a voluntary promise, the offering of something which is not due.

The New Testament gives no direct advice with respect to vows. The Gospels contain only the one sharp utterance from the lips of Jesus concerning gifts to the temple when accompanied with neglect of parents (Matt. xv. 4; Mark vii. 10). The apostolical Epistles are completely silent on the question; and from Acts xxi. 23 (see NAZARITES) and xviii. 18 no positive doctrine can be extracted. The latter passage is, however, very obscure: it seems to refer to Aquila, and not at all to Paul. Thus the question, What position ought to be given to vows in true Christian morals? cannot be answered from the letter of Scripture. The answer must be deduced from the general principles of morality such as they have been laid down in the New Testament, and developed in Christian conscience. But on this point a striking difference reveals itself between the evangelical churches and the Church of Rome.

The idea that the pious feels driven in his conscience to present offerings to his God has not only been recognized by Christianity, but in Christianity it has attained its most extensive bearing and its deepest meaning. For what is the offering which Christianity demands? Nothing less than the person himself, his whole life, all his will (comp. Rom. vi. 11, 13, vii. 4, xii. 1; Gal. ii. 20; 2 Cor. v. 16). In this general, expanded sense, the promise made at baptism, and renewed at confirmation, is certainly a vow. But the vow in the narrower and more proper sense of the word, defining the offering as something special, and not due, the evangelical churches do not recognize. Luther, no less than Calvin, held that whatsoever degree of devotion to God a person was able to realize in his life, it was simply his duty, and implicitly contained in his baptismal promise. Quite otherwise in the Roman-Catholic Church. Beside the common morality to which all Christians are bound by the commandment of God, she establishes another and higher morality, which is not a divine commandment, and consequently not a moral duty, but which may become an object of a vow.

The Roman-Catholic view of vows is closely connected with the Roman-Catholic doctrines of Consilia evangelica, Opera supererogationis, and Bonum melius. From Petrus Lombardus, who, however, made a distinction between a votum singulare and the votum commune made at baptism, and down to our time, the Roman-Catholic Church had always defined a vow as a voluntary promise to God of a bonum melius. Classical in this respect is the exposition of Thomas Aquinas (Summa, ii. 2, qu. 88): a vow, strictly speaking, distinguished from the baptismal promise, which is necessary to salvation (fit de bono meliori, dicitur melius bonum quod ad supererogationem pertinet). The bonum melius here appears as synonymous with opus supererogatorium, and Thomas actually defines it as something beyond that which is necessary to salvation, though it is evident that the bonum melius refers exclusively to some special virtues, — poverty, obedience, chastity; while an opus supererogatorium may result also from doing more than is necessary in the ordinary line of morality.

VOWS AMONG THE HEBREWS. Vows (נָדָרִים, "nedarim") are solemn promises to God, on condition of his granting some benefit, to make an offering in return. The passages in the Pentateuch giving information about them are Lev. xxvii. and Num. xxx. There is no sufficient reason for denying the high antiquity of this practice (Gen. xxviii. 20-22), and the historical books of the Old Testament, the Psalms, and the writings of the Salomonic period, show how prevalent it was in Israel. Vows included persons, animals, and other possessions. Persons, however, were always to be redeemed according to their estimated value. The redemption-price differed according to the age and sex of the person, except in the case of the poor, where it was estimated according to their property. The votive-offerings had the character of compulsory offerings, and differed in this regard from the freewill gifts. Amongst the votive-offerings were the acts of renunciation or abstinence; such as fasting and the obligations of the Nazarite. It is characteristic of the moral tone of the Mosaic legislation, that it excludes all unnatural mortification, such as self-mutilation and other injuries to the body, which were reasons for exclusion from the theocratic congregation (Deut. xxiii. 1; comp. Lev. xix. 18).

The practice of vows corresponds to the condition of minority under the law, but the Mosaic legislation lays no particular stress upon it. "If thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee" (Deut. xxiii. 22). Nowhere is the vow spoken of as meritorious, nor is there any indication that God was regarded as granting requests with reference to or because of the vows. The motive actuating them was insisted upon (Ps. lxi. 13 sqq., lxxvi. 11 sqq.; Mal. i. 14), and the inviolability of the promise was insisted upon (Num. xxx. 2; Deut. xxiii. 21 sqq.). To the simple injunctions of the Old Testament, the Mishna, in the tract Nedarim, adds many rules, which it supports by casuistry, laying particular emphasis upon the language in which they are made. Korban ("it is devoted to God as an offering") was the usual votive-word; and our Lord, in speaking of it (Matt. xv. 5; Mark vii. 11), assumes that a son by its use might even rid himself of the obligation to support his parents. Such cases happened, as is evident from Nedarim, v. 6. De Wette goes too far, when, in commenting upon Matt. xv. 5, he says with reference to Nedarim, ix. 1, "Rabbi Elieser held the law of reverence for parents higher than all vows; but the rabbins declared vows against this law binding." The Mishna does not declare offerings and duties to God arbitrarily assumed, and militating against the law of love, unbinding and worthless. It is, however, true, that the traditional observances condemned by our Lord, the Mishna also disapproves. Christianity was not without influence upon Judaism.

WACKERNAGEL, Karl Eduard Philipp, D.D., German hymnologist: b. at Berlin, June 28, 1800; d. at Dresden, June 20, 1877. He was educated at Erlangen. His reputation rests upon his editions of the hymns of Martin Luther and Paul Gerhard, and his hymnological publications, — Das deutsche Kirchenlied von Martin Luther bis auf Nicolaus Herman u. Ambrosius Blauer, Stuttgart, 1841; Bibliographie zur Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes im 16. Jahrhundert, Frankfurt-am-Main, 1855; Das deutsche Kirchenlied von der ältesten Zeit bis zu Anfang des 17. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1862–73, 4 vols.; Lieder der niederländischen Reformierten aus der Zeit der Verfolgung im 16. Jahrhundert, Frankfurt-am-M., 1867. See LUDWIG SCHULZE: Philipp Wackernagel. Ein Lebensbild, Leip., 1879.

WADDELL, James, D.D., eminent Presbyterian blind pulpit orator; b. at Newry, Ireland, July, 1739; d. at Hopewell, Louisa County, Va., Sept. 17, 1805. His parents emigrated to Pennsylvania while he was an infant. He was educated in Dr. Finley's academy at Nottingham, Penn.; licensed by presbytery of Hanover, April 2, 1761; ordained, June 16, 1762; pastor in Lancaster and Northumberland, Va. He subsequently held other charges. His eloquence was renowned. But by his own request all his manuscripts were burned, so that his reputation rests upon testimony alone. He was blind for the last twenty years of his life. He was the father-in-law of Dr. Archibald Alexander. Wirt gives a picture of him in his British Spy. See STRAGUE'S Annals, iii. 255 sqq.

WADDING, Luke, Roman Catholic, the great historian of the Franciscan order: b. at Waterford, Ireland, Oct. 16, 1588; d. at Rome, Nov. 18, 1657. He studied theology in Lisbon, Portugal; became a Franciscan 1605; read lectures on divinity in the university of Salamanca; went to Rome, 1618, as chaplain to Anthony à Trejo, bishop of Cartagena, and remained there the rest of his life. In 1625 he founded there the college of St. Isidore for Irish students of the Franciscan order. From 1630 to 1634 he was procurator of his order at Rome, and from 1645 to 1648 vice-commissary. He was one of the councillors in the settlement of the Jansenist controversy, and pronounced an opinion in favor of these doctrines; but, on the appearance of the bull of Innocent X. (Cum occasione, 1653), he retracted. His works include Legatio Philippi III. et IV., regum Hispaniæ, ad Paulum V., Gregorium XV., et Urbanum VIII. pro definienda controversia immaculate conceptionis B. Mariæ Virginis, Louvain, 1624 (a history of the controversy, to decide which the bishop of Cartagena came to Rome as an ambassador, and thus it was the occasion of Wadding's Roman residence); Apologeticus de prætenso monachatu Augustiniano S. Francisci, Madrid, 1625; Annales ordinis Minorum, Lyons and Rome, 1625–54, 8 vols., later ed., Rome, 1731–36, 16 vols., vol. 17th, Index — this is the great history of the Franciscan order: Wadding brought it down to 1540; it has been continued by De Luca to 1553 (vol. 18, 1740), by Ancona to 1564 (vol. 19, 1745), by Ascu-lano to 1574 (vol. 20, 1794), by De Cerreto to 1584 (vol. 21, 1841) — Scriptores ordinis Minorum, 1650, new edition with Sbaraglia's corrections, 1806 (a bibliography of the order); Immaculate conceptionis Virginis Mariæ opusculum, 1655; Vita Clementis VIII., later edition, 1723. He also edited the Sermons of Anthony of Padua (1624), the Opuscula of Francis of Assisi (Lyons, 1637), the works of Duns Scotus, with a Life (1639, 12 vols.), and superintended the publication of the posthumous Hebrew Concordance of Marius de Calasio (Rome, 1621, 4 vols. folio), to which he contributed an essay upon the Hebrew language. See CONCORDANCE, p. 523.

WADDINGTON, George, D.D., b. in England, Sept. 7, 1793; d. at Durham, July 20, 1869. He was elected fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; then travelled extensively in the East; was installed dean of Durham, 1840, and in the following year became first warden of the university of Durham. Besides books of travel in Ethiopia, in connection with Barnard Hanbury (1822), and Greece, during the Greek Revolution (1825), he wrote History of the Church from the Earliest Ages to the Reformation (1833, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1835), and History of the Reformation on the Continent, 1841.

WAFER, the small circular disk of unleavened bread, stamped either with the figure of Christ or with the initials I.H.S., and used in the celebration of the mass in the Roman-Catholic Church. In form it resembles the Jewish passover bread. The wafer eaten by the priest is larger than that given to the laity. It is supposed that the use of the wafer is not earlier than the eleventh century; previously, ordinary bread was generally used. See art. "Oblaten," in WETZER u. WILTE.

WAGENSEIL, Johann Christoph, b. at Nuremberg, Nov. 26, 1633; d. at Altdorf, Oct. 9, 1705, where he had been professor since 1667. — first of history, next of Oriental languages (1671), and finally of ecclesiastical law (1697). He wrote the famous works, Sola h. e. liber Mishnicus de uxore adulterii suspecta, Altdorf, 1674 (a translation, with notes, of the Mishna tractate upon the treatment of a wife suspected of adultery), and Tela Ignea Satanae, sive, arcani et horribiles Judaorum adversus Christum Deum et Christianum religionem libri, Altdorf, 1681 (a translation and refutation, in Latin, of certain anti-Christian Jewish writings).

WAHABEES, the representatives of a reformatory movement which arose within Mohammedanism in the middle of the eighteenth century. The movement, which may be characterized as a Mohammedan rationalism, accepting the Koran as authoritative, but rejecting the worship of Mohammed as idolatry, originated in the tribe of Nedshi in Yemen, and was named, after its originator, Mohammed-ben-Abd-el-Wahab. At the beginning of the present century the Wahabees reached the culminating point of their power. In 1802 they occupied Mecca, and compelled the Turks to pay a yearly tribute in order to be allowed to enter it as pilgrims; and in 1808 they even threatened Cairo, and invaded Syria. But in 1812 Mehemet Ali invaded Arabia; and in 1818 his son, Ibrahim Pasha, sent Abdallah, the head of the Wahabees, to Constantinople to be executed. Politically their power is now nearly confined to their native tribe in Yemen.

WAINWRIGHT, Jonathan Mayhew, D.D., D.C.L. (Oxon.), Protestant-Episcopal provisional bishop of New York; b. in Liverpool, Eng., Feb. 21, 1792; d. in New-York City, Sept. 21, 1854. He was graduated from Harvard College 1812; ordained 1816; was rector in Hartford (Conn.), Boston, and New York. He was consecrated Nov. 10, 1852. He was for many years secretary of the house of bishops, and the author of several books of travel, controversy (especially one with Dr. Potts on episcopacy, New York, 1844), and biblical exposition. See Memorial Volume (thirty-four of his sermons, and memoir by Bishop Doane, New York, 1856) and his Life, by J. N. Norton, New York, 1858.

WAKE, William, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Blandford, Dorsetshire, Eng., 1657; d. at Lambeth, Jan. 21, 1737. He was educated at Oxford; and was successively D.D. and canon of Christ Church (1689), dean of Exeter (1701), bishop of Lincoln (1705), and archbishop of Canterbury (1716). He was a very learned man, and wrote many works; but probably he is best known to-day as the author, in connection with Dr. J. E. Grabe, of a translation of The Genuine Epistles of the Apostolical Fathers, London, 1693, many editions and reprints. Dr. Wake gives to all these epistles primitive and apostolical antiquity.

WAKEFIELD, Gilbert, English divine; b. at Nottingham, Feb. 22, 1756; d. in London, Sept. 9, 1801. He was graduated at Cambridge, 1776, obtained a fellowship; took holy orders, left (1786), and violently assailed the Established Church. He joined no other communion. From 1779 to 1783 he was classical tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington, and for a year (1790-91) the same in the dissenting academy at Hackney. His later views were Unitarian. Gentle in domestic life, he yet was acrimonious in controversy. He published editions of Bion and Moschus, Virgil and Lucretius, and many original books, of which may be mentioned, An enquiry into the opinions of the Christian writers of the three first centuries concerning the person of Christ, London, 1784 (only vol. 1 printed); Enquiry into the expediency and propriety of social worship, 1791 (in which he takes strong ground against it); Translation of the New Testament, 1791, 3 vols. (2d ed., 1795, 2 vols.; reprinted, Cambridge, Mass., 1820); An examination of the Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine, 1794.

WALCH is the name of two German theologians of note. — I. Johann Georg Walch, b. at Meiningen in 1693; d. at Jena, Jan. 13, 1775. He studied theology at Leipzig; edited Ovid and Lactantius; published in 1716 his valuable Historia critica Lat. linguæ, and was in 1719 appointed professor eloquentiæ at Jena. He took part in the philosophical controversy between Buldeus and Wolf, and published in 1726 his Philosophisches Lexikon, in which, at every point, the so-called natural theology breaks through the old Lutheran orthodoxy, opening the way on one side for pietism, and on the other for rationalism.

In 1724 he was made professor of theology. His principal theological works are, Einleitung in die Religionsstreitigkeiten ausser der evangelisch-luther. Kirche, 1733-36, 5 vols., and Einleitung in die Religionsstreitigkeiten der evang.-luther. Kirche, 1730-39, 5 vols., and an edition of Luther's works, Halle, 1740-52, 24 vols. — II. Christian Wilhelm Franz Walch, son of the preceding; b. at Jena, Dec. 25, 1726; d. at Göttingen, March 10, 1784. He studied theology under his father; visited Holland, France, Switzerland, and Italy; and was appointed professor of philosophy in 1750 at Jena, and in 1753 at Göttingen, where, in 1754, he became professor of theology, and worked for thirty years with as much success as energy. He was not a creative genius. He belonged to the same kind of minds as Mosheim and Semler, though without equalling them. His works are, nevertheless, of great importance, especially in the department of church history. He felt that God might be studied in the same way, and with the same advantage, in history as in nature. But even in his Geschichte der evang.-luther. Religion, 1753, a work of great vigor and freshness, he did not succeed in raising that idea — true by itself, and very fertile — into a higher view of the philosophy of history: it sinks down into a merely apologetic application of a rather narrow notion of Providence. His Ketzehistorie, 1762, 11 vols., is an almost exhaustive collection, and fully methodical arrangement, of the materials; and the conclusions are always drawn with caution and conscientiousness. But that power which penetrates the given materials so as to reproduce the organic developments of history, he entirely lacked. The book, which is his principal work, is, nevertheless, still an invaluable aid for the student of church history. Prominent among his other works are his Hist. der römischen Päbste, Göttingen, 1756; Historie der Kirchenversammlungen, Leipzig, 1759; Biblioth. Symbol. Vetus, Lemgo, 1770, etc. Dissertations on his life and writings were written by Henmann, Less, and Heyne, 1784. W. MÖLLER.

WALDEGRAVE Samuel, D.D., son of Earl of Waldegrave; b. 1817; d. Oct. 1, 1869. He was graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, as a double first-class, 1839. In 1849 he was elected fellow of All Souls; in 1853 appointed Bampton Lecturer; in 1860 bishop of Carlisle. His writings include New-Testament Millenarianism (his Bampton Lectures), London, 1855, 2d ed., 1866; and the posthumous, Christ the True Altar, and other Sermons, with Introduction by Rev. J. C. Ryle, 1875.

WALDENSES. As the Latin Church with steadily-increasing force developed those features which specially characterize her as the Church of Rome, the instincts of the ancient Catholic Church, time after time, broke out in open resistance. In the Waldenses this opposition found one of its strongest expressions; and their history is so much the more interesting, as, besides the Bohemian and Moravian Brethren, they are the only party of mediæval dissenters who have maintained themselves down to our times.

Origin and Earlier History. — Lyons was the cradle of the Waldenses, whence they were often called Leonistæ, Leonenses, Lugdunenses, or Pauperes de Lugduno, and it is worth noticing, that both on account of its excellent cathedral-school, and on account of the ability of its bishops and archbishops, the Church of Lyons held the most prominent position in Gaul, exhibiting in its history many grand examples — Agobard, Amolo, etc. — of the true type of ancient Catholicism; while on the other hand the Cathari had met with very little success there. The originator of the new movement was Waldus, or Valdesius, or Waldensis, a rich and distinguished citizen of Lyons, who flourished in the latter part of the twelfth century. A very natural desire to know what the lectiones, the recitals from the Vulgate, really contained, led him to procure a translation of them into the vernacular tongue, the Romanunt, a Provençal dialect; and, as he felt the great use of a guide in studying the Bible, the translation of the Bible, or of parts of it, was followed by translations of extracts from the Fathers. But in all this there was nothing extraordinary. The translation and reading of the Bible had not yet been forbidden by the Church. But the reading of the Bible led to the imitation of Christ. Waldus felt compelled to take the rule of his life from the Gospels, and in that point there were many who agreed with him. They gave away their property to the poor, and began to preach publicly in the city. They preached in the streets, in the houses, even in the churches, and they produced a deep impression. The church took fright, and the archbishop finally forbade them to preach. They protested, refused to obey, and were expelled from the city. Taking their wives and children with them, they set out on a preaching-mission, and scattered all over the southern part of France, where the soil had been well prepared for them, partly by the Cathari, and partly by the notorious insufficiency and immorality of the priests. Travelling two and two together, clad in woollen penitence-garments, with bare feet or wooden shoes (sabot, or zabate, whence they were often called Sabatati, Nabatenses, etc.), they penetrated into Switzerland and Northern Italy, well received everywhere as the poor Waldenses from Lyons. There was, however, as yet, no breach with the church. The Waldenses were not conscious of any decisive difference between themselves and the church. When they were expelled from Lyons, they appealed to the third council of the Lateran (1179), and by Alexander III. they were treated with great leniency; but, as they would not stop preaching, they were put under the ban by Lucius III. (1181), and the measure was repeated by the fourth council of the Lateran, under Innocent III. (1215). Conflicts arose: and in some places, as, for instance, in Aragonia, under Alfonso II. (1194), very harsh proceedings were instituted against them; but in other places a spirit of reconciliation prevailed, not without prospects of good results. At the religious disputation of Pamiers (1207), between the bishop of Osma and a number of Waldenses, a certain Durandus of Huesca or Osea, a Waldensian, was induced to rejoin the church, together with his friends, on the condition that they should be allowed to retain the austere rule of life which they had adopted from the Waldenses. In 1209 Innocent III. gave his consent, and thus arose the so-called “Catholic Poor” (pauperes catholici). Similar movements occurred in other places; and, generally speaking, the Waldenses had an aversion to the Cathari and their heresies, which formed a bond of union between them and the church. But the state of affairs which at this time developed in Southern France — the crusades against the Albigenses, instituted by the Pope himself, and executed by Louis IX., Friedrich II., Raymond VII., etc.; the foundation of the Inquisition by Gregory IX. in 1232; and the establishment of the Dominican order as perpetual papal inquisitors — finally exercised its influence also on them. The Council of Toulouse (1229) forbade laymen to read the Bible, whether in Latin or in the vernacular tongue; and the Council of Tarracona (1234) extended the prohibition to the clergy. Under such circumstances the Waldenses could not help becoming aware of the very sharp differences between themselves and the church, involved in their very first principles; and they were thus forced into a position of open antagonism with respect to the church. Excluded from the ruling church by the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215, they were by no means willing to concede that they were excluded from the true church. Nor were they prepared to represent themselves as the true church, and the Church of Rome as a mere fraud. But they claimed to be the true and sound kernel of the church general; and they protested that the perversion of the Church of Rome began with Pope Sylvester when he accepted riches and worldly power from Constantine the Great.

Doctrine and Discipline. — The great informing idea of the Waldensian Church, no less than its relation to the ruling church, made the formation of an order of preachers, and their complete education, an affair of paramount importance. The preachers, who were called perfecti, in contradistinction from the merely credentes (“faithful”), lived in poverty and celibacy. After due preparation and instruction, they were subjected to an examination concerning the fundamental articles of faith (such as contained in the Apostles’ Creed), the principal points of difference with respect to the Cathari, the seven sacraments, etc. After promising to obey God, to remain chaste, and to live in voluntary poverty, they received the ordination by the laying-on of hands. According to some accounts, there existed hierarchical distinctions of bishops, priests, and deacons among the perfecti, and the frequently occurring terms of majoralis, magister, major, minor, may refer to such distinctions. But, according to other accounts, the Waldenses held that every “good man” could, without any charge from any human hand, legitimately perform all the offices of a priest, even administer the Lord’s Supper (conficere corpus Christi). After the example of the seventy disciples, the preachers were sent out two and two. In order to escape the notice of the priests, they used various disguises, introducing themselves as tinkers, peddlers, etc. They carried books with them, — parts of the Bible translated into Romanunt, devotional treatises consisting of extracts from the Fathers, rithmi, or poetical exhortations of moral import, etc. When possible, they gathered the faithful to service in secluded places: if not, they visited them in the families, preaching to them, hearing their confessions (which were made auricular, and in a kneeling position), and giving them absolution. Generally some penance (melioramentum), consisting of prayers, fasts, and alms, was added to the absolution, but only in the form of advice. There were, however, congregations among the Waldenses which considered the contrition of the heart and the silent prayer to God as the only confession and penance necessary. The moral teaching was very austere; its object being to penetrate human life in all its details with the principles of Christianity, and make it holy. The whole system was based upon a radical and uncompromising distinction between good and evil: there are only two ways, — one leading to heaven, and the other to hell. The doctrine of purgatory, and all doctrines connected with it, — masses, alms, prayers for the dead, etc., — they rejected. Certain commandments of the Gospels they enforced literally and with the utmost rigor. All swearing was forbidden. In consequence of Matt. vii. 1, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," they denied the right of civil authorities to inflict capital punishment. Any and every lie was a deadly sin. None had the right to punish those who deviated from the church; for it was in the character of the church to be persecuted, not to persecute. With respect to the saints, they taught to reverence them, and always keep them before the mind's eye as examples, but not to worship them or pray to them. With respect to the sacraments it is certain that the Waldenses had their children baptized by the Roman-Catholic priests, and that no kind of baptismal act was performed by the admission into the sect. It seems, however, from the answer of Bucer to G. Morel (1530), that their coming into contact with Anabaptists caused them some uneasiness on this point. The Lord's Supper the faithful took in the Roman-Catholic Church, with the permission of their preachers. After the excommunication, the preachers themselves administered the sacrament; but as the Waldenses believed that the transubstantiation took place, not in the hand of the priest, but in the mouth of the communicant, there was no reason why they should not receive the Eucharist from the Roman-Catholic priest. It must not be overlooked, however, that the consequences of the principles from which the Waldenses started reached much farther than was at first understood, and that, consequently, their doctrinal system became differently developed in different places and under different circumstances. Thus it seems very improbable, in spite of their aversion to the Cathari, that they should in no wise have been influenced by them. Many features of organization and discipline, and many points of doctrinal and moral teaching, were common to both parties; and everywhere the Cathari preceded the Waldenses. Stephanus says expressly of the Waldenses, that, after their excommunication, they became much mixed up with other heretics. And he states, that in 1230 there were Waldenses in Lyons, who in many points agreed with the Brethren of the Free Spirit, — a remark which is so much the more noticeable as traces of such an amalgamation are met with again in the middle of the sixteenth century.

Spread of the Sect. — The principal seat of the Waldenses was on the slopes of the Cottian Alps, east in Piedmont, west in Provence and Dauphiné. The first mention of their appearance in the diocese of Turin dates from 1198, when Bishop Jacob of Turin obtained a decree of expulsion from Otho IV.; but the exact locality in which they appeared is not mentioned. A few decades later on, traces of them are found at Pignerol, on the border of those valleys which they now occupy. In 1220 Count Thomas of Savoy and the magistrate of Pignerol imposed a fine on any one who should be convicted of having shown hospitality to a Waldensian. In 1297 persecutions were instituted against them in the Valley of Perosa, and in 1312 one of them was burnt there at the stake. In the latter year they were so numerous in the valleys of Luserna and Perosa, that their assemblies often consisted of more than five hundred members. They arose against the inquisitor Albert; they killed the priest of Angrogne; and in 1376 they even killed an inquisitor. In 1403 the Waldenses in Lombardy, in Montferat, and in the diocese of Turin, were visited by the celebrated preacher Vincentius Ferrerius. He found the inhabitants of the Valley of Angrogne very much neglected by the Roman-Catholic clergy. For a period of thirty years they had been visited only twice a year by Waldensian preachers from Apulia. He succeeded in leading a number of them back into the Church of Rome, but most of them remained faithful. In 1475 new persecutions were instituted by Duchess Iolantha of Savoy; and, a few years later on, Pope Innocent VIII. waged actual war upon them, sending an army of ten thousand men against them under his legate, Albert de Capitaneis. Duke Philip VII. took them under his protection, and granted them some privileges; but in 1500 they were again persecuted. On the western slopes of the Cottian Alps, the Waldenses were generally confounded with the Cathari, and suffered immensely in consequence thereof. In 1335 Benedict XII. exhorted the bishops of Valence and Vienne to eradicate the sect altogether. In 1360, however, a considerable number of Waldenses came from Piedmont into Provence, and settled at Cabrières, Merindol, and other places in the neighborhood. As they were excellent agriculturists, they were well received and protected by the feudal lords of the land; and, as they externally belonged to the Church of Rome, Louis XII. granted them certain privileges by an edict of 1478, which was finally confirmed by Alexander VI. in 1502. Emigrants from the Cottian Alps settled, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, in Calabria, and founded the villages of St. Sixt, Argentina, La Rocca, Vaccarisso, and Guardia. In 1400 a new emigration took place, this time to Apulia, where the villages of Monlione, Montanato, Faito, La Cella, and La Motta, were founded. The Waldenses had also houses in Florence, Genoa, and Venice. At various times they appear to have been very numerous in Bern, Strassburg, Passau, etc. In the last-mentioned place they attracted attention by refusing to pay tithes, and by rejecting monasticism, infant baptism, exorcism, and the sacrament of confirmation. When the reformatory movement began in Bohemia, they naturally were attracted by it; and their connection with the Bohemian Brethren became a turning-point in their history. In 1467 the Brethren entered into negotiations with a Waldensian congregation settled in Austria; but the Roman-Catholic clergy became aware of what was going on, and frustrated all attempts at a union. More successful were the Brethren in their address to the Waldenses settled in the Mark: a union was actually effected. In 1497 a connection was established between the Brethren and the Waldenses in Piedmont. In that year two Brethren—Lucas of Prague, author of the Bohemian Catechism, and Thomas of Landskron,—were sent out, with letters of recommendation from King Wenceslaw and the Bohemian barons, to the kings and princes and authorities in Italy and France, for the purpose of investigating the state of all dissenting parties in those countries. They found Waldenses everywhere, even in Rome itself, and brought back two letters from them,—one to the king and the barons, and one to the Utraquist ministers, drawn up by Thomas de fonte citiculæ. Thus, at the opening of the period of the Reformation, there were numerous Waldensian settlements on the Cottian Alps, in Naples, and in Provence around Cabrières and Merindol, besides scattered congregations in Italy, Switzerland, France, and Germany. Externally they were members of the Roman-Catholic Church, and enjoyed peace; but, as appears from the confessions of G. Morel, their internal state, religious and moral, had at that time fallen below the original standard of the party.

First Period of Literature.—The Waldenses had a literature almost from their very origin. The manuscripts of this literature are chiefly found at Geneva, Cambridge, and Dublin; though single works may also be found at Grenoble, Zurich, and Paris. Of special interest is the collection at Cambridge. It was made by Morland, who in 1658 was sent to Piedmont by Cromwell. On his return he deposited the manuscripts in the university library of Cambridge; but, shortly after, they disappeared, and they were generally considered as lost, until in 1862 they were rediscovered by Mr. Bradshaw. (See H. Bradshaw: On the Recovery of the Long-lost Waldensian Manuscripts, in the memoirs of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, March 10, 1862, No. XVIII.; and Groome: The Long-lost Waldensian Manuscripts, in the Christian Advocate and Review, January, 1863, No. 23.) The language in which this literature is written is the Romaunt, a peculiar idiom, easily distinguishable on the one side from that of the Troubadours, on the other from that of the Consolamentum of the Cathari, and their translation of the New Testament. As no other monuments of the Romaunt idiom have come down to us, it seems to have been confined within rather narrow geographical boundaries, and every thing points to the western slopes of the Cottian Alps as its home. It is nearly identical with that employed by G. Morel, in his Mémoires; and Morel was a native of Fraissimès, in Dauphiné, and active as a preacher among the Waldenses of Merindol, Cabrières, and other places in Provence; but it differs considerably from that employed in the decree of the synod of Angrogne (1532), which approached very closely to the Italian. The oldest writings of the Waldenses are translations from Scripture and from the Fathers. The translation of the New Testament is complete; but of the Old only the five libri sapientiales—Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Wisdom of Solomon, and Ecclesiasticus—have been translated. Of the manner in which they made extracts and translations from the Fathers, the Vergier de Consolation, or “Garden of Comfort,” is a good specimen, employing with considerable adroitness the words of the great fathers and teachers of the church for the defence of the peculiar Waldensian maxims. The remaining prose literature consists of sermons, treatises, and commentaries, of which especially that on the Canticles is of interest. Among the poetical productions the Nobla Leycon (from the Latin lectio, “a portion of Scripture,” “an oration”) occupies the most prominent place. It is an exhortation to repentance, virtue, good works, etc., carefully avoiding the false manner of quieting conscience employed by the church, and powerfully inculcating the Waldensian principles on the various fields of morality. It dates from the fifteenth century. La payre eternal is a sublime hymn of praise to the Trinity: La barca, La noel confort, etc., are chiefly of moral character. In the beginning of the sixteenth century, however, that is, between the visit of the two emissaries from the Bohemian Brethren to Piedmont in 1497, and the first communication between the Waldenses of Provence and the Swiss and German Reformers, the Waldensian literature took a new departure under Bohemian auspices. The very answers which the Waldenses sent back to King Wenceslaw and the Utraquist ministers, and still more a little original treatise on Antichrist, dating from the same time, show the great commotion which the acquaintance with the Brethren had produced among them. The Waldensian Catechism (Las interrogacions menors) was drawn up upon the model of the Bohemian, though containing many features of its own; and a number of treatises on the sacraments, the decalogue, purgatory, worship of the saints, fasts, etc., were translated, or adapted from the Bohemian. The influence of this whole movement was immense. The idea of a complete separation from the Roman-Catholic Church became more familiar to the Waldenses. The biblical principle, that the ordinance of Christ is sufficient to salvation without the ceremonies of the old dispensation, and without the right of modern but merely human institution, was more precisely defined. The doctrine of transubstantiation became hollow, and was dropped. The doctrine of the seven sacraments assumed the aspect of being mere human invention, and was warmly contested. The worship of saints and the doctrine of purgatory were peremptorily rejected as opposed to Scripture, etc. Thus the acquaintance with the Bohemian Brethren, no less than the fundamental Waldensian principle, to study the Bible, and make it the rule of life, led the Waldenses directly to the Reformation.

Relation to the Reformation.—In 1530 the Waldenses settled on the French side of the Cottian Alps, sent George Morel and Pierre Masson (Bucer calls him Pierre Lathom) to the Swiss and German Reformers to lay before them an account of the moral and religious state of the congregation, and to ask explanation of certain doubted points of doctrine and discipline. The two emissaries first visited Neuenburg, Murtlen, and Bern, and then Basel, where Ecclampadius was teaching, and Strassburg, where Bucer and Capito lived. Fortunately, quite extensive documents concerning this mission have come down to us: the address of Morel to Ecclampadius, and the answer of the latter in Scultetus, Annales, pp. 295-315; two more letters from Ecolampadius, in Ec. et Zwinglii epistolarum libri IV., Basel, 1536; Martini Bucerii responsiones ad questiones, etc., in the university library of Strassburg; and the Memoirs of Morel, written in Romaunt, and preserved at Dublin. Morel presented a confession of faith, which, in harmony with the old Waldensian articles de la fè, professes belief in the twelve articles of the Apostle's Creed, the Trinity, and the divinity of Christ; rejects the worship of saints with their festivals and vigils, the doctrine of purgatory, holy water, fasts, and the mass; defines the sacraments as holy symbols, visible tokens of an invisible grace; and finally recommends auricular confession as something useful. To this confession were added no less than forty-seven questions: whether there were only two sacraments, or, as the Roman Catholics say, seven; whether the suffering of Christ referred to hereditary sin only, as the Roman theologians said, or also to actual sin; which were the canonical books of the Bible, and which not; whether the allegorical interpretation of Holy Writ — one of the main supports of the Church of Rome, and hitherto much used by the Waldenses themselves — was of any use; whether of the words, of Christ, some were only meant for advice (consilia), while others were direct commandments, etc. In speaking of the sacraments which the Waldenses continued to take from the hands of the Roman-Catholic priests, it is evident that Morel never thought of a complete separation from the Church of Rome; and from several other passages it appears that the Waldenses had read the De libero arbitrio of Erasmus and the De sermo arbitrio of Luther, but without arriving at any definite result. Nor was their conviction settled with respect to the new doctrine of justification by faith. On all these points the Reformers gave the two emissaries open and clear answers; and Ecolampadius specially emphasized the necessity of complete separation from the Church of Rome. On their return, Masson was seized at Dijon, and decapitated; but Morel succeeded in reaching Merindol, and laid his Memoirs before the congregation. The impression was very deep, and it was immediately decided to convene a synod, to which should be invited some of the most distinguished and most experienced preachers of Apulia and Calabria, and some of the most prominent of the Reformed theologians. The synod assembled at Chanforans, a village in the Valley of Angrogne, Sept. 12, 1532. Farel and Saunier were present. It lasted five days. The most important of its decrees are, a Christian may swear by the name of God; no work is good but that which is commanded by God, and no work is bad but that which is forbidden by God, the rest being indifferent; auricular confession is not commanded by God; a Christian is not forbidden to refrain from working on Sundays; the external word is not necessary in prayer, nor the bent knee, the bowed head, the fixed hour; laying on of hands is not necessary; the Christian is not bound to fast at fixed terms; no one is forbidden to marry; to him who has not the gift of abstinence, marriage is a duty; it is not absolutely forbidden by God to take interest; all who are saved were elected before the creation of the world; he who asserts the existence of freewill denies the predestination and grace of God, etc. The difference between these decrees and the original Waldensian faith is very striking. The instructions of Ecolampadius and Bucer are everywhere visible. The last propositions concerning predestination are, no doubt, due to Farel. Remarkable is the total absence of strictly dogmatical propositions; but already the Bohemian Brethren had noticed the aversion of the Waldenses to doctrinal expositions and formal creeds. Remarkable is also the complete silence concerning one of the most important points, at least from a practical point of view, — the separation from the Church of Rome. Probably this omission was due to a cautious regard to a minority of the synod, which was frightened by the great innovations. Representatives of that minority shortly after repaired to Bohemia, where the Reformation had produced a similar movement, and caused the formation of a corresponding minority, the so-called Pseudo-Hussites. Several letters were exchanged between Bohemia and Piedmont; but a new synod of St. Martin (1533) broke off the negotiations, and confirmed the decrees of the synod of Angrogne.

Separation from the Church of Rome, and Persecutions. — The separation from the Church of Rome was most rapidly effected among the French Waldenses. In 1535 the congregations of Provence numbered several thousand members, and presented to Francis I., their king, a confession of faith wholly reformed. But in 1545 a horrible persecution broke out: twenty-two villages were burnt down, four thousand persons were massacred, and the congregations were all but destroyed. About four thousand persons sought refuge in flight, and returned afterwards to their old abodes, but lived on in a pitiable state. In Dauphiné the persecution began in 1560, but was only of short duration. On the eastern side of the Cottian Alps the Reformation was more slow in its progress, but more successful in vindicating itself. The territory which by the peace of Crespy (1544) came under French dominion was returned to Piedmont by the peace of Chateau-Cambrésis (1559); and in 1560 Emanuel Philibert issued an order that none but Roman-Catholic preachers should be heard in the valleys; but, when he attempted to carry out the order by force, the Waldenses made armed resistance. They were victorious in the encounter; and by the peace of Cavour (1561) they obtained freedom of worship within certain confines, — the valleys of St. Martin, Perosa, and Luserna. The agreement was not kept by the government; and in 1571 the Waldenses formed the so-called "Union of Valleys," by which they bound themselves to cling to the Reformed faith, and defend their religious independence. The Reformation also reached the Waldensian congregations in Calabria; and two evangelical preachers, Negrin and Pascal, went thither as missionaries. But the movement was stopped with the most inhuman cruelty. Men, women, and children were slaughtered indiscriminately; and the remainders were carried on board the Spanish galleys, or sold as slaves. Pascal was burnt at the stake in Rome. Thus the valleys of Piedmont were, in fact, the only place where the Waldensian Church succeeded in maintaining itself; and it kept itself alive there for more than two centuries with admirable heroism, but under unspeakable suffering. Great internal changes took place. Foreign troops brought the plague into Piedmont; and from May, 1630, to July, 1631, more than ten thousand persons, that is, more than one-half of their Waldensian inhabitants, died from it in the valley. Only two clergymen were left; one of them Gilles, minister of Latour, and the historian of the Waldenses. French preachers were sent for, but they did not understand the Waldensian language. The service was celebrated in French, and the Waldensian tongue became mute. Barbe ("uncle"), the original Waldensian designation of a minister, whence the derisive barbet ("poodle"), was changed for Messier ("Mister"). The Liturgy was made to conform in all respects with the French-Reformed Liturgy, and many ancient customs disappeared. The discipline was also altered. The new pastors were disinclined to submit to the control of the elders and the scrutiny of the congregations; and when, in course of time, the Waldenses again had ministers of their own, educated at Geneva, Lausanne, and Basel, the relation between pastor and flock was, and continued to be, completely changed. Externally the period was, of course, not one unbroken persecution; but the intervals of peace were short, and the outbreaks of fanaticism often terrible. That of 1655 seems, indeed, to have overleaped all bounds, and scandalized the whole Protestant world. Cromwell interfered with great energy, and not without success. In the eighteenth century religious persecutions generally subsided. Yet in 1799 the Waldenses were not allowed to have judges, lawyers, and physicians of their own faith, nor to hold any kind of office, nor to own real estate in Roman-Catholic territories, etc. Each congregation had five trustees or directors, but the majority of the board were always Roman Catholics. Their children were often stolen or taken from them by force, in order to be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith in the monastery of Pignerol. On Roman-Catholic feast-days they were not allowed to work, and they had to pay tithes to the Roman-Catholic clergy. The natural result of this suppression was a heavy emigration. As early as 1601 the Duke of Savoy gave the Waldenses the choice between the mass and exile, and 500 families emigrated. In 1686 Amadeus II., compelled by Louis XIV., again threatened them with forced conversion or banishment; but this time they decided to stay and resist. French troops were employed against them; and, after a most heroic defence, they were compelled to surrender. Some submitted to a mock conversion: others went into exile. About 2,600 settled in Geneva. The great elector offered to receive 2,000. Congregations were formed in the Palatinate, in Hesse, and in Nassau. But home-sickness led many of these emigrants to return; and in August, 1689, about 800 or 900 Waldenses, headed by their pastor, Arnaud, forced their way back to their native valleys under enormous sufferings and dangers. New suppressions followed in 1698, in consequence of a new alliance with France; and Waldensian congregations were settled in Wurtemberg, at Grossvillars, Dürmenz, and Schönberg, though the Wurtemberg theologians protested against the admission of Calvinist heretics into the country.

Legal Establishment. — After the battle of Marengo, French influence became dominant for several years in Northern Italy. Napoleon took a special interest in the brave Waldensian community, and gave their church a constitution similar to the constitution of the Reformed Church in France. But after his fall a strong and bigoted Roman-Catholic re-action set in; and immediately after his entrance in Turin, May 20, 1814, Victor Emanuel issued an edict abolishing the constitution of the Waldensian Church, and putting in force once more the old restrictions and prohibitions. On the instance, however, of England and Prussia, he issued a milder edict of Feb. 7, 1816, according to which the Waldenses were allowed to practise as lawyers, physicians, architects, surveyors, etc.; and the Waldensian ministers were paid by the State. But the chicaneries of the Roman-Catholic clergy continued; and when Charles Albert ascended the throne, in 1831, the Jesuits nearly succeeded in effecting a revocation of the edict of 1816. The energetic protests, however, of Holland and Prussia, prevented the fatal blow from being struck; and after that time the internal and external development of the Waldensian Church has gone on smoothly, and without interruptions. In Turin a Protestant chapel was opened in the house of the Prussian embassy, and a Waldensian pastor was appointed preacher. In the valleys the Waldensian schools were greatly improved, especially by the exertions of Dr. Gilles and Col. Beckwith. At the synod of St. Jean, in April, 1839, the church-constitution was revised on the basis of the decrees of the synod of Angrogne. The highest legislative authority is the synod. It consists of all pastors in office, two laymen from each congregation (who, however, have only one vote), and all candidates of theology; but the last-mentioned have only a right to make propositions, without the right of voting. It assembles every five years; the place varying between the valleys of St. Martin, Perosa, and Luserna. Besides its legislative power, it also has the power of confirming the pastors elected by the congregations. The highest administrative authority is the Table ("board"), consisting of a moderator, who presides over the synod, a vice-moderator, a secretary, and two lay-members. The Table is appointed by the synod, and its term of office is five years. Every congregation has its own consistory, consisting of the pastor and the elders.

In 1848 the prospects of the Waldensian Church became very promising. Immediately after the promulgation of the new constitution, Charles Albert issued a letters-patent, declaring the Waldenses entitled to enjoy exactly the same social and political rights as his other subjects, — to frequent the schools and universities of the State, to acquire academical honors, etc.; and at the great national festival in Turin, in honor of the new constitution, the Waldensian delegates were hailed with enthusiasm whenever they showed themselves. Since that time the persecuted church has been able to carry on propaganda, and her aspirations are not low. She wishes to be to Italy in religion what Piedmont has been in politics; and, even though her prospects of fulfilment are not so very alluring, she has, at all events, given a powerful impulse to the religious reform-movements in Italy. She has established prosperous missionary stations, not only in Piedmont, but also in other parts of Italy; and she maintains a good theological school in Florence. Outside of the valleys there are 11 Waldensian congregations, 34 missionary stations, and 150 insulated places visited by Waldensian preachers.

Second Period of Literature.—As it became of consequence to the Waldenses to prove, that, by adopting the Reformation, their faith had undergone no essential change, a kind of mythical view of the origin and history of their church gradually developed among them. The government wanted to expel them from their native valleys, on the plea that they had become heretics by adopting the Reformation; and they wanted to justify their resistance by protesting that they had always held the same faith, and always lived in the same valleys. But in order to throw back into antiquity the origin of their church, make the valleys of Piedmont its true cradle, and bring its doctrines before and after the Reformation into perfect harmony, it was necessary to subject their literature to certain manipulations. This was accordingly done, both in the field of doctrine and in that of history. Before the Reformation very few traces are found of an attempt to go behind Waldus, and date the foundation of the Waldensian Church back to antiquity. When the Waldenses spoke of themselves as the descendants of the primitive church, as the small flock, which, through manifold persecutions, had kept the true faith alive since the days of the apostles, this must, no doubt, be understood spiritually. Nevertheless, the myth sprang up, that the sect was formed in the time of Pope Sylvester, when the Church of Rome lost itself in worldly riches and secular business. And when George Morel openly contradicts himself by dating the foundation of the Waldensian Church, now in the twelfth century, and then again far back into antiquity, it is evident that at his time there existed an historical knowledge and a popular opinion in conflict with each other. The latter became victorious. Perrin (Histoire des Vaudois, Geneva, 1619) and Gilles (Histoire ecclésiastique des églises réformées recueillies en quelques vallées de Piémont, Geneva, 1648) still speak of Waldus as the founder of the Waldensian Church; but the latter adds that Waldus, when he came to the valleys of Piedmont, found there a population holding exactly the same faith as he. Leger (Histoire générale des églises évangéliques des vallées de Piémont ou Vaudois, Leyden, 1669) connects the Waldensian Church immediately with that of the apostles; and Brez (Histoire des Vaudois, Paris, 1796) even makes the apostle Paul the founder. With respect to doctrine, it was quite natural that the Waldenses, when they became attracted by the Reformation, should fix their attention on those points of their doctrinal system which were in harmony with the teachings of the Reformers, and overlook or forget those numerous accommodations which had made it possible for them to remain within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church. Thus an unconscious transformation began, which finally ended in conscious falsification. An instance of the former occurs in the Union of Valleys of 1571, which shows the distinction between the canonical and the apocryphal books of the Bible, and fixes the number of sacraments to two, but, nevertheless, calls itself "the faith of our fathers." An instance of the latter may be found in the Memoirs of George Morel, in which the R. B. (Responsio Bucerii) have been struck out, and the words of Bucer, that is, the doctrines of the Reformers, incorporated with the text of Morel, that is, the doctrines of the Waldenses. Falsifications of this kind were first accepted by Perrin. In his above-mentioned work of 1619 he gives the confession which Morel laid before Ecolampadius and Bucer, and in which some of their answers have been incorporated, as an old confession de foy des Vaudois. From the time of Perrin they went on increasing, until it was asserted by Leger that the Reformers of the sixteenth century lit their lights at the old lamp of the Waldensian Church, and by Brez, that the Waldensian Church was the mother of the Reformed Church, the Reformers adding nothing but a few doctrinal subtleties; and those views were repeated by Protestant church historians down to the present century. The true view has been given above. It is now settled, that the church started with Waldus in the twelfth century.

WALDHAUSEN, Conrad von, one of the precursors of Hus; was a native of Austria, a monk of the Augustinian order, and preached in Vienna from 1345 to 1360. In the latter year the emperor, Charles IV., appointed him pastor at Leitmeritz, whence he afterwards removed to Prague, where he died in 1369. Both in Austria and in Bohemia he produced a powerful impression by his sermons; but he was a revivalist, rather than a reformer. The dogmas and the discipline of the Church of Rome he did not attack; though he attacked the mendicant orders, and mercilessly castigated their follies and frauds. They finally lodged an accusation against him with the archbishop of Prague; but, when he was summoned before the court, no one dared to step forward, and support the accusation. WALKER, James, D.D., Unitarian divine; b. in Burlington, Mass., Aug. 16, 1794; d. in Cambridge, Dec. 23, 1874. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1814; studied theology; was pastor in Charlestown, 1818-39; Alford Professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Harvard College, 1839-53; and president, 1853-60, distinguishing himself in each position. He issued Twenty-five Sermons, Boston, 1861; Memoir of Hon. Daniel Appleton White, 1863; Memoir of Josiah Quincy, 1867; and edited Stewart's Active and Moral Powers, 1849, and Reid's Intellectual Powers, 1850. See the posthumous volume of his sermons, — Reason, Faith, and Duty, Sermons preached chiefly in the College Chapel, 1876.

WALL, William, D.D., English divine; b. 1646; d. at Shoreham, 1728, where he had been vicar since 1676. He is famous by reason of his History of Infant Baptism, London, 1705, 2 vols.; 3d ed., 1720. In 1711 John Gale, a learned Baptist minister, issued his Reflections on Mr. Wall's History: to it Wall replied in his Defence of the History, 1720. The three are now commonly printed together; best ed. by Henry Cotton, Oxford, 1836, 4 vols.; new ed., 1862, 2 vols.

WALLER, Edmund, b. at Colleshill, Hertfordshire, March 3, 1605; d. at Beaconsfield, Oct. 21, 1687; was educated at Eton and Cambridge; in Parliament much of the time from 1625 to his death; on both sides during the civil war, and banished for some years; wrote in honor of Cromwell, 1654, and of Charles II., 1660; published volumes, 1645, 1661, etc. His Works in Verse and Prose have been often reprinted, and much admired. His few Divine Poems have enough life, or semblance of life, to justify mention here.

WALLIN, Benjamin, b. in London, 1711; and d. there Feb. 19, 1782. In 1741 he succeeded his father in a Baptist pastorate at Maze Pond, which he held till death. He published several volumes of sermons, Memoirs of a Gentleman, 1771, and a hundred and three Evangelical Hymns and Songs, 1750. Three of these were altered by Toplady in 1776, and have been considerably used.

WALLIS, John, D.D., F.R.S., English divine and mathematician; b. at Ashford, Kent, Nov. 23, 1616; d. at Oxford, Oct. 28, 1703. He was educated at Cambridge, where he was for a time fellow of Queen's College. He took holy orders, 1640; in 1644 was secretary to the Westminster Assembly, and pastor in London. In 1648 he became Savilian professor of geometry in Oxford; D.D., 1654; keeper of the archives at Oxford, 1658; was confirmed in his offices, and made one of the royal chaplains at the Restoration; member of the Royal Society, 1662. Besides mathematical works which prove him to have been one of the greatest mathematicians of his day, he published A brief and easy explanation of the Shorter Catechism, presented by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster to both Houses of Parliament, and by them approved, London, 8th ed., 1662; The doctrine of the blessed Trinity briefly explained in a letter to a friend, 1690 (followed by seven other letters on the same subject, these were republished by T. Flintoff, 1840); A defence of the Christian Sabbath, Oxford, 1692; Theological Discourses, London, 1692; Sermons, 1791. The last volume contains a memoir by De Coetlogon.

WALPURGIS, or WALPURGA, St., a sister of St. Wunnebold and St. Willibald; was a native of England, and went to Germany at the instance of Boniface. She worked as a missionary in Thuringia, and became afterwards abbess of Heidenheim in the diocese of Eichstadt. She died in 776 or 778. Her arrival in Germany is commemorated on Aug. 4; her death, on Feb. 25; and her canonization, on May 1. Her legend is rather meagre, but so much the richer are the traditions. See Act. Sanct., Feb. 25. On Walpurgis Night, May 1, the witches met.

WALSH, Thomas, Methodist, b. at Ballylin, near Limerick, Ireland, 1730; d. in Dublin, April 8, 1759. Brought up in the Roman-Catholic faith, he renounced that creed, and joined the Established Church in his eighteenth year, and two years later commenced itinerating as a Methodist preacher. He met with great success, but also persecution from Roman Catholics and Protestants alike. In 1753 he came to London on Wesley's call, and there began to study Hebrew and Greek so diligently that he won the enthusiastic admiration of Wesley, who pronounced him the best Bible student he knew. But he succumbed to his incessant toils, and died at an early age. See his Life, by Morgan, London, 1762, New York, 1843, republished by T. Jackson, Early Methodist Preachers, vol. iii.

WALTER OF ST. VICTOR, prior of the monastery of St. Victor, a pupil of the celebrated Hugo of St. Victor; d. 1180. He left a work, of which large extracts have been printed in BULEUS: Hist. Univ. Paris, T. ii. pp. 200, 402, 562, and 629, and which is generally named, after the words with which it begins, Contra quatuor labyrinthos (Abelard, Petrus Lombardus, Petrus Pictavinus, and Gilbertus Porretanus). The work is a violent but often striking criticism of the prevailing scholasticism, based on the just observation, that dialectics can decide only about formal truth (the correct transition from premises to conclusion), but not about material truth, the correctness of the premises. The author, however, is far from the lofty mysticism of his teacher. When the question arises, How the correct premises are to be found, he at once sinks down into abject slavery to the reigning church. He is often mistaken for Walter of Mairmund, who taught rhetoric in Paris, was appointed bishop of Laon in 1155, d. in 1171, and wrote against Abelard's conception of the Holy Trinity. C. SCHMIDT.

WALTHER VON DER VOGELWEIDE. Among the great German poets of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, who created the first classic period of German literature. Walther von der Vogelweide takes the highest rank as a lyric poet. Not only has he become immortal by his songs of love and spring, which have almost no equal in German literature, but by the power of his verses he has also a great political significance; and the strength of his language against Pope and Church makes him even a forerunner of the Reformation.

We do not know when and where he was born; although his birth falls not long before 1170, as his death can hardly have occurred long after 1230. The principal events of his life we must trace from his poems. At the end of the twelfth century we find him at the court of Austria, the scene of a bright, joyful life, and the home of poets and minstrels of all kinds; and it is probable that most of his beautiful "minnesongs" were produced at this time. But very soon, with the rise of political troubles in Germany, we find him passionately engaged in politics, taking the part of the different emperors who followed each other at short intervals. And now it is that he becomes the creator of that political poetry which had so great an influence upon the minds of his contemporaries. His clear eye detected the real source of the whole political misery of Germany in the destructive influence of Rome; and therefore he uses all the power of his art and satire against the Pope and his priests, "turning thousands from their duty to Rome," as a contemporary, Thomasin, says in his Welsche Gast. The language of these verses may justly be compared to Luther's early writings. Here is one of these poems in prose, translated by Bayard Taylor:—

"Ye bishops and ye noble priests, you are misled. See how the Pope entangles you in the Devil's net! If you say to me that he has the keys of St. Peter, then tell me why he banishes St. Peter's teaching from the Bible. By our baptism it is forbidden to us that God's sacraments should be bought or sold. But now let him read that in his black book, which the devil gave him, and take his tune from Hell's pipe!

Ye cardinals, ye roof your choirs well; but our old holy altar stands exposed to evil weather."

It is very probable that Walther joined the crusade of Frederick II. in 1228, and that he died shortly afterward in Würzburg.

Walther belonged to the poorer of German noblemen, as his title, hēr, shows his gentle birth; but he was one of the better class of minstrels, who went from castle to castle singing to the accompaniment of some musical instrument. He passed the greater part of his life in poverty, and it is touching to hear his joy when finally presented with an estate by Frederick II. It is the picture of a true and great poet which Walther has left to us in his songs. Love, nature, religion, and politics are his principal themes; and here he shows a purity, depth, and richness of feeling, which are equal only to his independent character. Although firm in his religious, political, and moral convictions, he belongs to the few men of real religious tolerance in the middle age. In this respect resembling the great Emperor Frederick II., he may be called a prophet of the modern spirit as well as a true representative of his age.

The best of the numerous editions of Walther's poems is that of K. LACHMANN, Berlin, 1827, and often since: a more popular one is that of PFLEGER, in his German Classics of Middle Ages, translated into modern German by Simrock. [W. Grimm's theory, that Walther is also the author of the didactic poem Fridank's Bescheidenheit, adopted by W. Wackernagel, has been abandoned. Cf. WILLMANS: Leben Walthers v. d. Vogelweide, Bonn, 1883; KOLDE: Walthers v. d. Vogelweide in seiner Stellung zu Kaisertum u. Hierarchie, Gütersloh, 1877, pp. 35.] W. WACKERNAGEL (DR. J. GOEBEL).

WALTON, Brian, D.D., b. at Seymour, Yorkshire, 1600; d. in London, Nov. 29, 1661. He was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1623; was curate and also schoolmaster in Suffolk; in 1626 rector of St. Martin's Orgar, London, to which was joined in 1636 the rectorship of Sandon, Essex, at which time he was chaplain to the king, and prebend of St. Paul's; in 1639 he was made D.D. (his thesis was, the Pope not infallible judge in matters of faith); in 1641 he was dispossessed of both rectories; was persecuted for his loyalty, fled to Oxford, and there formed the design of the great Polyglot, by which he immortalized himself. After the surrender of Oxford (1646), he went to London with the materials he had collected, and in 1652 published his prospectus to the Polyglot. Subscriptions were placed at ten pounds a set; the six volumes appeared 1654-57. (For particulars, see POLYGLOT BIBLES.) As a help to the student of his Polyglot, he published, London, 1655, Introductio ad Lect. Orient., republished, Deventer, 1655 and 1658. Owen thought the Polyglot, especially the Prolegomena, contained things injurious to Christianity. To him he addressed himself in his Considerator Considered, London, 1660. Walton's Polyglot is the first book in England published by subscription. Walton was at the Restoration made chaplain to the king, and on Dec. 2, 1660, was consecrated, in Westminster Abbey, bishop of Chester. See his Life by Todd, London, 1821, 2 vols. The second volume is a reprint of the Considerator Considered.

WANDELBERT, St., b. in 813; d. in 870. He entered early the monastery of Prüm, near Ech-

ternach, in the Eifel Mountains, and was afterwards made director of the cloistral school, which he brought to a very flourishing condition. He also developed a great literary activity; but only two of his works have come down to us. — Vita et Miracula S. Goarici, first printed at Mayence, 1189, then by Sarnus and Mabillon, in Act. Sanct., July 6; and Martyrologium, written in verse, on the basis of the martyrologies of Jerome, Beda, and Florus, and printed first among the works of Beda in 1536, then by D'Achery, in his Spic. eccl. Script., v.

WAR. Though war most certainly is an evil, it may be considered from various points of view. Looking solely at the suffering and loss it entails, the temptations it offers, the passions it awakens, and the habits it engenders, it is not unnatural that some Christian parties, such as the Quakers, the Mennonites, etc., should feel themselves justified in absolutely condemning it. The view is, nevertheless, one-sided; and the application of Jesus' words in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 39), as a biblical support of it, is false. It is all very well that in the kingdom of heaven there shall be no war, and that the development of the divine scheme of salvation points directly to the abolition of war; but the future cannot be anticipated, and the tribulations of the present a Christian has to bear with patience (Rom. xii. 12). In the Old Testament we meet with quite another view of war when Moses said that "the Lord is a man of war" (Exod. xv. 3); and David with full confidence recommends his war concerns to the Lord (Ps. ix., xviii., lx., etc.). Nor is there any reason why that view should be considered valid only under the old dispensation. The New Testament nowhere rejects war unconditionally. John the Baptist does not demand of the soldiers (Luke iii. 14), nor Jesus of the centurion of Capernaum (Matt. viii. 5), nor Peter of Cornelius (Acts x.), that they shall abandon their profession. Since God has given the sword to the powers to punish any one that does evil (Rom. xiii.; 1 Pet. ii.), there is a right of war; for it is as much a duty to defend the State against external as against internal aggressors. And it is from this point of view that Luther, in his celebrated treatise Ob Kriegsleute auch in seligem Stande sein können, defines war for the sake of war as sin, but war for the sake of defence, as duty.

The first Christians abhorred war, partly on account of a misinterpretation of the words of Jesus to Peter, "For all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword" (Matt. xxvi. 52), partly because military service brought them in contact with many idolatrous rites, and the State in general seemed to them an expression of the godlessness of the world and its hostility to Christ. In this spirit Tertullian treated the subject (De idol., 19; De corona militis, 11). Nevertheless, in spite of the reigning aversion, many Christians served in the Roman army, as may also be seen from the writings of Augustine (Apolog., 42; Ad Scap., 4); and when, under the reign of Constantine, the relation between State and Church became one of intimate friendship and alliance, the objections of the Christians to war gradually were silenced. Augustine, who maintained intimate personal and epistolary intercourse with many distinguished statesmen, such as Marcellinus and Bonifacius, considered war a social benefit, and military service an employment of a talent agreeable to God (Ep. 207 ad Bonif., and Ep. 138 ad Marc.). In his book against Faustus (lib. 22, cap. 74) he exclaims, Quid culpatur in bello? ("What is there bad in war?") Later on, when it became the great task of the Church to convert the Germanic tribes, she was compelled to take the very code of war in hand; and she did so, mitigating its horrors and cruelties by the "truce of God," the sanctity of sacred places, etc. Finally she became herself an instigator of war: from her issued that enthusiasm which sent the Crusaders to the Holy Land. Nor is the attitude which Luther assumed with respect to the Peasants' War and the war against the Turks, different in principle from that which the Roman-Catholic Church originally assumed with respect to the Crusades.

In the ancient church the clergy were absolutely forbidden to participate in war. During the middle ages it was not rare to find great generals among the bishops; such as Christian of Mayence, Absalon of Roeskilde, and others. In modern times the question has been raised by the State, and has given occasion to some elaborate researches. See the "Ethics," of Harless, Rothe, Martensen, and others.

WARBURTON, William, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester; one of the most learned and prolific prelates of the Church of England; b. at Newark-upon-Trent, Nottinghamshire, Dec. 24, 1698; d. at Gloucester, June 7, 1779. His father was an attorney, and educated him for the law, which he practised from 1719 to 1723; but theology had always been his passion, and therefore he was ordained deacon, 1723, and priest, 1726. His first charge was at Gylesley, Nottinghamshire, 1726 to 1728, thence he passed to Brant-Broughton, Lincolnshire, and there remained until 1746. In the retirement of country life he prosecuted his studies with great diligence, and wrote those works which have perpetuated his memory. The first of these was The Alliance between Church and State, or the necessity and equity of an established religion and a test law demonstrated, from the essence and end of civil society upon the fundamental principles of the laws of nature and nations, 1736, in which, while taking high ground, as the title indicates, he yet maintains that the State Church should tolerate those who differed from it in doctrine and worship. In quick succession came his great work, and one of the great works in English theology, — The Divine Legation of Moses, demonstrated on the principles of a religious deist, from the omission of the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments in the Jewish dispensation. Books i., ii., iii., appeared in one volume, 1737–38; books iv., v., vi., in one volume, 1741; books vii., viii., never appeared; book ix. was first published in his Works, 1788, 10th ed. of the entire work, ed. by James Nichols, 1846, 3 vols. The work raised a storm; and Warburton published a reply, Remarks on several occasional reflections, 1745. The Divine Legation cannot be understood without reference to the deistic controversy which produced it. (See DEISM, INFIDELITY.) The Deists turned their attacks particularly upon the Old Testament, and tried to make a case by alleging the absence of any express statement respecting immortality. Warburton turns the tables upon them by constructing, out of the very absence of such statements, a proof of the divinity of the Mosaic legislation. The first three books deal with the necessity of the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments to civil society from, (1) the nature of the thing, (2) the conduct of the ancient lawgivers and founders of civil policy, and (3) the opinions and conduct of the ancient sages and philosophers. The fourth book proves the high antiquity of the arts and empire of Egypt, and that such high antiquity illustrates and confirms the truth of the Mosaic history. The fifth book explains the nature of the Jewish theocracy, and proves that the doctrine of a future state is not in, nor makes part of, the Mosaic dispensation. In the sixth book Warburton examines all the texts brought from the Old and New Testaments to prove a future state of rewards and punishments did make part of the Mosaic dispensation. The ninth book treats of the true nature and genius of the Christian religion. The general argument is briefly this: the Deists said the Jewish religion could lay no claim to divinity, because its sacred books said nothing respecting a future state of rewards and punishments; but for that very reason, Warburton replied, must it be divine, since it did really accomplish the punishment of wrong-doers without such a doctrine, and no other legislation has been able to do so without it. In answer to the question, How could it do this? he replied, Because the foundation and support of the Mosaic legislation was the theocracy which was peculiar to the Jews, and which dealt out in this life righteous rewards and punishments upon individual and nation. An extraordinary providence conducted the affairs of this people, and consequently the sending of Moses was divinely ordered.

The work is confessedly limited to one line of argument, is defective in exegesis, and does not do justice to the intimations of immortality among the later Jews; yet it is distinguished by freshness and vigor, masterly argumentation, and bold imagination. The excursus are particularly admirable; e.g., the hieroglyphs and picture-writing [“The great proof of the discernment of Warburton was his dim second-sight of the modern discoveries in hieroglyphics.” — Dean Milman], the mysteries, the origin of the Book of Job (which he calls “an allegorical poem written after the return from Babylon”).

Warburton was a man of untiring energy, wide information, clear insight, and lively fancy. He had a noble, open, guileless heart; yet he was capable of intolerance and unfairness. As a critic he was sharp, and often satirical, resembling Bentley. He was comparatively slow in receiving preferments and honors, although he attracted such great notice. In 1738 he was made chaplain to the Prince of Wales; in 1746, preacher to Lincoln's Inn; in 1754, chaplain to the king; in 1755, prebendary of Durham and D.D.; in 1757, dean of Bristol; and, in 1760, bishop of Gloucester. His writings during this period embrace A Vindication of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man, 1739, and a Commentary upon the essay, 1742 (by these writings he won Pope's firm friendship); Julian, 1750

(a proof of the numerous providential inferences which defeated Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple); The Doctrine of Grace, or the office and operations of the Holy Spirit vindicated from the insults of infidelity and the abuses of fanaticism, 1762, 2 vols. (a work directed against the Methodists, which did not advance his reputation). His Works were edited by Bishop Hurd, 1788, 7 vols. (the expense was borne by Warburton's widow), new ed., 1811, 12 vols. [Supplementary to this edition are the Tracts by Warburton and a Warburtonian, 1789; Letters, Kilderminster, 1808, 2d ed., Lond., 1809; Selection from the Unpublished Papers of Warburton, Lond., 1841. Bishop Warburton's life was first written by Bishop Hurd, 1794, enlarged edition by F. Kilvert, 1860, but best by J. S. Watson, 1863. WARBURTONIAN LECTURE was founded by Bishop Warburton in 1768, by the gift of five hundred pounds, for the purpose of proving “the truth of revealed religion in general, and of the Christian in particular, from the completion of the prophecies of the Old and New Testaments, which relate to the Christian Church, and especially to the apostasy of Papal Rome.” The lectures were to be given at Lincoln's Inn, London, upon three Sundays of each year. See lists in DARLING'S Cyclopædia Bibliographica, and BONN'S edition of Lowndes. Of recent lectures may be mentioned STANLEY LEATHES'S Old-Testament Prophecy, its witness as a record of divine foreknowledge, London, 1880.

WARDEN is the name sometimes given to the head of some English colleges, and also to the superior of the chapter in some conventual churches.

WARDLAW, Ralph, D.D., a prominent Scottish divine: b. at Dalkeith, Dec. 22, 1779; d. at Glasgow, Dec. 17, 1853. By birth and education a Presbyterian, he adopted Congregational views before ordination. Educated at Glasgow university. His only pastorate was that of the Albion-street Congregational Church (afterwards removed to George Street), which he held for over fifty years. Professor of theology in the Glasgow Theological Academy from 1811 for some forty years. A good scholar, polished gentleman, and devout Christian; an expository preacher, keen in logic, courteous to opponents, rather diffuse in style, an admirable elocutionist; gathered a large and influential congregation, and was for a long time a leader in the Congregational churches in Scotland. He published largely; his chief works being A Selection of Hymns, 1803, with supplement, 1817 (twelve of his own composition are included, these have since been extensively used); Discourses on the Principal Points of the Socinian Controversy, 1814; Unitarianism Incapable of Vindication, 1816; Expository Lectures on the Book of Ecclesiastes, 1821; Dissertation on Infant Baptism, 1825; Two Essays on the Assurance of Faith and on the Extent of the Atonement and Universal Pardon, 1830; The Sabbath, 1832; Civil Establishments of Christianity tried by the Word of God, 1832; Christian Ethics, 1833; Congregational Independency, 1848; Essay on the Miracles, 1852; and many occasional discourses. Dr. Wardlaw was a powerful speaker on the platform, and took part in many public movements, especially in the antislavery controversy and the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846. His System of Theology, 1856-57, 3 vols., and Lectures upon Proverbs (1861, 3 vols.), Romans (1861, 3 vols.), Zechariah (1862), and James (1862), have been published since his death, and a Memoir by Rev. W. L. Alexander, D.D. (1856).

WARE, Henry, D.D., b. at Sherburne, Mass., April 1, 1764; d. at Cambridge, July 12, 1815. He was graduated from Harvard College in 1785; and from Oct. 24, 1787, until 1805, was pastor of the First Church, Hingham, Mass.; was Hollis Professor of divinity in Harvard College, 1805-16, and then in the divinity school, which was that year organized, until, in 1810, loss of sight compelled his resignation. "His election to the Hollis Professorship was the occasion of a memorable controversy. Dr. Tappan, his predecessor, had always been regarded as a Trinitarian and a moderate Calvinist; but Mr. Ware was understood to be a decided Arminian and a Unitarian. Vigorous efforts were made to prevent the nomination, when submitted to the overseers, from being confirmed; but it was confirmed by a vote of thirty-three to twenty-three. The 'orthodox' clergy generally were greatly dissatisfied with the result; and Dr. [Eliphalet] Pearson, who had been both a professor and a fellow in the college, next year resigned both these offices, giving as a reason that the university was the subject of such radical and constitutional maladies as to exclude the hope of rendering any essential service to the interests of religion by continuing his relation to it. Dr. [Jedediah] Morse also published a pamphlet entitled True Reasons on which the Election of a Hollis Professor of Divinity was opposed at the Board of Overseers. This may be regarded as the commencement of the Unitarian controversy, which was prosecuted with great vigor for many years, until at length the lines between the two parties were distinctly drawn" (Sprague). Ware took no part in this controversy until 1820, when he wrote Letters to Trinitarians and Calvinists, occasioned by Dr. Leonard Woods's Letters to Unitarians. This involved him in a controversy with Dr. Woods. Dr. Ware also published An Inquiry into the Foundation, Evidences, and Truths of Religion, Cambridge, 1812, 2 vols. See SPRAGUE: Annals of the American Pulpit, viii. 199 sqq.

WARE, Henry, jun., D.D., b. at Hingham, Mass., April 21, 1794; and graduated at Harvard, 1812; and d. at Frammingham, Mass., Sept. 22, 1843. He was pastor of the Second Church in Boston, 1817-30; and Parkman Professor of pulpit eloquence in the divinity school at Cambridge, 1830-42. He edited the Christian Disciple, the first Unitarian organ, and published Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching (1821), On the Formation of the Christian Character (1831), and various memoirs, sermons, and poems. Four volumes of selections from his writings were issued by Dr. C. Robbins, 1846-47, and a memoir by his brother, 1845, 2 vols. His hymns, written at intervals from 1817 on, possess decided merit, and have been widely used.

F. M. BIRD.

WARHAM, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Okeley, Hampshire, about 1450; d. at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, Aug. 23, 1532. He was elected fellow of New College, Oxford, 1475; studied particularly canon and civil law; was made LL.D. 1488, but entered the church, and left the university; was collated by the bishop of Ely to some living in the church, but does not appear to have discharged its duties, for he became advocate in the Court of Arches, and moderator (principal) of the Civil Law School in St. Edmund's parish, Oxford. Having attracted the notice of Henry VII., his ability and learning were called upon in honorable service. He was sent, with Sir E. Poyning, to the Duchess of Burgundy to effect the delivery of the pretender, Perkin Warbeck (1493), and a few years after sat on the case as commissioner. He was successively Master of the Rolls (1494), Keeper of the Great Seal (Aug. 11, 1502), Lord-Chancellor (Jan. 1, 1503), bishop of London (1503), enthroned archbishop of Canterbury (March 9, 1504), chancellor of the university of Oxford (1508). With the accession of Henry VIII. (1509), he suffered no loss of position; but the growth of Wolsey in royal favor was bitter to him, and he finally resigned the Great Seal to Wolsey, Dec. 22, 1515. He was offered it again after Wolsey's fall, but declined, pleading his age and other reasons.

Warham was behind his age. He had learning, and skill in state-craft, dignity, and virtue. He was, for his age, singularly abstemious, and, although primate, lived in all simplicity. He was the friend of Erasmus and Colet. But he was deaf to the cries for reform, blind to the corruptions of the church. He headed the opponents to the Reformation. He considered it a capital offence to introduce the writings of the Reformers, and to translate the Bible into the vernacular,—at best a work of superfluity. He listened to the Holy Maid of Kent (Elizabeth Barton), but he persecuted the "heretics" without mercy. See the numerous works upon the English Reformation.

WASHBURN, Edward Abiel, D.D., b. in Boston, Mass., April 16, 1819; d. in New York, Feb. 2, 1881. Dr. Washburn was for nearly forty years a clergyman in the Episcopal Church, of which, in the latter years of his life, he was one of the prominent leaders. Grandson of Gen. Washburn of Massachusetts, and son of a well-known Boston merchant, he passed the early years of his life in the study of literature and philosophy, and, graduating from Harvard College in the year 1838, he entered the Congregational ministry after a year's study in each of the seminaries of Andover and New Haven. He soon found, however, that he could not be satisfied with this communion, and after a short pastorate he entered the Episcopal Church, being ordained to preach in Boston in 1845. From this time, until 1851, he was rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport; and here he laid the foundation of his wide scholarship and learning by constant study. For two years after this time he journeyed in the East, visiting Egypt, Palestine, India, and China, and on his return succeeded Dr. Cox as rector of St. John's, Hartford. In the same year he was married to Miss Frances H. Lindsly, daughter of Dr. Lindsly of Washington. In 1860 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from Trinity College. Two years later he accepted the charge of St. Mark's, Philadelphia, whence, in 1865, he was called to Calvary Church, New York, where for sixteen years he worked with unceasing toil, although contending, in the latter years of his life, with an incurable illness. Dr. Washburn's breadth of mind, and depth of learning, were united with such power of eloquence, that he was for many years a recognized leader in his church. As a Churchman he belonged neither to the high nor low parties, but advocated most earnestly the position of the new school of Broad Churchmen. His literary works were mainly formed of scattered articles; such as the essays read before the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York, 1873, on Reason and Faith, and before the Conference in Basel, 1879, on Socialism: essays published about the same time, in different reviews, of which the best known is his review on the Conflict between Religion and Science; and contributions to Dr. Schaff's edition of Lange's Commentaries. He took, also, an active part in the revision of the New Testament, being one of the American Committee. With the exception of a few short articles and poems, his busy life permitted him to publish but one volume, The Social Law of God (1875), a series of sermons on the Ten Commandments, which quickly passed through five editions. After his death another volume of selected sermons was published in 1882; and a third volume of sermons and lectures were in 1883 collected and published by the clerical club of which he was the founder. Dr. Washburn was in many respects a remarkable man. The power and influence he possessed in and outside of his own church were due partly to his great abilities as a scholar,—for he was both philosopher, historian, and linguist,—and partly to his eloquence as a preacher; but much of this came also from his character. A close reasoner, and an able defender of his own views, he was at the same time as honest, and free from bigotry, as he was strong and intrepid. His abhorrence of cant, his warlike heart, and his purity of soul, made him one not only to be admired, but also one to be loved and cultivated as a friend. He took a deep interest in philosophical questions, but he made them subservient to his practical work and the vital problems of Church and State. E. W. HOPKINS.

WATCH-NIGHT, The, is kept by Methodists at the eve of the year; the time until midnight being spent in devotional exercises. The custom of holding night-meetings during the week started among them in Bristol, Eng.; but Wesley brought it into general use. At first they were frequent, but now are restricted to one evening of the year.

WATERLAND, Daniel, D.D., b. at Wasely, Lincolnshire, Eng., Feb. 14, 1683; d. in London, Dec. 23, 1740. He was educated at Cambridge, fellow of Magdalen College (1701), chaplain in ordinary to George I. (1714), vicar of Twickenham, and archdeacon of Middlesex (1730). He is renowned as the bold defender of the church doctrine against the Arians and Socinians of his time. His two great controversies were with Samuel Clarke (the philosopher) and Daniel Whitby. The former produced his three volumes,—A Vindication of Christ's Divinity (1719), A Second Vindication of Christ's Divinity (1723), A Further Defence of Christ's Divinity (1725). He maintained that the doctrine of the Trinity was necessarily, by its mysteriousness, beyond reason, and that the Scripture citations should be understood in their plain sense. He exposed the weakness of Clarke's famous à priori proof for the being of God, and defended the Athanasian Creed in his Critical History of the creed, 1724. He wrote, also, A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist as laid down in Scripture and Antiquity (1737), against Hoadly's Zwinglian, and Johnson's and Brett's Romanizing, views. Waterland always wrote without bitterness or heat, and therefore was a model controversialist. His Works appeared in a complete edition, Oxford, 1823–28, new ed., 1843, 6 vols., prefaced by a Life by Bishop Van Mildert. THEODOR CHRISTLIEB.

WATSON, Richard, Bishop of Llandaff, both chemist and theologian; b. at Heversham, Westmoreland, August, 1737; d. at Calgarth Park, Westmoreland, July 4, 1816. He was successively fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Oct. 1, 1760; professor of chemistry, Nov. 19, 1761 (when, according to his own confession, he had never read a syllable on the subject, or seen a single experiment; he made, however, by hard work, a well-informed and excellent teacher); regius professor of divinity, Nov. 11, 1771 (in the seven days previous he took the degrees of bachelor and doctor of theology, and for a second time assumed to teach a subject he confessedly had never studied; his theology, he says, was purely biblical, he cared nothing about "systems"); and rector of Somersham, 1771; prebendary of Ely, 1774; archdeacon of Ely, and rector of Northwold in Norfolk, 1780; bishop of Llandaff, July 26, 1782. He retired from public life, in which he had prominently figured for many years, in 1789, and, retaining his bishopric, spent the rest of his life chiefly in agricultural pursuits. He was rather versatile than deep, yet deserves mention for his two apologetic writings in the form of letters, Apology for Christianity (1776), addressed to Edward Gibbon, and Apology for the Bible (1796), addressed to Thomas Paine; and for his very valuable Collection of Theological Tracts, 1755, 6 vols., 2d ed., 1791. See list in Darling. See his autobiography, Anecdotes of the Life of Richard Watson, published by his son, 1817, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1818.

WATSON, Richard, one of the most eminent Methodists; secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society; b. at Barton-upon-Humber, Lincolnshire, Feb. 22, 1781; d. in London, Jan. 8, 1833. He received no schooling after his fourteenth year, but at fifteen commenced to preach as a Methodist itinerant. Accused unjustly of Arianism, he joined the Methodist New Connection, 1801, but in 1812 was received back into the Wesleyan body, and the next year zealously labored in the organization of their missionary society, and was one of the secretaries from 1816 to 1830. He also took an active part in the antislavery movement, and lived to see the preparation for the emancipation of all slaves in the British Colonies. He was a man of restless activity, versatility, conscientiousness, and practical skill. He represents the more thoughtful and moderate form of Methodism, and by his works won and has maintained an honored place among English theologians. His writings embrace A Defence of the Wesleyan Methodist Missions in the West Indies, 1817 (a work which did much to reveal the misery of slavery in the West Indies, and lead to its abolition); Conversations for the Young, 1830 (a good help for young people reading the Bible); Life of John Wesley, 1831 (written by request of conference; briefer and more popular than the voluminous biography by Moore; characterized by its respectful treatment of the Established Church); Biblical and Theological Dictionary, 1832, 10th ed., 1850, reprinted, New York, 1853, Nashville, 1857, revised and enlarged by T. O. Summers (for the most part, a compilation); and, chiefly, Theological Institutes, or a View of the Evidences, Doctrines, Morals, and Institutions of Christianity, 1823-24, 3 vols., 5th ed., 1850, 1 vols. (a popular rather than strictly scientific presentation of theology and ethics, resting upon the Arminian interpretation of the Bible, particularly useful for students and young ministers, who, as Watson himself did, are preparing themselves for their profession ["though not the legal, it has been the moral and scientific standard of Methodism"]); Sermons and Sketches of Sermons, 1834, 3 vols., reprinted, N.Y., 1845. Watson's Life was written by Rev. Thomas Jackson, in the first volume of the collected edition of his Works, 1834-37, 13 vols., 7th ed., 1857-58. [An Analysis of the Institutes was prepared by Dr. McClintock in 1812, bound with new edition of the work (N.Y., 1850, 2 vols.), and revised by James A. Bastow; published separately, London, 1876]. THEODOR CHRISTLIEB.

WATSON, Thomas, eminent nonconformist divine; d. in Essex about 1689. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was rector of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, London, 1646; ejected for nonconformity in 1662; preached at Crosby Hall in 1672, but retired after a few years. He was an admired preacher; and one of his sermons, Heaven taken by Storm (often reprinted), was honored by the conversion of Col. Gardiner (cf. Doddridge, Life of Col. Gardiner). He published Three Treatises,—(1) The Christian's Charter, (2) The Art of Divine Contentment, (3) A Discourse of Meditation, London, 6th ed., 1660; A Body of Practical Divinity, consisting of 176 Sermons on the Assembly's Catechism, 1692, last ed., New York, 1871. His Select Works, in which the above and other sermons are contained, appeared in London, 1821, and in New York, 1855.

WATT, Joachim von. See VADIAN.

WATTS, Isaac, the best-known of all English hymn-writers; b. at Southampton, July 17, 1674; d. at Abney Park, Nov. 25, 1748. The son of a zealous nonconformist boarding-school master, he was educated in the little dissenting academy at Newington, near London; studied theology; and in 1698 was chosen assistant minister to the Independent congregation (Dr. Chauncy's) of Mark Lane, London; in 1702 became pastor, and held the position nominally until his death, although in 1712 he was compelled by ill health to retire from active service. In the latter year he was invited by Sir Thomas Abney to spend a week at Abney Park, near London, but remained for thirty-six years the honored and beloved guest. He never married. In height he was little more than five feet.

At the age of seven he showed poetical talent; but his first volume (Horæ Lyricæ) did not appear until 1706. It was a promise rather than a performance of excellence. In the next year came his Hymns and Spiritual Songs. His hymns opened a new path: they were without precedent or rival. By them he has won the epithet "the inventor of English hymns" (Montgomery, Christian Psalmist, p. xx.). Previously only psalms had been sung in public worship: he introduced hymns. There is now not a hymn-book published in any denomination which does not contain some of his; and although in some respects excelled by other hymnists, he has been equalled by none in depth of feeling, or in warmth, strength, and simplicity of expression. Yet his hymns are by no means faultless. Ofttimes they are defective in form and contents, prosaic, and carelessly rhymed, or not at all. It should be said, however, that these faults were not so offensive to his day as to ours, [and also that "poetical license" allows many imperfect rhymes]. Next came The Psalms of David Imitated in the Language of the New Testament, 1719. Watts considered this his most important work, and indeed it effected the reformation of English psalmody. One noticeable feature of his psalms is their evangelical character. The title exactly describes the work. He never hesitates to read into the Hebrew psalms their New-Testament exegesis. He substitutes everywhere gospel for law. Does the Psalmist speak of sacrifices of bullocks and oxen, he introduces the sacrifice of Christ: does the Psalmist speak of fear, he of faith and love. But this peculiarity was no fault to his audience. With astonishing rapidity his psalms were taken up; and now they are well-nigh universally used, and have had a blessed effect in deepening spirituality, and propagating the Christian religion. In 1720 appeared his excellent Divine and Moral Songs for the Use of Children,—a book of such a noble, genuine, childlike simplicity, that it remains the favorite of its kind among English youth, and has yearly a large sale.

But Watts was more than a hymn-writer. He wrote upon logic, astronomy, geography, English grammar, pedagogics, and ethics. His Logic, or the Right Use of Reason, although now superseded, was used in the academies of Dissenters and in the universities of the Established Church. His Improvement of the Mind, Philosophical Essays (clear proof that metaphysical speculation was not his forte); First Principles of Geography and Astronomy, and his very characteristic Reliquiæ Juveniles, or Miscellaneous Thoughts in Prose and Verse,—have been widely useful. In 1728 he published his Discourse on Instruction by Catechism, with two Catechisms, and the Assembly's Catechism explained. Watts was considered one of the best preachers of his time. He published three volumes of discourses, 1721, 1723, 1727. The charge of Arianism brought against him is apparently unfounded. He has a monument in the cemetery of Abney Park, where he lies buried, and also in Westminster Abbey [a statue at Southampton (1861), and a memorial hall there (1875)]. His Works were published in Lond., 1810, 6 vols., and 1812, 9 vols. Nine [additional] Sermons appeared in Oxford, 1812. His Life has been written by SAMUEL JOHNSON, Rev. THOMAS MILNER, ROBERT SOUTHY, Rev. SAMUEL PALMER, and Dr. GIBBONS.

WAUGH, Beverly, D.D., Bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. in Fairfax County, Va., Oct. 25, 1789; d. in Baltimore, Feb. 9, 1858. After a business career of a few years in 1809, he entered the Baltimore Conference, and in 1836 was constituted a bishop.

WAYLAND, Francis, b. in New York, March 11, 1796; d. at Providence, R.I., Sept. 30, 1865; was son of Rev. Francis Wayland; graduated at Union College in 1813; studied medicine, and began practice; was converted, and joined the Baptist Church in 1816; studied at Andover Theological Seminary in 1816 and 1817; was tutor in Union College, 1817-21; pastor of First Baptist Church in Boston, 1821-26; made professor in Union College in 1826; president of Brown University, 1827-55; received degree of D.D. from Union College in 1827, and from Harvard College in 1829, and degree of LL.D. from Harvard College in 1852.

He is most widely remembered as a college officer. With Arnold of Rugby, and with his own instructors, — Nott of Union, and Stuart of Andover, — he ranks as one of the great teachers of the century. And his influence as an educator went beyond his own lecture-room. The text-books which he prepared for the use of his own classes soon came into general use. In the re-organization, brought about by him, of the courses of study in Brown University, he did much to reform the general system of college education. He was a leader in the organization of the system of public schools in the city of Providence, throughout the State of Rhode Island, and elsewhere. He was one of the founders and the first president of the American Institute of Instruction, for many years presiding over and taking an active part in its deliberations. He did much to secure the founding of free public libraries. Through many published reports and addresses, and by extended treatises, he aroused and directed the educational spirit in the country at large.

Eminent as an educator, Dr. Wayland stands hardly less distinguished as a preacher. Some of his discourses, as, for example, his sermon on The Moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise, are prominent in the annals of the American pulpit. His University Sermons and other volumes of discourses have been widely read. His Bible-class in the university became widely known; and his preaching was not merely faithful official exhortation, it was the outburst of an earnest desire for the salvation of souls. It was his constant custom to talk individually with his students regarding their spiritual state, and to pray with them singly. In 1857-58, having retired from the college presidency, he acted for more than a year as pastor of the First Baptist Church in Providence, not only preaching each Sunday, but going, in pastoral visiting, from house to house to every family in the congregation, urging his hearers in person to become followers of Christ. He often preached to the inmates of prisons and other public institutions. In all his course of public service he never ceased to be an earnest and effective preacher of the gospel.

His union of great mental power with strong common sense made him a wise counsellor and trusted guide. In the religious enterprises, both of his own ecclesiastical connection and of united Christian bodies, he was looked up to as an adviser and leader. As a citizen, also, he took a great interest in public affairs, and was continually called on to serve the State in matters which combined civil and moral interests, as, for example, public charities and prison-discipline. He was in the broadest sense a man; and all that pertained to human interests commanded his thoughts and efforts.

LIT. — A Memoir of the Life and Labors of Dr. Wayland, 2 vols. (New York, 1868), by his sons Hon. Francis Wayland, LL.D., and Rev. H. L. Wayland, D.D., gives a list of his published writings, including Discourses (1832), Elements of Moral Science (1835), the same abridged (1836), the same revised (1865), Elements of Political Economy, also abridged (1837), Limits of Human Responsibility (1838), Thoughts on the Present Collegiate System in the United States (1842), Domestic Slavery, A Discussion with Rev. R. Fuller, D.D. (1845), University Sermons (1850), Memoir of the Life and Labors of Rev. A. A. Judson, D.D. (1853), Elements of Intellectual Philosophy (1854), The Principles and Practices of the Baptist Churches (1856), Sermons to the Churches (1858), Salvation by Christ, a republication of University Sermons (1858), Letters on the Ministry (1863), Memoir of the Christian Labors of Thomas Chalmers (1864), also many introductions and notes to various works, articles in reviews and other periodicals, with separate discourses, sermons, addresses, orations, reports, tracts, etc.

NORMAN FOX.

WAZO, Bishop of Liège; b. about 974; d. July 8, 1048. It was as a driver he first attracted the attention of Notger, bishop of Liège; and, as he showed aptness to learn, he was placed in the cathedral school. In due time he became teacher in the school, dean of the chapter, provost, and in 1041 he was elected bishop of Liège; and after some difficulties he was confirmed by Henry III. He proved a worthy bishop in every respect; and though he is of no great importance, either in history or in theology, his Life, written a few years after his death, by Anselmus, in his Gesta episcoporum Leodicensium, has a great interest to the student of the social state of affairs in those times. See Albrecht Vogel, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie.

WEEK (שבוע, pl. שבועות and שבועות; ἑβδομάς, septimana). The Greeks and Romans first became acquainted with the seven-day week through Christianity and the scattered Jews. [The Romans adopted it after the reign of Theodosius.] The expression ἑβδομάς is not found in the New Testament, but rather ὁσάββατον (e.g., Luke xviii. 12) or ὁσάββα (e.g., Matt. xxviii. 1), used, however, in the sense of it, as, in the Old Testament, שבועות is parallel with שבועות (cf. Lev. xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 9). But מִיָּא, דְּוֵרְטָא, etc., σαββάτων, the special names for the days of the week, were not used by the Jews. The age of this hebdomadal division among the Jews depends upon the disputed date of the sabbath. (See SABBATH.) But, since the lunar month divides itself naturally into four periods of seven days each, this division must have been very old. It is found among all Semites. For the peculiar use of the word "week" in Daniel, see DANIEL. [See art. "Week" in SMITH: Dict. of the Bible. R. NÄGELSACH.]

WEGSCHEIDER, Julius August Ludwig, the representative of rationalistic theology; b. at Kumbelungen, Brunswick, Sept. 17, 1771; d. at Halle, Jan. 27, 1849. He studied theology at Helmstadt, and was from 1795 to 1805 tutor in a merchant's family in Hamburg, where he published Ethics stoicorum recentiorum fundamenta cum principis ethicis a Kantio propositis comparata, 1797, and Ueber die von der neuesten Philosophie geforderte Trennung der Moral von der Religion, 1801. After settling at Göttingen as reputant in the university, he published in 1806 his Einleitung in das Evangelium Johannis, and was in the same year appointed professor of theology at Rinteln in Hesse. But in 1810 the university of Rinteln was closed, and he was removed, as professor of theology, to Halle. There he published in 1815 his principal work (Institutiones theologice dogmaticæ), which, in the department of systematic theology, is the true representative of rationalism. Immediately after the fall of Napoleon, the university of Halle entered upon a career of great prosperity; and Wegscheider, as its most celebrated professor, often gathered more than three hundred students to his lectures. But early in 1830 he and his friend Gesenius were summoned before a committee of investigation, and even threatened with deposition, on account of the open rationalism of their teaching. The outbreak, however, of the revolution of 1830, made the king of Prussia unwilling to employ rigorous measures of any kind. Wegscheider remained in office; but his influence was completely lost, and the theological leadership passed to Uhlmann, Tholuck, and Julius Müller. The scientific worth of the Institutiones is very small. It has no originality. All its principal ideas were borrowed from Henke's Lineamenta, and Ammon's Summa, and the manner in which those ideas are combined is always superficial, and sometimes contradictory. See W. STEIGER: Kritik des Rationalismus in Wegscheider's Dogmatik, 1830; and HASE: Antirohr, 1837. THOLUCK.

WEIGEL, Valentin, b. at Hain in Misnia, 1533; studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg from 1551 to 1567; and was in the latter year appointed pastor of Zschoppau in Saxony, where he died June 10, 1588. He appears to have been a precursor of Bohme, and, on a basis of mysticism, a decided adversary of the scholasticism in which the Reformation ended. Frightened by the terrorism of the reigning orthodoxy, he published nothing; and probably very few of his parishioners noticed his heterodoxies; but privately he elaborated his system; and after his death his cantor, Weikert, began to promulgate his ideas in public. Weikert was deposed, and nothing further is known of him. But a circle of adherents had been formed, and by them the writings of Weigel were published at Halle and Magdeburg in 1612. The mysticism of Weigel is strongly pantheistic, but in his system of pantheism the human personality plays a prominent part. Man he represents, not only as a microcosmos, but as a microtheos; that is, as the point of passage through which the world, having emanated from God, again returns to him. Thus man, by studying himself, may learn all that is necessary, both about God and about the world,—a view utterly antagonistic to the reigning orthodoxy, which made the salvation of man absolutely dependent upon objective means of grace. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES AMONG THE HEBREWS. MEASURES. — The ancient Hebrews employed four kinds of measures, — measures of length, measures of capacity, measures of distance, and square measures.

I. Measures of Length. — These are chiefly taken from some natural standard, such as the various portions of fore-arm and hand. Measuring-instruments were the measuring-reed, "k'né hammiddah," also called "shebet" (Ezek. xl. 3, 5, xlii. 16; Jer. x. 16, li. 19; Ps. lxxiv. 2), and the measuring-line, "kav," "pethil pishtim," also "lilcheb mid-dah" (2 Kings xxi. 13; Ezek. xl. 3, xlvii. 3; 2 Sam. viii. 2; Amos vii. 17, Zech. ii. 2). The unit of the measures of length was the ammah, or cubit, the length of which was probably made according to a certain standard; we can infer this from the prohibition contained in Lev. xix. 35 sq. According to 1 Chron. xxiii. 29, the Levites seemed to have had the oversight of measure and weight; and that such a control was necessary we see from Deut. xxv. 14 sq.; Amos viii. 5; Mic. vi. 11; Prov. xi. 1, xvi. 11, xx. 10, 23. Fractions of the cubit were, (a) zereth, or span [properly, a spreading of the fingers] (Exod. xxviii. 16, xxxix. 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 4; [Isa. xl. 12]; Ezek. xlii. 13); (b) tephach, or hand-breadth (1 Kings vii. 26, 2 Chron. iv. 5; Ps. xxxix. 5), also called tephach (Exod. xxv. 25, xxxvii. 12; Ezek. xl. 5, 43, xlii. 13); (c) etsha, or finger-breadth, only mentioned in Jer. li. 21. The plurality of the cubit was the kanch, or reed (Ezek. xl. 5-8, xli. 8, xlii. 16-19). Summing up the relation of each of these measures to one another, we get the following table:—

	1 reed = 6 cubits = 12 spans = 36 palms = 144 fingers
or	1                      - 2                      6                      - 24
or	1                      '                      - 12
or	1                      4

II. Measures of Distance. — The smallest is (a) tsa'ad, or pace (only 2 Sam. vi. 13). (b) Kilbrath ha-arets [rendered in the Authorized Version "a little way," or "a little piece of ground"] (Gen. xxxv. 16, xlviii. 7; 2 Kings v. 19). The measure is uncertain: the Septuagint renders it "hippodrome," and in the Syriac it is rendered "parasang." If the latter be true, then it would be thirty stadia, or three-fourths to three-fifths of a geographical mile. (c) Derek yôm, or mahalak yôm, a day's journey (Gen. xxx. 36, xxxi. 23; Exod. iii. 18, v. 3; Num. x. 33, xi. 31, xxxiii. 8; Deut. i. 2; 1 Kings xix. 1, 2 Kings iii. 9; Jon. iii. 3; 1 Macc. v. 21, 28, vii. 45; Tob. vi. 1; Luke ii. 44). A specifically Jewish measure of distance was the sabbath-way, concerning which minute enactments are laid down in the Talmud (Treatise, Sabbath and Erubin).

III. Of Square Measures only tsemed, or acre, is mentioned (1 Sam. xiv. 14; Isa. v. 10).

IV. Measures of Capacity. — At a very early period there existed measures for liquids, and dry measures. (A) Liquid Measures. (a) Bath, as measured =  $\frac{1}{6}$  cor (1 Kings vii. 26, 38; 2 Chron. ii. 10; Ez. vii. 22; Isa. v. 10). (b) Hin =  $\frac{1}{4}$  bath (Exod. xxx. 34; Ezek. xlv. 24, xlvii. 5, 7, 11). Fractions thereof, like  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}$ ,  $\frac{1}{4}$ , of a hin, are mentioned (Exod. xxix. 40; Lev. xxiii. 13; Num. xv. 4, [5, 6, 7, 9, 10], xxviii. 5, [7, 14]; Ezek. iv. 11, [14]). (c) Log =  $\frac{1}{12}$  hin,  $\frac{1}{12}$  bath (Lev. xiv. 10, 12, 15, 21, 24), originally signifying a "basin." (B) Dry Measures. (a) Lethech =  $\frac{1}{2}$  homer, occurs only in Hos. iii. 2. (b) Ephah =  $\frac{1}{6}$  homer, of frequent occurrence in the Bible (Exod. xvi. 36; Lev. v. 11, vi. 20; Num. v. 15, xxviii. 5; Judg. vi. 19; Ruth ii. 17; 1 Sam. i. 24, xvii. 17; Ezek. xlv. 11, 13, 14, xlvii. 5, 7, 11, 14): it is probably of Egyptian origin. (c) Seah =  $\frac{1}{2}$  ephah, denoting "measure" (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Sam. xxv. 18; 2 Kings vii. 1, 16). The seah was otherwise termed shalish, as being the third part of an ephah (Isa. xl. 12; Ps. lxxx. 5). (d) Issaron, the tenth part of an ephah (Exod. xvi. 36; in the Authorized Version, "tenth deal" (Lev. xiv. 10, xxiii. 13; Num. xv. 4). The older name seems to have been omer (Exod. xvi. 16-36). (e) Cub, i.e., hollow or concave, mentioned only 2 Kings vi. 25. Both the liquid and dry measures had one large measure in common, the cor (1 Kings iv. 22, v. 11; 2 Chron. ii. 10, xxvii. 5; Ez. vii. 22; Ezek. xlv. 14), also called homer, meaning "heap" (Lev. xxvii. 16; Num. xl. 32; Isa. v. 10; Ezek. xlv. 13), and equal to 10 bath. The "homer" was used only as dry measure. For the liquid measures we thus get:—

	1 cor = 10 bath = 60 hin = 720 log
or	1 = 6 = 72
or	1 = 12

For the dry measures:—

	1 homer = 10 ephah = 30 seah = 100 omer = 180 cab
or	1 = 3 = 10 = 18
or	1 = 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ = 6
or	1 = 1 $\frac{1}{2}$

WEIGHTS.—At a very early period the Hebrews seem to have used scales for determining the weight of things, especially of precious metals. The weights generally consisted of stones. There were five standard of weights,—beka, gerah, shekel, maneh, and kikkar. The highest was (a) the kikkar, or talent, literally "a circle," hence any round object, and thus a circular piece of money. It was of gold (1 Kings ix. 14) and of silver (2 Kings v. 22). (b) Maneh, the Greek mna, or mná, strictly a portion, i.e., a subdivision of the "talent" =  $\frac{1}{60}$  kikkar. (c) Shekel, properly a weight, the usual unit of estimation applied to coins and weights. It likewise was of two kinds,—the sacred (Lev. v. 15) and the royal (2 Sam. xiv. 26). (d) Beka, strictly a cleft or fraction (Gen. xxiv. 22); and (e) gerah, properly a kernel or bean, like our "grain" (Ezek. xlv. 12; Exod. xxx. 13; Lev. xxvii. 25; Num. iii. 17). For the weights we thus get:—

	1 kikkar = 60 maneh = 3,000 shekel = 6,000 beka = 60,000 gerah
or	1 = 50 = 100 = 1,000
or	1 = 2 = 20
or	1 = 10

WEIR, Duncan Harkness, D.D., Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Glasgow, and one of the members of the Old-Testament Company of the Revisers of the Authorized Version of the Bible; b. at Greenock in 1822; d. at Glasgow, Nov. 21, 1876. He attained much distinction at college, but first attracted the attention of biblical scholars by his contributions to Kitto's Journal of Biblical Literature. He was appointed to the Glasgow chair in 1850, and in that position assisted very materially to raise in Scotland the too long neglected study of the Hebrew language, as well as of the Old-Testament Scriptures, to its true place in theological science. A strict disciplinarian, he was, above all, a sympathetic and stimulating teacher. To quote the language of one of his colleagues in the funeral-sermon delivered in the university after his death, "His familiarity with the Hebrew language in all its phases, his rational analysis and explanation even of its most peculiar and apparently abnormal phenomena, his delicate perception of its niceties, his sympathetic appreciation of the spirit of Hebrew poetry and Hebrew prophecy, gave to his prelections an interest and charm which were enhanced by the transparent simplicity and earnestness of his character." Another colleague, who had been his friend from his earliest years, thus described in a local periodical his personal character: "The grave has seldom closed over one whose life was more pure and blameless, more uniformly regulated by high principle and motive, and more incapable of an unworthy or ignoble action. A somewhat reserved manner gave, perhaps, to strangers, in their intercourse with him, the impression of coldness and austerity; but those who were honored by his friendship know well how their respect and admiration for the memory of the great scholar, the acute thinker, the sagacious counsellor, are blended with the deeper sorrow for the loss of the true and tender-hearted friend."

Dr. Weir died at a comparatively early age, and unhappily left behind him no adequate results, at least in a permanent form, of the great learning and ability by which, in the knowledge of those who knew him, he was so eminently distinguished. His chief literary works are occasional contributions to Kitzo's Journal, already mentioned, to the Imperial Bible Dictionary, and to The Academy. Professor Cheyne, in the Introduction to his book on Isaiah, expresses his obligations to suggestions of Dr. Weir privately communicated to him. His non-productiveness in the way of authorship was partly due to the exacting nature of the duties of his chair, to which he devoted himself with scrupulous fidelity, and partly to the fact that he was looking forward, as he might reasonably do at his age, to a time of greater leisure, when the immense store of materials on Old-Testament criticism which he had accumulated, might be reduced to shape, and given to the public.

WILLIAM LEE.

WEISS, Charles, b. at Strassburg, Dec. 10, 1812; d. at Vanves, 1881. He was professor of history in the Lycée Bonaparte; and both his L'Espagne depuis le règne de Philippe II. jusqu'à l'avènement des Bourbons (Paris, 1844, 2 vols.) and his Histoire des réfugiés protestants de France (Paris, 1853, 2 vols.) were crowned by the Academy. In 1864 he became insane, and spent the rest of his life in an asylum at Vanves, near Paris.

WEISS, Pantaleon, generally known under the name Candidus; b. at Ips, in Lower Austria, Oct. 7, 1540; d. at Zweibrücken, Feb. 3, 1608. He studied at Wittenberg from 1557 to 1564; and was in 1565 appointed rector of the Latin School of Zweibrücken, and, later on, pastor and superintendent of that city. Though he had studied at Wittenberg, and was honored with the friendship of Melancthon, he was by the strict Lutherans suspected of inclining towards Calvinism; and he became, indeed, instrumental in the conversion of the principality of Zweibrücken from the Lutheran to the Reformed faith. At a theological disputation at Bergzabern, July, 1578, he for the first time divulged his Calvinist views of the personality of Christ, which he further developed in his Dialogus de unione personali duarum in Christo personarum, Geneva, 1583. He was immediately met by strong opposition; but the duke took his side; and in July, 1589, the court-preacher, Heilbrunner, one of the leaders of the Lutherans, was banished from the country. In 1586 Candidus published anonymously his Klarer Bericht vom heiligen Abendmahl, which, point for point, follows the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper; and in 1588 the Reformed faith was officially established in the country by the introduction of the Catechism of Zweibrücken, which was drawn up in close imitation of the Catechism of Heidelberg. Some resistance was offered by the inhabitants, but no serious disturbances took place. Among the other writings of Candidus is a great number of poems in Latin (Elegie precationum, Epigrammatorum sacrorum, libri xii., etc.), but none in German. See F. BUTTERS: Pantaleon Candidus, Zweibrücken, 1865.

WEISSE, Christian Hermann, b. at Leipzig, Aug. 10, 1801; d. there Sept. 19, 1866. He was professor of philosophy in the university of his native city, and wrote on mythology and æsthetics, but exercised also considerable influence on the development of Protestant theology by his Philosophische Dogmatik, 1855-62, 3 vols. (an attempt at combining the theism of Christianity with the Hegelian Pantheism), and by his Die evangelische Geschichte (1838), 2 vols., against Strauss, Reden über die Zukunft der evangelischen Kirche (1849), and Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigen Stadium (1856).

WELLS, Edward, D.D., b. about 1665; d. at Cottesbush, Leicestershire, August, 1727. He was graduated at Christ's College, Oxford; was rector of Blotchley, Buckinghamshire, and of Cottesbush, 1717. He edited the works of Xenophon, Oxford, 1703, 5 vols.; also the Greek New Testament, as part of his useful work, A Help for the more Easy and Clear Understanding of the Holy Scriptures, 1709-28, 21 parts, which embraced a revised English translation, paraphrase, and notes; and the Book of Daniel in similar style, on the basis of the LXX., 1716.

WELSH (The) CALVINISTIC METHODIST CHURCH, known in the United States as the Welsh Presbyterian Church.

WALES. History.—This church is in origin independent of, and in organization prior to, English Methodism. Its beginnings are to be found in the self-denying labors of clergymen of the Established Church; such as the Rev. Griffith Jones of Llanddowror, Carmarthenshire, who is justly called "the morning-star of the Methodist revival." Installed in 1716, he commenced immediately a work of evangelization, and in 1730, to make his labors more effective, established a system of circulating schools, in which both children and adults were taught to read the Scriptures. The work of Griffith Jones, and others in spirit like him, was, however, but the preparation of the ground for the seed. The Welsh Methodist revival, properly so called, began in 1735-36, through the earnest ministry of Howell Harris, Daniel Rowlands, and Howell Davies; the former a layman, the two latter clergymen, Davies being a convert and pupil of Griffith Jones. These men first gave Welsh religious reform organic life. Their work was, however, carried on wholly within the Established Church. They and their followers attempted the useless work of reforming that organization as it then was. Had they separated from it, they would as dissenters have been protected, by the Act of Toleration, from the savage persecution to which they were frequently subjected. So strongly did they cling to the Establishment, that it was only after seventy-six years (in 1811), that they ceased as a body from communing in the parish churches. Their first society (the first Methodist society in Britain) was organized at Erwood in Brecknockshire, in 1736. By the beginning of 1739 thirty societies had been organized in South Wales alone. Their first General Association was held at Watford, Glamorganshire, Jan. 5 and 6, 1742, two years and a half prior to the first conference of English Methodists, convened by Wesley in London. The moderator at the Watford association was, by invitation, the Rev. George Whitefield, who came into personal relation with the movement first in 1739. From 1751 to 1762 the denomination grew but little, owing to internal dissensions, occasioned by differences between the two leaders, — Harris and Rowlands. These differences were not doctrinal in their nature; for the controversies which divided the English Methodists never affected their Welsh brethren, the latter being almost to a man Calvinists. In 1762-63 a great revival welded the divided church to an inseparable union. The year 1785 was signalized by the accession of the Rev. Thomas Charles of Bala, whose great work was the organizing of the denominational sabbath schools. These were in many respects similar to the circulating-schools established by Griffith Jones, and like them, included the adults, as well as the children, of the congregations. The study of the Scriptures in these schools, by the whole church, led to two important results, — the one a demand for Welsh Bibles beyond the then means of supply, and as a consequence to the formation, in 1801, of the British and Foreign Bible Society; the other, a new impetus to the cause of Calvinistic Methodism. In fact, the formal act of separation from the Established Church was forced upon the denomination by its rapid growth. Communion in the few parish churches having "Methodistic" rectors became impossible to a body numbering its members by tens of thousands. And in the General Associations held at Bala and at Llandilo Fawr in 1811, twenty-one persons were ordained to the office of the ministry. This step led to the withdrawal of the majority of the episcopally ordained ministers, but their defection did not check the progress of the Welsh Calvinists. In 1813 the Home Mission Society was organized, for work in the English districts bordering on Wales. In 1823 a Confession of Faith was adopted. In 1839 a theological seminary was established at Bala, and in 1842 another at Trevecca. The work of foreign missions was carried on, until 1840, in connection with the London Missionary Society; but since that date the church has maintained missions of its own in Khassia, India, in Brittany to the Breton kinsmen of the Welsh, and in London to the Jews. The last step in its organization was taken by the constitution of the General Assembly, at Swansea, in 1864.

The church is a member of the Presbyterian Alliance, and is in numbers, in influence, and in Christian work, the foremost church of the Principality. Stevens, in his History of Methodism, graphically describes it as the source to Wales of that "extraordinary religious progress by which the thirty dissenting churches of 1715 have increased (1857) to 2,300; by which a chapel now dots nearly every three square miles of the country, and over a million people, nearly the whole Welsh population (seven-eighths), are found attending public worship some part of every sabbath."

Doctrine. — The doctrines of the Confession of Faith of this church are in substantial harmony with the doctrines of the Westminster Confession. The word "Methodist" in its name is, therefore, to be understood as defining, not a form of doctrine, but methods of Christian life and work. The Confession is published in both English and Welsh.

Polity. — The polity of this church was from its origin practically Presbyterian; the first "societies" being represented in the monthly meetings and the General Association by stewards, deacons, or elders, as well as by ministers and exhorters; and it is to be distinctly noted, that Howell Harris, a layman, was for many years the moderator of the General Association. The government consists at present (1883) of twenty-five monthly meetings or presbyteries, two synods, and a general assembly. The points wherein the polity differs from that of other Presbyterian churches are, (1) Members are received and disciplined by the particular church in congregational meeting; (2) Elders are nominated by the churches, but cannot be installed until approved by the presbytery; (3) Candidates for the ministry must be recommended to the presbytery by a three-fourths vote of the church with which they are connected; (4) Ministers are ordained by the synods, on recommendation of the presbyteries, after five years' trial as probationers; (5) All the elders of a church are members of presbytery; (6) The church-buildings are the property of the denomination as a whole; (7) The General Assembly consists of two ministers and two elders from each presbytery, and, in addition, the moderators and clerks of the synods, the treasurers and secretaries of the Foreign Missionary Society, the previous moderators of the Assembly, and the conveners of committees.

Worship. — The church uses no Liturgy. Its services are simple, characterized by earnestness, and are conducted, as a rule, in the Welsh language.

UNITED STATES. History, etc. — The first Calvinistic Methodist in America was the Rev. George Whitefield. Welsh emigrants of the Calvinistic faith began to enter the country about 1776; but being few in number, and unfamiliar with the English language, they worshipped, for many years after that date, with the Welsh Independents. Their first church was organized at Poughkeepsie, Remsen, Oneida County, N.Y., in the year 1826. Within a year or two after, the first presbytery was formed. In 1838 a denominational magazine, F Cynfaill o'r Hen Wlad ("The Friend from the Old Country"), was established in New-York City by the Rev. William Rowlands, D.D., and aided greatly in furthering the interests of the denomination. In 1845 fraternal relations were entered into with the Old School General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church. The denomination is strongest in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and Minnesota; and its synods bear the names of these States respectively. The presbyteries (1882) number eighteen. The General Assembly, established in 1870, meets triennially. In doctrine the Welsh Calvinists in the United States agree with their brethren in Britain. In polity they are, in some particulars, more nearly assimilated to the American Presbyterian churches.

WENDELIN, or WANDELIN, a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, whose festival falls on Oct. 20. He was a native of Scotland, and flourished in the seventh century. Educated for the church, he went to Germany as a missionary; settled near Treves, and labored with so great success that the monks of Tholey, a convent situated near the Saar, chose him their abbot. Nothing more is known of him with certainty, but he is still devotedly worshipped in many parts of Germany and Switzerland as the protector of the cattle. See Act. Sanct., July 6, p. 171.

WENDELIN, Markus Friedrich, b. at Sandhausen, near Heidelberg, 1584; d. at Zerbst, Aug. 7, 1652. He studied theology at Heidelberg; was for several years tutor to the young princess of Anhalt-Dessau; and was in 1611 appointed rector of the gymnasium of Zerbst, which position he retained to his death. His education fell in the period immediately after the contest between the Lutherans and the Reformed in the Palatinate. The Reformed came out victorious; but the contest had compelled them to employ the highest degree of scholastical precision in the exposition of their views; and in his theological works — Compendium christianæ theologiæ, Hanau, 1631; Christianæ theologiæ systema notius, published after his death, Cassel, 1656, and translated into Dutch and Hungarian; Exercitationes theologicae contra Gerhardum et Dauhauerum, and Collatio doctrinæ reformationis et Lutheranismi, Cassel, 1660 — he shows himself to be one of the chief representatives of that Reformed scholasticism. But his great learning and activity outside of the field of theology kept his theological scholasticism in a healthy condition; indeed, scholasticism was with him nothing more than a method. A. EBRARD.

WENDS is the collective name of a number of Slavic tribes which in ancient time inhabited the northern part of Germany, along the Baltic Sea, between the Elbe and the Vistula, — Obotrites in Mecklenburg; Ranes, or Rugians, in the Island of Rugen; Pomeranians; Sorbians in Misnia and Brandenburg, etc. The name was derived from the old German wand ("water"), that is, those who live by the water; but they called themselves Slavenes, from slowo ("word"), that is, those who can speak and make themselves understood; while they called the Germans ajem, ajemetz (the "dumb," the "unintelligible"). Agriculture, cattle-raising, fishing, and piracy, were their general occupations. Their religion was a strongly marked dualism, in which the evil always seemed about to gain the ascendancy. They worshipped their gods in temples and sacred groves, with many superstitious and cruel rites. Their morals were narrow, but not depraved. They were temperate, hospitable, independent, true to their friends, though it was considered fair to break a promise given to an enemy, and chaste, though their marriages were polygamous. In the eighth century the conflicts began between them and their Germanic neighbors to the south and the west; but all the advantages which Charlemagne gained over them were lost under his weak successors. More permanent was the success of the energetic kings of the Saxon dynasty. Henry I. conquered Biernburg (Brandenburg) and Gana (probably the present Jahna in Misnia), two of the principal seats of the Wends; and after the battle of Lunkini, which lasted for four days, he formed the margraviate of Misnia, built fortresses in the conquered land, planted Saxon colonies among the Wends, and sent forth Christian missionaries, 929. Under Otto I. the Christianization and Germanization of the Wends were carried on with still greater energy. He founded the bishoprics of Havelberg (946), Brandenburg (949), Merseburg, and Zeitz (968); and, in order to give more vigor to the Wendish mission, he determined to form all those bishoprics into an independent archbishopric at Magdeburg; which plan he also succeeded in accomplishing in spite of the protests of the bishop of Halberstadt and the archbishop of Mayence. Nevertheless, it cost great exertions before Christianity became fully established among the Wends. More than two centuries elapsed, filled with insurrections and bloody feuds. See the articles on GOTTSCALK and VICELIN.

LIT. — The sources of the history of the Christianization of the Wends are the Chronicles of Widukind, Thietmar, Adam of Bremen, and Helmold. WERENFELS, Samuel, b. at Basel, March 1, 1657; d. there June 1, 1740. He studied at Zurich and Geneva; visited Holland and Northern Germany; and was appointed professor in his native city, first of rhetoric, afterwards of theology. His Opuscula, published at Basel in 1718, and again in 1782, are still of interest, especially his De logomachis eruditum and De scopo quem scriptura interpreti sibi proponere debet: the former of general rhetorical, the latter of special hermeneutical bearing. He was, indeed, the first to propound those principles of grammatical and historical exegesis which afterwards Ernesti brought to prevail, inculcating that not the possible, but only the actual, meaning of a passage is of any account. HAGENBACH.

WERKMEISTER, Benedikt Maria von, b. at Allgäu in Upper Swabia, Oct. 22, 1745; d. at Steinbach, near Stuttgart, July 16, 1823. He entered the order of the Benedictines in 1761; studied theology at Neresheim and Benedictbeuren; was ordained a priest in 1769; and taught philosophy and canon law at various Roman-Catholic seminaries in Wurtemberg, but was dismissed in 1794 as an adherent of "Josephinism" (see art.). In 1796, however, he was made pastor of Steinbach, and later on he held various positions of honor in the administration. He wrote against the celibacy of priests, against the worship of Mary, etc.

His book in favor of divorce (Beweis, dass die bei den Protestanten üblichen Ehescheidungen auch nach katholischen Grundsätzen gültig sind, 1804, 2d ed., 1810) produced a great sensation. PALMER.

WERNSDORF, Gottlieb, b. at Schönewalde, Feb. 25, 1668; d. at Wittenberg, July 1, 1729; was appointed professor of theology in his native city in 1689, and provost of the cathedral church, and superintendent-general, in 1710. He was one of the last prominent representatives of the old, strict Lutheran orthodoxy. In his treatise, De auctoritate librorum symbolicorum, he vindicates a mediate inspiration for the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. His Disputationes academice, of which a collected edition appeared in 1736, and which touch all the vital questions of the time, are not without interest. THOLUCK.

WERTHEIM, The Bible of, is a German translation of the Pentateuch, the first instalment of the translation of the whole Bible which was published at Wertheim in 1735 by J. L. Schmidt, at that time tutor in the house of the count of Löwenstein. The work is a paraphrase rather than a translation, and is executed, not without knowledge, but on the principles of the flattest rationalism. Not only are the spirit and true character of the original work entirely lost, but the meaning of single passages is often so curiously though unintentionally perverted, that the result becomes perfectly ridiculous. Nevertheless, the work found its patrons, and was on the way to a fair success, when it was most vehemently denounced by the theologians. An imperial edict of Jan. 15, 1737, ordered the work to be seized, and the author imprisoned. The end of the affair is not known, but Schmidt died in 1750 as tutor to the ducal pages of Wolfenbüttel. The book, though confiscated, is not difficult to get hold of in second-hand bookstores, and is of great historical interest. The various pamphlets which were issued in the controversy caused by the work have been collected by J. N. Sinnhold, Erfurt, 1737, and by the author himself, 1738. ED. REUSS.

WESEL, Johann von, one of the most interesting characters among the Reformers before the Reformation; b. at Oberwesel in the beginning of the fifteenth century; d. at Mayence in 1481. Very little is known of his life before formal proceedings were instituted against him as a heretic in 1479, and at that time he was an old man. In the middle of the century he taught philosophy and theology at Erfurt. In philosophy he was a nominalist, one of the foremost leaders of that reaction against realism which was setting in just at that time. He taught with great effect: he made the whole university nominalistic. Luther himself testifies to his success. In theology his influence was less pronounced, though the stand he took upon the Bible was in striking opposition to the prevailing scholasticism and the method of the sententiaries. But, in spite of their audacity in attacking established powers, his Adversus indulgentias (probably published while Nicholas of Cusa was preparing the public mind for the jubilee indulgences of 1450), and his De potestate ecclesiastica (probably of a somewhat later date), seem at first to have caused him no annoyance. In 1455 he was the vice-rector of the university; in 1460 he was appointed preacher at Mayence; and, when the plague forced him to leave that place, he obtained a similar position at Worms in 1462. It would even seem that the real cause of the process instituted against him was hatred of his philosophical views, and not indignation at his theological ideas: for the process was instituted, not by his next superior, the bishop of Worms, but by the archbishop of Mayence; and the tribunal before which he was summoned was composed, not simply of the inquisitors of Cologne, but also of some professors from Heidelberg, all of whom were realists. The process was opened Feb. 4, 1479, and the very first proceedings showed the ill-will which the judges bore him. The principal charges were, that he denied the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son, rejected tradition, and disputed the absolute authority of a council legitimately convened. Then followed a number of minor errors. Concerning sin, he said that there was no deadly sin but that which the Bible designated as such; concerning hereditary sin, that it did not exist in the foetus; concerning the Lord's Supper, that the doctrine of transubstantiation was unnecessary; concerning celibacy, monasticism, fasts, etc., that they were not obligatory; concerning the hierarchical organization, that there was no difference between a bishop and a presbyter. At every point he made as great concessions as he conscientiously could, and by a general recantation he succeeded in escaping the stake; but he was locked up for life in an Augustinian convent at Mayence. From the elaborate report of the trial which has come down to us, as well as from Wesel's writing, it is evident that he mastered the formal principle of Protestantism — Scripture the sole rule of faith — with a greater clearness and completeness than the Reformers themselves, at least in the beginning of the Reformation. But it is also evident that he never actually reached the material principle of Protestantism, — justification by faith; though he began his attack at the very same point as the Reformers, — the doctrine of indulgences. He knew very well that ecclesiastical penance is very far from being identical with divine punishment, and that the Pope can dispense only from the former. He knew, furthermore, that a treasure of good works at the disposal of the Pope, and the transference by him of merit from one person to another, were empty pretensions. But to his eyes the sale of indulgences was simply an ecclesiastical abuse: that it was a danger to conscience he did not see.

LIT. — Wesel was quite a prolific writer, but of his works only the two above mentioned have come down to us. A report of his trial is found in D'ARGENTRÉ: Collectio judiciorum de novis erroribus, Paris, 1728. It consists of three parts, — Paradoxa Joannis de Wesalia (a collection of heretical propositions drawn from his various works), Examen magistrale (a representation of the trial), and, finally, a survey by the author of the whole affair. See ULLMANN: Johann Wesel, 1834, and Reformers before the Reformation [Eng. trans., Edinb., 1855, 2 vols.; 2d Ger. ed., 1866]. II. SCHMIDT.

WESLEY, Charles, youngest son of Samuel Wesley, sen., was b. at Epworth in Lincolnshire, Dec. 18, 1708, O.S. (Dec. 29, N.S.); and d. in London, March 29, 1788. In childhood he declined an offer of adoption by a wealthy namesake in Ireland; and the person taken in his stead became an earl, and grandfather to the Duke of Wellington. He was educated at Westminster school, under his brother Samuel, 1716; at St. Peter's College, Westminster, 1721; and at Christ Church, Oxford, 1726, where, with his brother John and one or two others, he received the nickname of "Methodist." In 1735 he was ordained, and went with John Wesley to Georgia, returning 1736. May 21, 1738, he "experienced the witness of adoption," and at once joined his brother's evangelistic work, travelling much, and preaching with great zeal and success. He never held ecclesiastical preferment, and bore his share of the persecutions which beset the early Methodists. April 8, 1749, he married Sarah Gwynne: by her he had eight children, two of whom became eminent musicians. John Wesley's expression, "his least praise was his talent for poetry," is unmeaning: whatever his other gifts and graces, it is as "the poet of Methodism" and the most gifted and voluminous of English hymn-writers that his fame and influence live. The Poetical Works of John and Charles Wesley, as reprinted by the Wesleyan Conference, 1868-72, fill thirteen volumes, or near six thousand pages. Of the original publications, the earlier ones bore the names of both brothers, but most were the work of Charles alone. While in the books of joint authorship it is not always possible to distinguish with absolute certainty between the two, it is generally agreed that John wrote only the translations (almost wholly from the German, some forty in all) and a very few originals. Their style is the same, save for a little more severity and dignity on John's part. Their first volume (or perhaps John's alone, for it bears no name), possibly also the first English Collection of Psalms and Hymns, appeared at Charleston, S.C., 1737. A single copy was found in London, 1879, and reprinted 1882. It contains some pieces by John, but apparently none by Charles, who perhaps had not then begun to write. Another small Collection was published in London, 1738; and in 1739 began the long series of original works in verse. The more extensive of these were Hymns and Sacred Poems, 1739, 1740, 1742 (three separate books); the same, 1749, 2 vols.; Hymns on God's Everlasting Love, 1741; On the Lord's Supper, 1745; For those that Suck and those that have Redemption, 1747; Funeral Hymns, 1746-59; Short Hymns on Select Passages of Holy Scripture, 2 vols. (2,318 pieces), 1762; Hymns for Children, 1763; For Families, 1767; On the Trinity, 1767. Besides these there are some twenty tracts, minor in size, but containing some of Charles Wesley's most effective lyrics, and a few elegies and epistles. The work of publication went on, though less vigorously in later years, till 1755, and that of composition till his death, at which he left in manuscript a quantity of verse, chiefly on Bible-texts, equal to one-third of that printed in his lifetime. His huge fecundity hindered his fame: had he written less, he might be read more; but he had not the gift of condensing. His thoughts, or at least his feelings, flowed more readily in verse than in prose: he wrote on horseback, in a stage-coach, almost in "the article of death." His fifty-six Hymns for Christian Friends, some of them long and widely used, were dedicated to Miss Gwynne; and his last verse, taken down by her "when he could scarcely articulate," preserves something of the old fire. He wrote with equal grace In Going to Answer a Charge of Treason, and For a Child Cutting his Teeth. Nearly every occasion and condition of external life is provided for in the vast range of his productions, which have more "variety of matter and manner" than critics have commonly supposed; and, as to feelings and experiences, "he has celebrated them with an affluence of diction and a splendor of coloring rarely surpassed" — or, more accurately, never surpassed, and rarely equalled. Temperament and belief alike inclined him to subjective themes, and, guiding his unique lyrical talent, made him pre-eminently "the poet of Methodism." To the wonderful growth and success of that system his hymns were no less essential than his brother's government. They are the main element in most Wesleyan collections, both English and American: probably no school or system in any age or land has owned so mighty an implement in the way of sacred song. For the same reason non-Methodists long suspected and shunned this poetry, and still need to exercise unusual caution in adopting it. Its author was given not only to extravagances of expression (which were sometimes pared down by his brother's severer taste), but to unrestrained and often violent emotion. His ecstasies and agonies occur too frequently for sober readers, and many of his finest pieces are in this high key. Withal he is too fluent, too rhetorical: his mannerism at times involves a lack of simplicity; his "fatal facility of strong words" is a fault both literary and religious. Yet his intensely sincere and fervent piety, his intellectual strength and acuteness, his unmistakably high culture, and the matchless spontaneity of his eloquence, place him easily at the head of British sacred lyrists. No collection is complete — probably for a century none has been formed — without his hymns; and they are now perhaps more generally and widely used than of old. He is entitled to rank not merely as a hymn-writer, but among Christian poets. Many of his pieces which are not adapted to public worship, and very little known, possess much literary and human interest: his autobiographic and polemic verses, e.g., are probably unequalled. He cannot be adequately judged by his fragmentary appearances in the hymnals, not even by John Wesley's Collection for the Use of the People called Methodists (1780; supplement 1830); though that presents a considerable fraction of his writings, with much less abridgment and alteration than any other, and has nearly all the qualities claimed by its editor in his vigorous and memorable preface. FREDERIC M. BIRD.

WESLEY, John, the father of the doctrinal and practical system of Methodism; b. at Epworth, Eng., June 28, 1703; d. in London, March 2, 1791. The Wesley family has been traced, by an indefatigable genealogist in late years, back to a period anterior to the Norman Conquest. In the days of Athelstan the Saxon, Guy Wesley, or Wellesley, was created athane, or member of Parliament: and it is claimed that the genealogy of the family may be followed in an unbroken line from Guy to Samuel Wesley, the father of the Reformer. Samuel Wesley was a graduate of Oxford, and a minister of the Church of England. He married in 1689 Susannah, the twenty-fifth child of Dr. Samuel Annesley, who became the mother of nineteen children. In 1696 he was appointed rector of Epworth, where John, the fifteenth child, was born. He was christened John Benjamin, but he never used the second name. An incident of his childhood was his rescue, at the age of six, from the burning rectory. The manner of his escape made a deep impression on his mind; and he spoke of himself as a "brand plucked from the burning," and as a child of Providence. With a small income and a large family, the good rector, with the utmost economy, was most of the time in debt. The early education of all the children was given by Mrs. Wesley, a woman of remarkable intelligence and deep piety, apt in teaching, and wise and firm in governing. At the age of ten John was admitted to the Charterhouse School, London, where he lived the studious, methodical, and (for a while) religious life in which he had been trained at home. He entered Christ Church College, Oxford, seven years later, was ordained in 1725, elected fellow of Lincoln College in the following year, and given his degree of M.A. in 1727. He served his father as curate two years, and then returned to Oxford to fulfil his functions as fellow.

The year of his return to Oxford (1729) marks the beginning of the rise of Methodism. The famous Holy Club was formed; and its members, including John and Charles Wesley, were derisively called "Methodists," because of their methodical habits. John had enjoyed during his early years a deep religious experience. He went, says his latest and best biographer, Tyerman, to Charterhouse a saint; but he became negligent of his religious duties, and left a sinner. In the year of his ordination he read Thomas à Kempis and Jeremy Taylor, and began to grope after those religious truths which underlay the great revival of the eighteenth century. The reading of Law's Christian Perfection and Serious Call gave him, he said, a sublimer view of the law of God; and he resolved to keep it, inwardly and outwardly, as sacredly as possible, believing that in this obedience he should find salvation. He pursued a rigidly methodical and abstemious life; studied the Scriptures, and performed his religious duties with great diligence; pinched himself that he might have alms to give; and gave his heart, mind, and soul to the effort to live a godly life. When a clergyman "inured to contempt of the ornaments and conveniences of life, to bodily austerities, and to serious thoughts," was wanted to go to Georgia, Wesley responded, and remained in the colony two years, returning to England in 1733, feeling that his mission, which was to convert the Indians, and deepen and regulate the religious life of the colonists, had been a failure. His High-Church notions, his strict enforcement of the regulations of the church, especially concerning the administration of the holy communion, were not agreeable to the colonists; and he left Georgia with several indictments pending against him (largely due to malice) for alleged violation of church law.

As Wesley's spiritual state is the key to his whole career, an account of his conversion in the year of his return from Georgia must not be omitted. For ten years he had fought against sin, striven to fulfil the law of the gospel, endeavored to manifest his righteousness; but he had not, he wrote, obtained freedom from sin, nor the witness of the Spirit, because he sought it, not by faith, but "by the works of the law." He had learned from the Moravians that true faith was inseparably connected with dominion over sin and constant peace proceeding from a sense of forgiveness, and that saving faith is given in a moment. This saving faith he obtained at a Moravian meeting in Aldersgate Street, London, while listening to the reading of Luther's Preface to the Epistle to the Romans, in which explanation of faith and the doctrine of justification by faith is given. "I felt," he wrote, "my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins." Two or three weeks later he preached a remarkable sermon, enforcing the doctrine of present personal salvation by faith, which was followed by another, on God's grace "free in all, and free for all." He never ceased in his whole subsequent career to preach this doctrine and that of the witness of the Spirit. He allied himself with the Moravian society in Fetter Lane, and went to the Moravian headquarters in Germany to learn more of a people to whom he felt deeply indebted. On his return to England he drew up rules for the bands into which the Fetter-Lane society was divided, and published a collection of hymns for them. He met frequently with this and other religious societies in London, but did not preach often in 1738, because most of the parish churches were closed to him. His friend Whitefield, the great evangelist, upon his return from America, was likewise excluded from the churches of Bristol; and, going to the neighboring village of Kingswood, he there preached in the open air, February, 1739, to a company of miners. This was a bold step, and Wesley hesitated to accept Whitefield's earnest request to follow him in this innovation. But he overcame his scruples, and in April preached his first sermon in the open air, near Bristol. He said he could hardly reconcile himself to field-preaching, and would have thought, "till very lately," such a method of saving souls as "almost a sin." These open-air services were very successful; and he never again hesitated to preach in any place where an assembly could be got together, more than once occupying his father's tombstone as a pulpit. He spent upwards of fifty years in field-preaching,—entering churches when he was invited, taking his stand in the fields, in halls, cottages, and chapels, when the churches would not receive him. Late in 1739 a rupture with the Moravians in London occurred. Wesley had helped them organize in May, 1738, the Fetter-Lane society; and the converts of the preaching of himself, his brother, and Whitefield, had become members of their bands. But finding, as he said, that they had fallen into heresies, especially Quietism, a separation took place; and so, at the close of 1739, Wesley was led to form his followers into a separate society. "Thus," he wrote, "without any previous plan, began the Methodist society in England.' Similar societies were soon after formed in Bristol and Kingswood, and wherever Wesley and his co-adjutors made converts.

From 1739 onward, Wesley and the Methodists were persecuted by clergymen and magistrates, attacked in sermon, tract, and book; mobbed by the populace; often in controversy; always at work among the neglected and needy; and ever increasing. They were denounced as promulgators of strange doctrines, fomenters of religious disturbances; as blind fanatics, leading the people astray, claiming miraculous gifts, inveighing against the clergy of the Church of England, and endeavoring to re-establish Popery. Wesley was frequently mobbed, and great violence was done both to the persons and property of Methodists. Seeing, however, that the church failed in its duty to call sinners to repentance, that its clergymen were worldly-minded, and that souls were perishing in their sins, he regarded himself as commissioned of God to warn men to flee from the wrath to come; and no opposition, or persecution, or obstacles were permitted by him to prevail against the divine urgency and authority of his commission. The prejudices of his High-Church training, his strict notions of the methods and proprieties of public worship, his views of the apostolic succession and the prerogatives of the priest, even his most cherished convictions, were not allowed to stand in the way in which Providence seemed to lead. Unwilling that ungodly men should perish in their sins and because they could not be reached from the pulpit, he began field-preaching. Seeing that he and the few clergymen co-operating with him could not do the work that needed to be done, he was led, as early as 1739, to approve tacitly, soon after openly, of lay-preaching; and men who were not episcopally ordained were permitted to preach, and do pastoral work. Thus one of the great features of Methodism, to which it has largely owed its success, was adopted by Wesley in answer to a necessity.

As his societies must have houses to worship in, he began in 1739 to provide chapels, first in Bristol, and then in London and elsewhere. The Bristol chapel was at first in the hands of trustees; but as a large debt was contracted, and Wesley's friends urged him to keep its pulpit under his own control, the deed was cancelled, and the trust became vested in himself. Following this precedent, all Methodist chapels were committed in trust to him until, by a "deed of declaration," all his interests in them were transferred to a body of preachers called the "Legal Hundred." When disorderly persons began to manifest themselves among the members of the societies, he adopted the plan of giving tickets to members, with their names written thereon by his own hand. These were renewed every three months. Those who proved to be unworthy did not receive new tickets, and thus dropped out of the society without disturbance. The tickets were regarded as commendatory letters. When the debt on the chapel became burdensome, it was proposed that one in every twelve of the members should collect offerings for it regularly from the eleven allotted to him. Out of this, under Wesley's care, grew, in 1742, the Methodist class-meeting system, which Wesley found of great advantage in promoting fellowship, in removing unworthy members, and in affording opportunity to instruct, rebuke, exhort, encourage. In order more effectually to keep the disorderly out of the societies, he established a probationary system, and resolved to visit each society once in three months. Thus arose the quarterly visitation, or conference. As the societies increased, he could not continue his practice of oral instruction; so he drew up in 1743 a set of "General Rules" for the "United Societies," which were the nucleus of the Methodist Discipline. As the number of preachers and preaching-places increased, it was desirable that doctrinal matters should be discussed, difficulties considered, and that an understanding should be had as to the distribution of fields; so the two Wesleys, with four other clergymen and four lay-preachers, met for consultation in London in 1744. This was the first Methodist Conference. The questions considered were, What to teach, How to teach, and How to regulate doctrine, discipline, and practice. A body of doctrine was agreed upon; and a series of rules for regulating the conduct of the preachers was adopted. The conference lasted six days. Two years later, in order that the preachers might work more systematically, and the societies receive their services more regularly, Wesley appointed his "helpers" to definitive circuits, each of which included at least thirty appointments a month. (Believing that their usefulness and efficiency were promoted by being changed from one circuit to another every year or two, he established the itinerancy, and ever insisted that his preachers should submit to its rules. When, in 1788, some persons objected to the frequent changes, he wrote, "For fifty years God has been pleased to bless the itinerant plan, the last year most of all. It must not be altered till I am removed, and I hope it will remain till our Lord comes to reign on earth.")

As his societies multiplied, and all these elements of an ecclesiastical system were, one after another, adopted, the breach between Wesley and the Church of England gradually widened. The question of separation from the church, urged, on the one side, by some of his preachers and societies, and most strenuously opposed on the other by his brother Charles and others, was constantly before him, but was not settled. In 1745 he wrote that he and his co-adjutors would make any concession which their conscience would permit, in order to live in harmony with the clergy; but they could not give up the doctrine of an inward and present salvation by faith alone, nor cease to preach in private houses and the open air, nor dissolve the societies, nor suppress lay-preaching. Further than this, however, he refused then to go. ("We dare not," he said, "administer baptism or the Lord's Supper without a commission from a bishop in the apostolic succession.") But the next year he read Lord King on the Primitive Church, and was convinced by it that apostolic succession was a figment, and that he [Wesley] was "a scriptural episcopos as much as any man in England." Some years later Stillingfleet's Irenicon led him to renounce the opinion that Christ or his apostles prescribed any form of church government, and he believed ordination was valid when performed by a presbyter. It was not until about forty years after this that he ordained by the imposition of hands; but he considered his appointment (says Watson) of his preachers as an act of ordination. The Conference of 1746 declared that the reason more solemnity in receiving new laborers was not employed was because it savored of stateliness and of haste. "We desire barely to follow Providence as it gradually opens." When, however, he deemed that Providence had opened the way, and the bishop of London had definitively declined to ordain a minister for the American Methodists who were without the ordinances, he ordained by imposition of hands preachers for Scotland and England and America, with power to administer the sacraments. He consecrated, also, by laying on of hands, Dr. Coke, a presbyter of the Church of England, to be superintendent or bishop in America, and a preacher, Alexander Mather, to the same office in England. He designed that both Dr. Coke and Mr. Mather should ordain others. This act alarmed his brother Charles, who besought him to stop and consider before he had "quite broken down the bridge," and not imbitter his [Charles's] last moments on earth, nor "leave an indelible blot on our memory." Wesley declared, in reply, that he had not separated from the church, nor did he intend to, but he must and would save as many souls as he could while alive, "without being careful about what may possibly be when I die." Thus, though he rejoiced that the Methodists in America were freed from entanglements with both Church and State, he counselled his English followers to remain in the church; and he himself died in that communion.

Wesley was a strong controversialist. The most notable of his controversies was that on Calvinism. His father was of the Arminian school in the church; but John settled the question for himself while in college, and expressed himself strongly against the doctrines of election and reprobation. Whitefield inclined to Calvinism. In his first tour in America, he embraced the views of the New-England school of Calvinism; and when Wesley preached a sermon on Free Grace, attacking predestination as blasphemous, as representing "God as worse than the Devil," Whitefield besought him (1739) not to repeat or publish the discourse. He deprecated a dispute or discussion. "Let us," he said, "offer salvation freely to all," but be silent about election. Wesley's sermon was published, and among the many replies to it was one by Whitefield. Separation followed in 1741. Wesley wrote of it, that those who held universal redemption did not desire it, but "those who held particular redemption would not hear of any accommodation." Whitefield, Harris, Connick, and others, became the founders of Calvinistic Methodism. Whitefield and Wesley, however, were soon again on very friendly terms, and their friendship remained thenceforth unbroken, though they travelled different paths. Occasional publications appeared on Calvinistic doctrines, by Wesley and others; but in 1770 the controversy broke out anew with violence and bitterness. Toplady, Berridge, Rowland and Richard Hill, and others were engaged on the one side, and Wesley and Fletcher chiefly on the other side. Toplady was editor of the Gospel Magazine, which was filled with the controversy. Wesley in 1778 began the publication of the Arminian Magazine, not, he said, to convince Calvinists, but to preserve Methodists; not to notice opponents, but to teach the truth that "God willeth all men to be saved." A "lasting peace" he thought could be secured in no other way.

The doctrines which Wesley revived, restated, and emphasized in his sermons and writings, are present personal salvation by faith, the witness of the Spirit, and sanctification. The second he defined thus: "The testimony of the Spirit is an inward impression on the soul of believers, whereby the spirit of God directly testifies to their spirit that they are the children of God." Sanctification he spoke of (1790) as the "grand depositum which God has lodged with the people called 'Methodists;'" and, for the sake of propagating this chiefly, he appears to have raised them up. He taught that sanctification was obtainable instantaneously by faith, between justification and death. It was not "sinless perfection" that he contended for; but he believed that those who are "perfect in love" feel no sin, feel nothing but love. He was very anxious that this doctrine should be constantly preached. The system of Wesleyan Arminianism, the foundations of which were laid by Wesley and Fletcher, is treated in its appropriate place, under the title ARMINIANISM, q.v.

Wesley was the busiest man in England. He travelled almost constantly, generally on horseback, preaching twice or thrice a day. He formed societies, opened chapels, examined and commissioned preachers, administered discipline, raised funds for schools, chapels, and charities, prescribed for the sick, superintended schools and orphanages, prepared commentaries and a vast amount of other religious literature, replied to attacks on Methodism, conducted controversies, and carried on a prodigious correspondence. He is believed to have travelled in the course of his itinerant ministry more than two hundred and fifty thousand miles, and to have preached more than forty thousand sermons. The number of works he wrote, translated, or edited, exceeds two hundred. The list includes sermons, commentaries, hymns, a Christian library of fifty volumes, and other religious literature,—grammars, dictionaries, and other text-books, political tracts, etc. He is said to have received not less than a hundred thousand dollars for his publications, but he used little of it for himself. His charities were only limited by his means. He died poor. He rose at four in the morning, lived simply and methodically, and was never idle, even for a moment, unless by compulsion. In person he was rather under the medium height, well proportioned, strong, with a bright eye, a clear complexion, and a saintly, intellectual face. He married very unhappily, at the age of forty-eight, a widow, and had no children. He died, after a short illness in which he had great spiritual peace and joy, March 2, 1791; leaving as the result of his life-work 135,000 members, and 541 itinerant preachers, owning the name "Methodist."

Wesley's mind was of a logical cast. His conceptions were clear, his perceptions quick. His thought clothed itself easily and naturally in pure, terse, vigorous language. His logical acuteness, self-control, and scholarly acquirements, made him a strong controversialist. He wrote usually currente calamo. His written sermons are characterized by spiritual earnestness and by simplicity. They are doctrinal, but not dogmatic; expository, argumentative, practical. His Notes on the New Testament are luminous and suggestive. Both the Sermons (of which there are about a hundred and forty) and the Notes are in the Methodist course of study, and are doctrinal standards. He was a fluent, impressive, persuasive, powerful preacher, producing striking effects. He preached generally extemporaneously and briefly, though occasionally at great length, using manuscript only for special occasions. As an organizer, an ecclesiastical general, and statesman, he was pre-eminent. He knew well how to marshal and control men, how to achieve purposes. He had in his hands the powers of a despot; yet he so used them as not only not to provoke rebellion, but to inspire love. His mission was to spread "scriptural holiness": his means and plans were such as Providence indicated. The course thus marked out for him he pursued with a determination, a fidelity, from which nothing could swerve him.

Wesley's chief prose-works have been published in seven octavo volumes by the Methodist Book Concern, New York. Besides his Sermons and Notes already referred to, are his Journals (originally published in twenty parts), which are of great interest; a Treatise on Original Sin, in reply to Dr. Taylor of Norwich; an Appeal to Men of Reason and Religion (originally published in three parts of 268 12mo pp.), an elaborate defence of Methodism, describing with great vigor the evils of the times (fifth decade of last century) in society and the church; a Plain Account of Christian Perfection, a duodecimo of 162 pp., published in 1766.

The literature concerning Wesley is abundant. Not less than twenty-one distinct biographies of him have been published. The earliest was JOHN HAMPSON'S, 3 vols. 18mo, London, 1791 (the year of Wesley's death), imperfect; DR. COKE'S and HENRY MOORE'S, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1792, popular; DR. JOHN WHITEHEAD'S, 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1793-96, defective; ROBERT SOUTHEY'S, 2 vols. 8vo, London, 1820, written in excellent style, but inadequate and misleading; best edition, by DR. CURRY, 2 vols. 12mo, New York, 1847; DR. ADAM CLARKE: Wesley Family, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1823; HENRY MOORE, London, 1824, in 2 vols. 8vo, faithful, trustworthy; RICHARD WATSON, 1 vol. 12mo, London, 1831, clear, compact, intended for general readers; WILLIAM JONES, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1833, Calvinistic view; THOMAS JACKSON, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1839, unsatisfactory; ISAAC TAYLOR: Wesley and Methodism, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1851, unimportant; ROBERT BICKERSTETH, 1 vol. 12mo, London, 1856, acceptable Life, by a clergyman, for Churchmen; LUKE TYERMAN, 3 vols. 8vo, London, 1870, best, fullest, most impartial; JULIA WEDGWOOD, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1870, Unitarian; R. D. URLIN, 1 vol. 12mo, London, 1870, a Churchman's Life, inaccurate; GEORGE J. STEVENSON: Memorials of the Wesley Family, 1 vol. 8vo, London, 1876, copious in material; ABEL STEVENS: History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century, called Methodism, 3 vols. 12mo, New York, 1859-62.

WESLEY, Samuel, sen., the father of John and Charles Wesley; b. at Winterbourne-Whitchurch in Dorset, November, 1662; d. at Epworth, April 22, 1735. His early education was received among the dissenters; but in 1683 he renounced nonconformity, and entered Exeter College, Oxford, where he proceeded B.A., 1688. He was ordained deacon that year, and held various preferments, until Queen Mary gave him the living of Epworth in Lincolnshire (1696), in return for the compliment of his dedication to her of his Life of Christ, an Heroic Poem, 1693. He was a man of learning, benevolence, devotional habits, and liberal sentiments. He wrote largely, and by this means eked out his salary, barely sufficient to support his large family. He had nineteen children, of whom, however, nine died in infancy. Besides prose, he wrote poetry,—The History of the New Testament Attempted in Verse, 1701; The History of the Old Testament in Verse, 1704. His learned Latin Commentary on the Book of Job, Dissertationes in librum Jobi, in which he was, however, aided by others, appeared posthumously, 1736. His hymn, Behold the Saviour of Mankind, written in 1709, has been widely used. See TYERMAN: Life and Times of the Rev. Samuel Wesley, London, 1866.

WESLEY, Samuel, jun., elder brother of John and Charles; was b. in London, Feb. 10, 1690, and d. at Tiverton, Nov. 6, 1739; educated at Westminster and Oxford; head usher at Westminster School, 1712 (Vincent Bourne being one of his colleagues), and ordained soon after; head master of the Free School at Tiverton, 1732. He was a man of considerable learning, great talent, and high character. As an old-fashioned Churchman he had no sympathy with the "new faith" of his brothers. His Poems on Several Occasions, 1736 (reprinted, with additions and Life, 1862), have much merit, and include one or two of our best epigrams, besides hymns to the Trinity, for Sunday, Good Friday, and Easter, and on the death of a young lady. These are of a high order, and show much of Charles Wesley's splendor of diction: they have been largely used in church hymn-books.

WESLEY, Susannah, the mother of John and Charles Wesley; b. in London, Jan. 20, 1669; d. there July 23, 1742. Her father, Samuel Annesley, LL.D., was a prominent nonconformist divine, but she renounced nonconformity in her thirteenth year, and joined the Established Church. In 1689 she married Samuel Wesley (see art.), and bore him nineteen children, of whom nine, however, died in infancy. She was a remarkable woman. Tyerman gives this account of her home discipline: "When the child was one year old, he was taught to fear the rod, and, if he cried at all, to cry in softened tones. The children were limited to three meals a day. Eating and drinking between meals was strictly prohibited. All the children were washed and put to bed by eight o'clock, and on no account was a servant to sit by a child till it fell asleep. The children were taught the Lord's Prayer as soon as they could speak, and repeated it every morning and every night. They were on no account allowed to call each other by their proper name without the addition of brother or sister, as the case might be. Six hours a day were spent at school, the parents being the teachers. They were not taught to read till five years old, and then only a single day was allowed wherein to learn the letters of the alphabet, great and small. Psalms were sung every morning, when school was opened, and also every night, when the duties of the day were ended. In addition to all this, at the commencement and close of every day, each of the elder children took one of the younger, and read the psalms appointed for the day, and a chapter in the Bible, after which they severally went to their private devotions" (Life of Wesley, vol. i. pp. 17, 18). Her husband died in 1735, and shortly after, she went to London to live with her son John. See J. KIRK: The Mother of the Wesleys, London and Cincinnati, 1872.

WESLEYAN FEMALE COLLEGE, located at Macon, Ga., and founded in 1836, is believed to be the first exclusively female college in the world chartered with full powers to confer upon females the usual degrees which had been hitherto conferred only upon males. It is under the control of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. In 1882 it received from Mr. George I. Seney of New York a hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. It is well endowed, and has a patronage of two hundred and fifty pupils. It is one of the oldest, largest, and best female colleges in the South.

WESSEL, Johann, with the surname Gansfort or Gansevort, from an estate in Westphalia, the original seat of the family; b. at Groeningen about 1420; d. there Oct. 4, 1489; was in Germany the most prominent of the precursors of the Reformation. He was educated in the school of Zwoll, which at that time was under the control of the Brethren of the Common Life, and came very early in contact with Thomas à Kempis, who resided in the vicinity. From Zwoll he went to Cologne to finish his studies. But he seems not to have found there what he sought. Cologne was the seat of the German Inquisition, and the theological faculty of the university was completely dominated by the spirit of that institution. He learned Greek, however, from some Greek monks who had sought refuge in the city, and Hebrew from some Jews. After a short stay at Louvain, he repaired to Paris, where he remained for sixteen years. Life in Paris had at that time great interest to the student. A violent contest between realism and nominalism was going on; and realism, one of the props of the Papal fabric, and victorious for several centuries, was now tottering; while nominalism, one of the conditions of the coming Reformation, was rapidly gaining ground. Before long, Johann Wessel was converted to nominalism. He was, however, already a man of literary standing. Cardinal Bessarion and Francis de Rovere, general of the Franciscan order, and afterwards pope Sixtus IV., were his friends. Among the young men who sought his company were Reuchlin and Rudolph Agricola. After a visit to Rome, he again returned to Paris; but in 1475 he was at Basel, together with Reuchlin; and in the following year he accepted a call from the university of Heidelberg. By intrigues, however, the theological faculty succeeded in confining his activity to philosophy; and, as that did not satisfy him, he left Heidelberg, and returned to his native city. He felt that the eyes of the Inquisition were upon him. He needed protection; and he found that in Groeningen, under the Bishop of Utrecht, David of Burgundy, a brother to Charles the Bold. To this last period of his life belong, no doubt, most of his writings. But he published nothing; and the ferocity with which the mendicant monks, after his death, hunted down his books, and destroyed them, shows that he had good reasons for keeping quiet. He had, however, also many warm friends, who preserved his works as relics, and afterwards sent them to Luther. In 1521 Luther published a collection of them under the title Farrago rerum theologicarum uberrima, containing De providentia, De causis et effectibus incarnationis et passionis, De dignitate et potestate ecclesiastica, De sacramento penitentiae, Que sit vera communio sanctorum, De purgatorio, and a number of letters. A treatise, De eucharistia, he left out for dogmatic reasons: it advocates Zwingli's views, rather than those of his own. It is found in the editions of Groeningen (1614) and Giessen (1617), which also contain four or five other treatises not included in the Farrago. Nearly a dozen works are mentioned as having perished. The literary character of these treatises is rather singular. They look like mosaics, — theses followed by their arguments and evidences, aphorisms with or without any further explanation or application; the whole arranged in a rather mechanical manner. From the days of his youth he used to carry along with him a huge note-book (mare magnum), in which he put down any observation he happened to make, any idea which chanced to arise within him, etc. From this mare magnum the treatises seem to have been drawn by a very simple method. Quite otherwise is it with their spiritual character. Johann Wessel was too deeply religious ever to feel satisfied with mere philosophy, Platonism, or Humanism; and yet he was too philosophically occupied ever to become a true Reformer, a Hus, or a Savonarola. He remains forever floating between the philosophical argument and the polemical application, without ever approaching reality so near as to be seized by it, and taken possession of by it. Nevertheless, well might Luther exclaim, when he became acquainted with Wessel's works, that, if he had written nothing before he read them, people might have thought that he had stolen all his ideas from them. It follows, from the peculiar aphoristical character of Wessel's works, that no single idea can be pointed out as the centre of the whole system. In their somewhat mechanical juxtaposition, all his ideas have an equal right, and any one of them might be chosen for an introductory or preliminary characterization of his theological standpoint. Viewed, however, as a Reformer before the Reformation, his idea of the church becomes of special interest; and he has given a very happy definition of it in his Ep. ad Jac. Hoeck, iii. a, where he says, "I believe with the church, but I do not believe in her." The church is a community, the community of saints; not, as Wiclif and Hus have it, a communio predestinatorum, but a communio sanctorum, involving an idea of human personality which the pure doctrine of predestination is incapable of assimilating. The benefits which the individual may derive from this community are great, are invaluable, but at no moment can he become dependent on it for his personal relation to God. An organization and a visible representation of the community are good, are even necessary; but an organization sub uno papa is wholly incidental, and may be changed. The Pope is so far from being infallible, that the right of the church to criticise and correct him is indispensable to safety. And less infallible are the rest of the clergy and the councils too. But where, then, is the authority? In external affairs, and in them alone, the authority rests with the incidental organization, which may be changed. But, with respect to questions of faith, it rests solely with the Bible; and so far as Wessel thought it necessary or expedient to apply any supplementary support, he seems, like a true son of the Sorbonne, to prefer the professor of divinity to the priest. There is a ministerium, and its influence may reach into the innermost recesses of religious life; but always that influence depends solely upon the individual, spiritual gifts of the minister: the office has by itself no inherent authority whatever. It is apparent that such an idea of the church must in a very high degree affect the idea of the sacraments. In the middle ages the church was not only the administrator, but also the dispenser, of the means of grace: nay, she was herself the sum total of all means of grace. Consequently, in mediæval theology, the doctrine of the church formed the basis for the doctrine of the sacrament; and a radical change of the former necessarily produced a corresponding modification of the latter. To Wessel the sacraments are simply fidei instrumenta, tanto semper efficacia, quanto est fides negociosa, as has already been hinted above with respect to the Lord's Supper. The idea of an opus operatum he rejects. The efficacy of the mass does not depend on the intentio of either the administrant or the acceptant, but solely on the dispositio of the latter; and this dispositio consists in hunger and thirst for the means of grace: the idea of a sacrifice he leaves entirely out of consideration.

WESSENBERG, Ignaz Heinrich, b. in Dresden, Nov. 4, 1774; d. at Constance, Aug. 6, 1860; one of the noblest representatives of liberal Catholicism in the beginning of the present century. He was educated at Dillingen, under Sailer, and then studied theology at Würzburg (where he first became acquainted with Dalberg) and in Vienna. In 1800 Dalberg appointed him his vicar-general in the diocese of Constance; and when Dalberg died, in 1817, the chapter of Constance unanimously elected him bishop. The Roman curia, however, refused in a very harsh manner to confirm the election; and when the curia, on two later occasions, continued to refuse to admit him to office, he retired to private life. The reasons of the curia's aversion to him were, that he advocated the establishment of a national church of Germany (Die Deutsche Kirche, Constance, 1811), and the revival of the general councils (Die grossen Kirchenversammlungen des 15. und 16. Jahrhunderts, Constance, 1840, 4 vols.), and that, as vicar-general, he had introduced the German language into the Liturgy and choir-singing of the churches of his diocese, and sent his seminarists to Pestalozzi to learn the new method of instruction, — presumptions which could never be forgiven. WEST, Stephen, D.D., b. in Tolland, Conn., Nov. 2, 1735; d. at Stockbridge, Mass., May 15, 1819. He was graduated at Yale College, 1755. Having pursued his theological studies with Rev. Timothy Woodbridge of Hatfield, Mass., he was called in 1757 to be the military chaplain at Hoosac Fort. In 1758 he was invited, by the Commissioners for Indian Affairs in Boston, to succeed Jonathan Edwards in the Indian mission at Stockbridge. He was ordained pastor of the church at Stockbridge in 1759. In the forenoon of every sabbath he preached, by an interpreter, to the Indians; in the afternoon he preached to the English. For sixteen years he persevered in this course with encouraging success. In 1775 he relinquished his missionary office, and confined his labors to the English.

When Mr. West was ordained at Stockbridge, he was dissatisfied with the tenets of his predecessor, Jonathan Edwards. He often conversed upon them with his clerical neighbor, Hopkins of Great Barrington. He acquired a profound esteem and a warm affection for Hopkins, and was at length converted to the Edwardean faith. This change in his belief led to a more important change in his religious life. He became convinced that he had never been regenerated. The whole style of his sermons and pastoral interviews became so different from what it had been, that it surprised his parish. Some members of it were delighted; others were displeased. He was more successful than ever before in his ministerial work. He continued in it more than fifty-nine years, — with a colleague less than eight years, without a colleague more than fifty-one years.

Soon after the renewal of his religious life, he preached a series of sermons, which were afterwards published in the form of an Essay on Moral Agency, New Haven, 1772; 2d ed., 1794. He published his Essay on the Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement in 1785; a second edition, with an appendix of seventy pages, in 1815. This essay has an historical value. Its relation to the celebrated sermons of Dr. Jonathan Edwards and of Dr. John Smalley, on the same theme, is unfolded in the Discourses and Treatises on the Atonement, Introductory Essay, pp. 67–79, Boston, 1860. In 1794 he published An Inquiry into the Ground and Import of Infant Baptism; and in 1798 A Dissertation on Infant Baptism, Reply to the Rev. Cyprian Strong. After he had passed his eightieth year, he published an essay (republished in England) entitled Evidence of the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, collected from the Scriptures, 1816. One of his works which attracted much attention was

The Life of the Rev. Samuel Hopkins, D.D., 1806. Two of his pamphlets awakened a notable opposition: they were entitled A Sermon on the Duty and Obligation of Christians to marry in the Lord (1779), A Vindication of the Church in Stockbridge in excommunicating one of its Members. Besides publishing more than a dozen sermons, and numerous essays in the Theological Magazine and the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, he was engaged in an elaborate correspondence with the Rev. Dr. John Ryland of England, and many other theologians.

As he read Latin with great facility, was familiar with the Greek of the New Testament, and had a respectable acquaintance with the Hebrew language; as he was an acute metaphysician, and a profound student of the Bible; as he was instructive and often a highly eloquent preacher,—he attracted to himself many theological pupils. They resided in his house, and uniformly spoke of him in terms of the highest admiration. At least five of them became eminent as preachers and writers. Two of them were Samuel Spring, D.D., of Newburyport, and John Thornton Kirkland, D.D., LL.D., president of Harvard College.

Dr. West was not only a man of wonderful diligence in his study, but was also a man of affairs. He exerted a marked influence over jurists. On the sabbath he was regularly listened to by six judges of Massachusetts courts. Of these the most celebrated was Theodore Sedgwick, whose personal intercourse with his pastor was intimate and long-continued. In 1793, when Williams College was incorporated, Dr. West "was named as one of the trustees, and at the first meeting of the board was elected vice-president of the institution." He was one of Dr. Samuel Spring's chief counsellors in forming the Creed and Associate Statutes of Andover Theological Seminary. He was also a pioneer in the work of missionary and various charitable institutions.

WESTEN, Thomas von, b. at Trondhjem in 1682; d. there April 9, 1727; occupies a prominent place in the history of Protestant missions, on account of his self-sacrificing but very successful labor among the Fins and Laps of the northernmost part of the Scandinavian peninsula. He studied theology at the university of Copenhagen, and was in 1710 appointed pastor of Wedöen, in the diocese of Trondhjem. Meanwhile, the foul Paganism and moral depravity in which the Finnish and Lappish nomads of Northern Norway lived had begun to attract the attention of the government; and, the Collegium de promorendo cursu evangelii having been founded in 1714, a college for the training of missionaries to the Fins and Laps was immediately established at Trondhjem, and Westen was appointed its director Feb. 28, 1716. In the same year he made his first missionary tour in Norland and Finmarken; in 1718-19 his second, during which churches were built in Tana, Porsanger, and Alten, and some Finnish children were brought to Trondhjem to be educated as missionaries; and in 1722 his third, which already showed good results. He was completely master of the language; translated Luther's Catechism into Lappish; wrote a Grammatica Lapponica, a Specimen vocabularii Lapponici, a Lappish spelling-book, etc.; and he succeeded in educating a number of zealous and devoted disciples. See HAMMOND: Nord. Missionsgeschichte, Copenhagen, 1787. HERZOG.

WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, The.

The need of a theological seminary for the West had been felt for several years previous to the action on the subject taken by the General Assembly (O.S.) in 1825, which action was as follows: "It is expedient forthwith to establish a theological seminary in the West, to be styled 'The Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church of the United States.'" In 1827 the location was fixed at Allegheny, Allegheny County, Penn.; and on Nov. 16, 1827, the seminary was opened, with Rev. Joseph Stockton and Rev. Elisha P. Swift, D.D., as instructors. At that time "Alleghenytown, opposite Pittsburgh," was, an unincorporated village, and a part of Ross Township. As one of the inducements to locating the seminary at this place, eighteen acres of "common" had been released for the use of the institution. This grant included what is now known as "Monument Hill;" and on the summit of this hill the first building was erected. This building was occupied from the spring of 1831 until its total destruction by fire on Jan. 23, 1854. The present seminary building, which was dedicated on Jan. 10, 1856, is delightfully situated on Ridge Avenue, with West Park in front, and Monument Hill in the rear. The buildings of the seminary consist of Seminary Hall, containing chapel, lecture-rooms, and dormitories; Memorial Hall, containing dormitories, studies, and gymnasium; Library Hall, fire proof; and five professors' houses.

The government of the seminary is vested in a board of directors and a board of trustees; the former consisting of forty members (twenty-eight ministers, and twelve ruling elders), one-fourth of whom are chosen annually, the Board having the power to fill vacancies, subject to the veto of the General Assembly. The Board of Directors have power to elect, suspend, and remove professors; such election and removal being subject to the veto of the General Assembly. They superintend the curriculum, inspect the fidelity of the professors, and watch over the conduct of the students. The Board of Trustees, incorporated by the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania on March 29, 1844, consists of thirty members, "nine of whom shall at all times be laymen citizens of the State of Pennsylvania," and to them is committed the management and disbursement of the funds of the institution. The internal management of the seminary is devolved upon the professors as a faculty, with the senior professor as president. Each professor at his inauguration subscribes the following pledge: "In the presence of God and of the directors of this seminary, I do solemnly, and ex animo, adopt, receive, and subscribe the Confession of Faith and Catechisms of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America as the confession of my faith, or as a summary and just exhibition of that system of doctrine and religious belief which is contained in Holy Scripture, and therein revealed by God to man for his salvation. And I do solemnly ex animo profess to receive the form of government of said church as agreeable to the inspired oracles. And I do solemnly promise and engage not to inculcate, teach, or insinuate any thing which shall appear to me to contradict or contravene, either directly or impliedly, any thing taught in the said Confession of Faith or Catechisms, nor to oppose any of the fundamental principles of Presbyterian church government, while I shall continue a professor in this seminary."

There are five professorships, all endowed and all filled. The endowment of a chair of elocution is just about completed (1883). The seminary is open to students from all denominations of Christians. In addition to the regular course, extending over three years, there is a post-graduate course, for those who, from this or any other seminary, wish to pursue advanced studies. Nursed in the lap of the old synod of Pittsburgh, which, as soon as it was conscious of organic life, constituted itself the Western Missionary Society, the seminary inherited the missionary spirit. Her sons are found in all lands, and on the roll of her worthies are found the names of martyrs. The whole number of alumni is 1,415. It will not be deemed invidious to place at the head of the numerous patrons of the seminary the late Rev. Charles C. Beatty, D.D., LL.D., and James Laughlin, Esq., recently deceased. The gifts of Dr. Beatty exceeded two hundred thousand dollars.

The spirit and policy of the seminary are admirably expressed in the fundamental principle which was incorporated by its founders in the "plan": "That learning without religion in ministers of the gospel will prove injurious to the church, and religion without learning will leave the ministry exposed to the impositions of designing men, and insufficient in a high degree for the great purposes of the gospel ministry." This is the principle on which the seminary has been conducted. The combination of learning and piety, of erudition and earnestness, of intellectual discipline and practical efficiency, is the standard which has been set up. The measure of success which has been achieved in this line the seminary claims as one of its distinctive characteristics.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY. This famous pile, at once cathedral and walhalla, is upon the site of a Saxon church, within the so-called "Thorney Isle," built under King S.bert in the seventh century. Long before the Norman Conquest (eleventh century), it was connected with a Benedictine monastery called the "Western," in contradistinction to St. Paul's, which was east. Hence the name "Westminster" given to the church subsequently built upon this site by Edward the Confessor (1055-65), who, though a Saxon, employed the Norman style of architecture. All that is now left of Edward's buildings are a few traces about the choir and the substructure of the dormitory, and on the south end of the abbey the Pyx house, or chapel of the Pyx, in which the sacred vessel containing the eucharistic elements was kept. Henry III. (1216-72) is the great name connected with the early building of the abbey. He rebuilt the abbey church in the Early-English style, and the present transepts and choir are his; but the greater part of the present building dates from the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Henry VII.'s Chapel, in Late Perpendicular, is one of the most admired portions of the abbey. The most frequented is the "Poets' Corner," where lie buried Chaucer and Spenser, and where are the monuments to Shakspeare and Milton. The abbey as it now stands is in the form of a Latin cross, 511 feet long by 203 feet wide across the transepts. The nave and aisles are 74 feet wide, the choir 38 feet, and Henry VII.'s Chapel 70 feet.

The abbey passed from the government of an abbot to that of a dean when the monasteries were dissolved. For a short time there was a bishopric of Westminster. Under Mary the abbacy was restored, but under Elizabeth the present government by dean and chapter was established. In the abbey many important religious events have taken place. There met the bishops under Elizabeth; there, on one occasion, the Houses of Parliament, under Charles I., to hear a speech from Laud. In the Jerusalem Chamber (see art.) met the Assembly of Divines during the Civil War and the Commonwealth.

The present objects of interest are mainly the tombs of royal families and the tombs and tablets of illustrious men in all walks of life; but, as was to have been expected, a memorial in the abbey has been accorded to many whose fame was interred with their bones. See Dean STANLEY's brilliant Memorials of Westminster Abbey, London, 1867; 5th ed., 1882.

WESTMINSTER ASSEMBLY (1643-52), a synod of Calvinistic and Puritan divines, which produced the doctrinal and disciplinary standards of the British and American Presbyterian churches. It occupies the first place of all synods held in the Reformed churches, not excepting even that of Dort, although this was of more importance for the Continent. It grew out of that great movement in English church history which began with the rising of the Scotch nation against the semi-Popish tyranny of Charles I. and Archbishop Laud, rolled like an avalanche all over England, cemented both nations in the "Solemn League and Covenant" (1643), and resulted in the temporary overthrow of the Stuart dynasty and episcopacy and the short but brilliant reign of Puritanism under Cromwell. The assembly was called together by the Long Parliament (which lasted from 1640 to 1652), to form, on a Calvinistic and Puritan basis, a complete creed, and a system of church polity and worship for the three united kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland.<sup>1</sup> It consisted of a hundred and twenty-one English clergymen (nearly all of them in episcopal orders, but of puritanic tendencies), five Scotch commissioners, and thirty lay assessors, of whom ten were peers, and twenty commoners. The members were all appointed by Parliament. The most distinguished were Lightfoot (the great rabbinic cal scholar), Selden ("antiquariorum coryphæus"), Twisse, Herle, White, Burgess, Calamy, Coleman, Seaman, Gataker, Marshall, Palmer, Caryl, Goodwin, Tuckney, Henderson, Gillespie, Gouge, Ruthenford, Baillie. The celebrated Archbishop Ussher was appointed a member, but never attended. The assembly was not a legislative, but only an advisory body, like the Anglican convocations; and its decisions were subject to the ratification of Parliament, which claimed Erastian control over ecclesiastical affairs. The bishops never acknowledged it, and the king prohibited it under severe penalties.

<sup>1</sup> The Assembly was directed to meet "at Westminster, in the chappell called King Henry the Seventh's Chappell on the first day of July, in the year of our Lord, 1643 . . . to confer and treat amongst themselves of such matters and touching and concerning the liturgy, discipline and government of the Church of England, or the vindicating and clearing of the doctrine of the same from all false aspersions and misconstructions, as shall be proposed unto them by both or either of the said houses of Parliament, and no other, and to deliver their opinion and advices of or touching the matters aforesaid, as shall be most agreeable to the Word of God, to both or either of the said houses, from time to time, in such a manner or sort as by both or either of said houses of Parliament shall be required, and at the same time not to divulge by printing, writing, or otherwise, without the consent of both or either house of Parliament. And be it further ordained by the authority aforesaid, that William Twisse, D.D., shall sit in the chaire as prolocutor of the said Assembly."

The assembly was solemnly opened July 1, 1643, in Westminster Abbey, before the two Houses of Parliament, by a sermon of Dr. William Twisse, and was organized in the chapel of Henry VII.; from which it afterwards moved to more comfortable quarters, — the famous Jerusalem Chamber (originally the abbot's parlor), in the deanery of Westminster. It held daily sessions from nine to two, except Saturday and Sunday. Once a month it met with Parliament in public humiliation and prayer. At first the divines undertook the revision of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, but abandoned it after reaching the fifteenth article; and afterwards they framed a new confession of faith (see below), together with a directory of government and worship. The doctrinal debates recently published by Professor Mitchell reveal a difference between a milder and stricter school of Calvinism. The Westminster Confession may be called a compromise between them. The subject of church government called forth long and earnest debates. Twisse, Gataker, Palmer, Temple, and several other learned members, inclined to what was called primitive episcopacy, or presbyterianism with superintendents. The Scotch commissioners, and the Puritans of the school of Cartwright, contended for a jure divino, or high-church presbyterianism pure and simple, but had to consent to the compromise phrase "lawful, and agreeable to the word of God," instead of "expressly instituted or commanded." Besides these two leading parties, there was a small fraction of Independents who had strong political influence (Cromwell being on their side), and advocated a limited degree of toleration. On the subject of public worship there was substantial harmony. After completing its doctrinal and disciplinary standards (1648), the assembly became an executive body, engaged chiefly in examination of candidates, and rapidly lost its authority and importance. The eleven hundred and sixty-third session was held Feb. 22, 1648; the last, in March 25, 1652. The assembly was not formally dissolved; but, as Fuller says, "it dwindled by degrees," and "vanished with the Parliament" which called it into existence.

Principal Baillie, the chief of the commissioners of Scotland, gives the following graphic description of the assembly: —

"The like of that Assembly I did never see, and as we hear say, the like was never in England, nor anywhere is shortly like to be. They did sit in Henry the VII.'s chapel, in the place of the convocation; but since the weather grew cold, they did go to Jerusalem chamber, a fair room in the abbey of Westminster, about the bounds of the college fore-hall, but wider. At the one end, nearest the door, and both sides, are stages of seats as in the new assembly-house at Edinburgh, but not so high; for there will be room but for five or six score. At the upmost end there is a chair set on a frame, a foot from the earth, for the Mr. Prolocutor, Dr. Twisse. Before it on the ground stand two chairs for the two Mr. Assessors, Dr. Burgess and Mr. White. Before these two chairs, through the length of the room, stands a table at which sit the two scribes, Mr. Byfield and Mr. Roborough. The house is all well hung, and has a good fire, which is some daintie at London. Foranent the table, upon the prolocutor's right hand, there are three or four ranks of forms. On the lowest we five do sit. Upon the other, at our backs, the members of Parliament deputed to the Assembly. On the forms foranent us, on the prolocutor's left hand, going from the upper end of the house to the chimney, and at the other end of the house, and back-side of the table, till it come about to our seats, are four or five stages of forms, whereupon their divines sit as they please; albeit commonly they keep the same place. From the chimney to the door there are no seats, but a void for passage. The lords of Parliament use to sit on chairs, in that void, about the fire. We meet every day of the week but Saturday. We sit commonly from nine to one or two afternoon. . . . Ordinarily, there will be present above three-score of their divines. These are divided into three committees; in one whereof every man is a member. No man is excluded who pleases to come to any of the three. Every committee, as the Parliament gives order in writing to take any purpose into consideration, takes a portion, and in their afternoon meeting prepares matters for the Assembly, sets down their mind in distinct propositions, backs their propositions with texts of Scripture. After the prayer, Mr. Byfield, the scribe, reads the proposition and Scriptures, whereupon the Assembly debates in a most grave and orderly way. No man is called up to speak; but who stands up of his own accord, he speaks, so long as he will, without interruption. . . . They harangue long and very learnedly. They study the questions well beforehand, and prepare their speeches, but withal the men are exceedingly prompt and well-spoken. I do marvel at the very accurate and extemporal replies that many of them usually make."

The estimates of the assembly differ widely according to the denominational stand-point of the writer, but all must agree as to its importance and influence. Milton at first praised it highly; but, when it condemned his unfortunate book on Divorce he spoke of it and of the Long Parliament with vindictive scorn. Clarendon disparaged it in his History of the Rebellion. Baxter, who, from his familiarity with the leading members, was more competent to judge than either, thought that the synod compared favorably with any since the days of the apostles, and called its members "men of eminent learning, godliness, ministerial abilities, and fidelity." Stoughton (an Independent) gives the Westminster divines credit for "learning — scriptural, patristic, scholastic, and modern — enough and to spare, all solid, substantial, and ready for use." A German historian, Gen. Von Rudloff, judges that "a more zealous, intelligent, and learned body of divines seldom, if ever, met in Christendom." Dr. Briggs closes his article on the Westminster Assembly with this strong commendation: —

"Looking at the Westminster Assembly as a whole, it is safe to say that there never was a body of divines who labored more conscientiously, carefully, and faithfully, and produced more important documents, or a richer theological literature, than that remarkably learned, able, and pious body, who sat for so many trying years in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey."

On the Continent it is little known;<sup>1</sup> but, among all the Presbyterian churches of Great Britain and the United States, its history is a familiar household word. It attempted too much, and went on the assumption of one national church, that should embrace all Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, and be subject to one creed and one polity. But this was the error of the age, in which Episcopalianism shared alike with the Puritans. Both were equally intolerant, and expelled all nonconformists from their livings. The Independents and Baptists were somewhat in advance; but even their idea of toleration excluded the Prelatists, Roman Catholics, Quakers, and Unitarians. It was only after a long series of persecutions and failures, that the idea of religious freedom took firm root in English soil. But while the Westminster Assembly and the Long Parliament failed, as far as England and Ireland are concerned, and were succeeded by the restoration of the Stuart dynasty and episcopacy, the doctrinal and disciplinary standards of the assembly have retained their vitality in Scotland and North America to this day. WESTMINSTER STANDARDS. The Westminster Assembly of Divines (see preceding article) produced a complete set of church books, relating to doctrine, discipline, and worship. They were subjected to the Long Parliament, which ratified them with certain changes. With the Restoration of the Stuarts they were set aside in England, but retained in Presbyterian Scotland, and in all the Anglo-American Presbyterian churches. The doctrinal standards were also acknowledged, with some modifications, by the Independents, or Congregationalists, in England and New England.

I. THE DOCTRINAL STANDARDS. 1. The Westminster Confession of Faith. — It was completed Dec. 4, 1646, provided with the Scripture passages (by order of Parliament, which had six hundred copies printed), approved in full by the Church of Scotland in 1647, and, with a few changes, by the Long Parliament in 1648, under the title of Articles of Religion, omitting chaps. xxx. and xxxi. and parts of chaps. xx. and xxiv. But in spite of Parliament the Confession continues to be printed in Great Britain in the form in which it left the Assembly, and was adopted by the Church of Scotland. Its original title is, The Humble Advice of the Assembly of Divines now, by Authority of Parliament, sitting at Westminster, concerning a Confession of Faith, with the Quotations and Texts of Scripture annexed. Presented by them lately to both Houses of Parliament. (See the facsimile in Schaff's Creeeds, iii. 598.) It consists of thirty-three chapters beginning with the doctrine of the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice, and ending with the last judgment. It is the clearest, strongest, most logical, and most careful symbolical statement of the Calvinistic scheme of Christian doctrine. (See CALVINISM.) It is based upon a thorough study of the Scriptures, the Continental Reformed theology, the earlier English and Scotch Confessions, but more particularly (as Dr. Mitchell has shown) upon the Irish Articles which were probably drawn up by Archbishop Ussher, 1615, and form the connecting link between the Thirty-nine Articles and the Westminster Confession. Several sections, especially on the Holy Scriptures, the Holy Trinity, the Divine Decrees, the Fall, the Perseverance of Saints, and the Civil Magistrate, are almost verbatim derived from these Articles, which had been set aside by Archbishop Laud. (See Mitchell: The Westminster Confession, 1867, and Introduction to the Minutes, Schaff: Creeeds, i. 762 sqq., and iii. § 26 sqq., where the Irish Articles are given in full.)

The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland has recently adopted an explanatory supplement or "Declaratory Act" (May, 1879) which "sets forth more fully and clearly" some doctrines of Holy Scripture, among which are the following important modifications of the Westminster statements:—

(1) "That in regard to the doctrine of redemption as taught in the Standards, and in consistency therewith, the love of God to all mankind, his gift of his Son to be the propitiation for the sins of the world, and the free offer of salvation to men without distinction, on the ground of Christ's perfect sacrifice, are matters which have been and continue to be regarded by this church as vital in the system of gospel truth, and to which due prominence ought ever to be given.

(2) "That the doctrine of the divine decrees, including the doctrine of election to eternal life, is held in connection and harmony with the truth that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, and that he has provided a salvation sufficient for all, adapted to all, and offered to all in the gospel; and also with the responsibility of every man for his dealing with the free and unrestricted offer of eternal life.

(3) "That the doctrine of man's total depravity, and of his loss of 'all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation,' is not held as implying such a condition of man's nature as would affect his responsibility under the law of God and the gospel of Christ, or that he does not experience the strivings and restraining influences of the Spirit of God, or that he cannot perform actions in any sense good; although actions which do not spring from a renewed heart are not spiritually good or holy,—such as accompany salvation.

(4) "That while none are saved except through the mediation of Christ and by the grace of His Holy Spirit who worketh when and where and how it pleaseth him; while the duty of sending the gospel to the heathen, who are sunk in ignorance, sin, and misery, is clear and imperative; and while the outward and ordinary means of salvation for those capable of being called by the Word are the ordinances of the gospel,—in accepting the Standards, it is not required to be held that any who die in infancy are lost, or that God may not extend his grace to any who are without the pale of ordinary means, as it may seem good in his sight.

(5) "That in regard to the doctrine of the Civil Magistrate, and his authority and duty in the sphere of religion as taught in the Standards, this church holds that the Lord Jesus Christ is the only King and Head of the church, and 'Head over all things to the church, which is his body;' disapproves of all compulsory or persecuting and intolerant principles in religion; and declares, as hitherto, that she does not require approval of any thing in her Standards that teaches, or may be supposed to teach, such principles."

The American Presbyterian churches adopted the Westminster Confession and Catechisms at first without alteration, but with a liberal construction, "as being, in all the essential and necessary articles, good forms of sound words and systems of Christian doctrine" (Synod of Philadelphia, Sept. 19, 1729). After the Revolutionary War, however, it became necessary to change the articles on church polity, and to adapt them to the voluntary system and the separation of Church and State. Such changes were made in chaps. xv., xxiii. 3, xxxi. 1 and 2, and adopted in the Synod of Philadelphia, May 29, 1788. (See the changes in Schaff's Creeds, i. 806 sqq.) The Protestant-Episcopal Church had to make similar alterations in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England; for all the creeds of the sixteenth century imply the union of Church and State, and the duty of the civil magistrate to support religion, and to punish heresy.

The Cumberland Presbyterian Church in 1813 made some doctrinal changes by modifying the statement on predestination in chap. iii. (See Schaff's Creeds, iii. 771.) The same body has subjected its modified confession to another revision in 1883. The Cumberland Presbyterians reject unconditional election, but hold to the perseverance of saints. (See CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS.)

2. The Westminster Catechisms.—These are two,—a large Catechism, for ministers, to be explained from the pulpit according to the custom then prevailing in the Reformed churches on the Continent; and a short Catechism, for the instruction of children. Both were prepared simultaneously with the Confession (the large one first), presented to Parliament for examination and approval in the autumn of 1647, printed under the title The Humble Advice of the Assembly of Divines now by authority of Parliament sitting at Westminster, concerning a Larger (Shorter) Catechism, etc. Parliament approved the books, with slight exceptions, Sept. 15, 1648; the Scotch Kirk adopted them July 20 and 28, 1648, and again (after a temporary repeal under Charles II.) in 1690. Tuckney had the chief share in framing the Larger Catechism, and Wallis the mathematician, in giving the Shorter Catechism its severely logical finish. The story about Gillespie's prayer suggesting the definition of God is doubtful. Both Catechisms contain an exposition of the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer, and an independent statement of the Christian system of doctrine after the Calvinistic type. The Apostles' Creed is not, as in other Catechisms, made the basis of the doctrinal expositions, but appended "because it is a brief sum of the Christian faith, agreeable to the word of God, and anciently received in the churches of Christ."

The Shorter Catechism is, next to Luther's Small Catechism and the Heidelberg Catechism, the most extensively-used catechism in Protestant Christendom. It exceeds all other Catechisms by the terse brevity and precision of the questions and answers, and differs from most by the following peculiarities: (1) It embodies the question in the answer, so as to make this a complete proposition or statement; (2) It substitutes a new and logical order of topics for the old historic order of the Apostles' Creed; (3) It deals in dogmas rather than facts, and addresses the intellect rather than the heart; (4) It puts the questions in an impersonal form, instead of addressing the learner directly; (5) To this may be added the theological and logical character of the answers. It admirably suits the Scotch and Anglo-American mind. The first questions of the typical Catechisms are very characteristic. The Longer Catechism of the Orthodox Eastern Church begins, "What is an orthodox Catechism?" the Anglican Catechism, "What is your name?" Luther's Small Catechism, "What means the First Commandment?" the Heidelberg Catechism, "What is thy only comfort in life and in death?" the Westminster Shorter Catechism, "What is the chief end of man?"

II. THE DIRECTORY OF PUBLIC WORSHIP. — This was prepared during 1644, sanctioned by the English Parliament Jan. 3, 1645, approved by the Scotch Assembly and Parliament in February, 1645, and published in the same year in London and Edinburgh. It was intended to be a substitute for the Anglican Book of Common Prayer; but, instead of prescribing liturgical forms, it gives minute directions and suggestions to the minister how to conduct public worship.

III. THE DIRECTORY FOR CHURCH GOVERNMENT AND DISCIPLINE. — This sets forth the principles of Presbyterian church polity, on which see the art. PRESBYTERIANISM and the literature there given. The debates of the Assembly on church government will probably be published soon by Professor Mitchell, from the Minutes in Dr. Williams's library. PHILIP SCHAFF.

WESTPHAL, Joachim, b. in Hamburg in 1510 or 1511; d. there Jan. 16, 1574. He studied theology at Wittenberg, under Luther and Melancthon; visited, also, the universities of Jena, Erfurt, Marburg, Heidelberg, Strassburg, and Basel; and was appointed preacher at the Church of St. Catherine, in his native city, in 1541, and superintendent in 1571. He began his polemical activity by partaking in the controversy occasioned by the Leipzig Interim; and siding with Flacius, and attacking Melancthon, he wrote two pamphlets on the question of true and false adiaphora, — Historia tituli aurei Aaronis, etc. (Magdeburg, 1549), and Explicatio generalis, etc. (Hamburg, 1550). But his great controversial exploit was the contest he raised between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, and which produced much disturbance and much misery in the Protestant Church. He opened the attack, when Peter Martyr's Oxford Lectures on the Lord's Supper were published in 1552, with his Farrago opinionum de Cæna Domini (Magdeburg, 1552), in which he exhorted all true Lutheran theologians to come forward and give battle. But the Lutheran theologians were too much occupied at that moment with controversies of their own, and the Reformed theologians took no notice of the book. Once more Westphal made an attack (Recta fides de Cæna Domini, etc., Magdeburg, 1553), but with no better success. Then an event of practical consequence came to his aid. John a Lasco and the Reformed Congregation of foreigners in London were expelled by the Bloody Mary; and the various Lutheran communities in which they sought refuge — Copenhagen, Lubeck, Rostock, Hamburg, etc. — refused to admit them. In this persecution Westphal took a prominent part; and when he made his third attack, Collectanea sententiarum Aurelii Augustini de Cæna Domini (Ratisbon, 1555), Calvin came forward with his Defensio, etc. Calvin's answer is proud, almost disdainful, and it produced a tremendous stir in the Lutheran camp. The battle was soon raging along the whole line. On the Reformed side wrote Calvin, Lasco, Bullinger, and Beza; on the Lutheran, Brenz, Andrea, Schnepf, Paul von Eitzen, etc. Westphal also wrote some more pamphlets, but distinguished himself still more by his practical activity. When the city of Francfort opened its gates to Lasco and the other Reformed refugees from London, Westphal wrote to the magistrates, and admonished them to take care that the church of Francfort should not be poisoned by those heretics. He also endeavored to form all the North-German churches into one compact union on the basis of the true Lutheran conception of the Lord's Supper, and he partially succeeded. His last attack, however, Confutatio aliquot enormium mendaciorum J. Calvini (1558), elicited no answer. See J. MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, Copenhagen, 1744, T. iii.; BRETSCHNEIDER: Corpus Reformatorum, Halle, 1810, vols. vii.–ix.; [MÖNKEBERG: Westphal u. Calvin, Hamburg, 1865]. NEUDECKER.

WESTPHALIA, The Peace of, ending the Thirty-Years' War, was signed Oct. 14, 1648. The preliminaries were agreed upon as early as December, 1641; but the treacherous equivocations of the emperor, the jealousies between Sweden and France (who had different and sometimes opposite interests to defend), and the almost incredible haggings between the powers concerning rank and ceremony, prevented the congress from actually beginning its work until April, 1645. One part of the congress, consisting of deputies of the emperor, Sweden, and princes of the empire, sat at Osnabrück, a city of Westphalia, and finished its work Aug. 8, 1648: the other part, consisting of deputies of the emperor, France, and other foreign powers concerned, sat at Münster, a neighboring city, and finished its work Sept. 17. The complete instrument of peace was finally signed at Münster.

Leaving entirely out of consideration the merely political elements of the negotiations, and confining ourselves to the purely religious and ecclesiastical questions, the two general points of agreement were the confirmation of the peace of Augsburg, settling the relations between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants within the boundaries of the German Empire, and the establishment of full equality between the two Protestant churches, — the Lutheran and the Reformed. Of the special points of the treaty, two are of particular interest, — one concerning the right of possession with respect to certain ecclesiastical estates and revenues, and the other concerning the right of the prince to reform the confession of faith within the boundaries of his territory. In order to arrive at an agreement, it was decided to fix Jan. 1, 1624, as a norm from which to proceed; so that all churches, schools, hospitals, monasteries, or other kinds of ecclesiastical estate and revenue which at that day were in the possession of the Protestants, should be ceded to them; while, on the other hand, any kind of ecclesiastical property which they had acquired after that date should be returned to the Roman Catholic Church, and vice versa. Of course, such a rule could not be carried out with any degree of strictness without harshness. It seems, however, that the general result of the negotiations gave satisfaction to both the parties concerned. More difficult was the second point. The maxim, cujus dominium, ejus religio, which forms the basis of the so-called "Territorial System," had in Germany given rise to many despotic acts, entailing much suffering and endless confusion. More than once a prince had, by one stroke of the pen, changed the confession of his country from Lutheranism to Calvinism, or from Calvinism to Lutheranism; and generally the stroke of the pen had to be followed up with exile, confiscation of property, imprisonment, and the stake. It was now decided that those who on the day mentioned held a certain right of worship should continue to hold it, irrespective of the prince's jus reformandi exercitium religionis, while those who at that time had acquired no such right were still at the mercy of their prince.

It must be noticed that all these stipulations were valid only for the German Empire, but not for the hereditary Austrian possessions of the emperor. Some of the great feudal lords of Silesia, the dukes of Brieg, Liegnitz, Münsterberg, Oels, and the city of Breslau, obtained certain privileges from the emperor; but with respect to his other subjects no security, not even a promise of toleration, was given. At the signing of the treaty at Munster, the papal legate, Fabius Chigi, formally protested; and the protest was followed up by the bull Zelo domus Dei, Nov. 26, 1648. But the protest had no influence whatever, nor was it by the Pope (Innocent X.) and the Roman curia expected to have any. The usual diplomatic formalities were rapidly gone through, and peace was actually restored.

WETSTEIN,<sup>1</sup> Johann Jakob, b. in Basel, March 5, 1693; d. in Amsterdam, March 22, 1754. He early showed his inclination toward biblico-textual studies; and his first dissertation was upon the various readings of the New Testament. His acquaintance with New-Testament manuscripts was greatly increased by his travels in France and England; but in 1720 he returned to Basel to become assistant to his father, who was pastor of St. Leonard's Church. Although his duties were not congenial, they were faithfully performed. Meanwhile he continued the preparation of his great edition of the Greek New Testament, and gave private lectures upon exegesis and dogmatics. Bengel was preparing his edition, likewise, and employed two Basel professors to collate the codices in the Basel Library. Between these two and Wetstein a feud arose respecting the age and value of E (see BIBLE TEXT), which Wetstein did not put so high as they, resting on Mill's authority. The feud became personal; and then the vague rumors of heterodoxy, which had for some time been circulating, assumed the form of charges. To many persons conclusive evidence of this aberration was Wetstein's rejection of the reading of the textus receptus θεός for ὁς in 1 Tim. iii. 16. The latter is probably the correct reading, but people said he wanted to take away a proof-text of the divinity of Christ. His assertion that he merely followed the Codex Alexandrinus because careful study had convinced him that it was correct, was declared a subterfuge. He was tried for holding Arian and Socinian views, found guilty, and deposed May 13, 1730. But just then a new career opened to him: he succeeded Clericus in the Remonstrants' College at Amsterdam, and thenceforth he lived there. He won for himself an imperishable fame by his edition of the Greek New Testament, of which the prolegomena appeared anonymously at Amsterdam, 1730, and the work itself in 1751–52, 2 vols. folio. Expediency compelled him to print the textus receptus, and to put his various readings in the form of notes. William Bowyer subsequently (London, 1763) printed a text which incorporated Wetstein's preferred readings. Besides the wealth of textual illustration, Wetstein's New Testament is pre-eminent for its parallel passages from the classics, the fathers, and the rabbins; so that it has been a quarry for commentators ever since. He carried the collation of manuscripts farther than all his predecessors, having personally examined upwards of forty. He also introduced the present mode of designating uncial manuscripts by Roman capitals, and cursive by Arabic figures. See BIBLE TEXT, pp. 274, 275; and, for personal information, see L. MEISTER: Helvetische Schicksal der neueren Schwärmerei und Intoleranz, Zurich, 1785, pp. 167 sqq.; and the Prolegomena to his New Testament. HAGENBACH.

WETTE, DE, Wilhelm Martin Leberecht, b. at Ulla, near Weimar, Jan. 12, 1780; d. at Basel, June 16, 1849. His theological studies were made at Jena, where he was greatly influenced by the great textual critic Griesbach, and by Paulus. From the latter he derived his taste for untrammelled study of the Scriptures. But his earliest publications, his critical dissertation upon Deuteronomy (Jena, 1805, republished in his Opus. Theol., Berlin, 1833), and, in the same year, his Beiträge zur Einleitung in das Neue Testament ("Contributions to New-Testament Introduction"), proved his originality and independence. Unlike Eichhorn and Paulus, De Wette held to a mythical interpretation of the Bible miracles. Of course, such an interpretation increases in probability, the more remote the narratives are in date from the supposed events. Accordingly, De Wette strove to show in the first-mentioned work that the Pentateuch was not from Moses, but was a collection of independent documents made by several persons and at different times. The earliest collection, Genesis, dates from the time of David; the last, Deuteronomy, from that of Josiah. These views he intended to present at length; but Vater anticipated him, and therefore he modestly made merely an abstract of them, and appended it to his Critical Examination of the Credibility of Chronicles (Jena, 1806) as an avowed supplement to Vater's book on the Pentateuch. De Wette charged intentional alterations and additions in a predominating levitical and hierarchical spirit upon the Chronicles. See his Beiträge zu's A. T., Jena, 1806, 1807, 2 vols. By his essay on Deuteronomy, De Wette won his degree of Ph.D., and became privatdocent at Jena, but in 1807 was called to Heidelberg as professor of theology. While there he made, at first in conjunction with Augusti, but later alone, a translation of the entire Bible (Heidelberg, 1809-14, 4th ed., 1858), and wrote his Commentary on the Psalms (1811, 3d ed., 1826), which is so exclusively critical that he himself endeavored to make amends by a special appendix, — On the Devotional Use of the Psalms, 1837. He denies the Davidic origin given to many psalms, their early dates, and also that the historical Christ is prophesied anywhere in the collection, referring the so-called Messianic incidents and allusions to nearer historical events, although at the same time he granted that the psalmists' descriptions of an ideal future could be practically applied to Christianity. He was unalterably opposed to "the play of pious ingenuity" upon the Psalms, maintaining that their devotional use should be based upon a strictly scientific exegesis.

In 1810 he was called to the newly founded university at Berlin. There he had for his colleague Schleiermacher; and the two labored for that "better day" in theology when the demands of faith and science should alike be met. In 1813 De Wette published his Latin Commentary on the Expiatory Death of Jesus Christ, in recognition of his degree of D.D. from Breslau. In this work he represented the death of Christ as an inevitable, yet to him quite unexpected, consequence of his moral nature: Christ died nobly as a sacrifice in the ideal sense. In 1814 De Wette published his Hebrew Archaeology (4th ed. by Rübiger, 1864), in 1817 his Old-Testament Introduction, in his opinion his best critical work (seven editions were published during his lifetime; 8th ed. by E. Schrader, Berlin, 1869); in 1826 his New-Testament Introduction (6th ed. by Messner and Lünemann, 1860).

The Latin dissertation on the atonement was neither the first nor the only contribution De Wette made to theology. The first part (biblical theology) of a Text-Book of Christian Dogma came out in 1813; the second (ecclesiastical theology), in 1816, 3d ed., 1831-40. In the first part he distinguishes, in the Old Testament, Hebraism from Judaism, and in the New Testament the doctrine of Jesus from that of the apostles. In the second part he maintains that theology, although not definitely settled, was still not to be slighted, as it was an "historical bond of union" among the members of the church. This "historical bond" is what is sought for in so-called orthodoxy. As ecclesiastical theology, De Wette simply presents Lutheran doctrine: his own system of theology came much later, — The Essentials of Christian Faith considered from the Stand-point of Faith, Basel, 1816. Next followed his Christian Ethics (1819-33, 3 vols.), an epoch-making work, inasmuch as he considers ethics, not as a mere aggregate of moral precepts, but as rooted in Christian thought, which itself is a fruit of Christian faith.

But his days in Berlin were numbered. Taking a great interest in public affairs, he wrote a letter to the mother of an Erlangen student, Karl Ludwig Saud (who murdered in cold blood August von Kotzebue, a determined foe to liberalism), in which, while expressing deep abhorrence at the crime which cost the student his life, he still cleared his motives of the suspicions which had been cast upon them, on the ground that the deed was prompted by pure patriotism. For this bold defence he was summarily dismissed from the university by the king (Oct. 2, 1819). He betook himself to Weimar, and there employed his enforced leisure in preparing the first complete edition of Luther's Letters (1825-28, 5 vols., supplemental volume by Seidenmann, 1856), by which, even if he had done nothing else, he would have proved himself a scholar. In 1822 he issued his first romance, Theodore, or the Consecration of the Doubter (Tholuck replied in his True Consecration of the Doubter, Hamburg, 1823); and his second, Henry Melchthal, in 1829, 2 vols. These stories never found many readers, yet they contain much good writing, and many valuable thoughts upon timely matters. In 1822, quite unexpectedly, he was called to Basel, and there he passed the rest of his days. He did excellent service in advancing the university, and won the hearts of many who had bitterly opposed his coming. There he lectured upon Ethics (Berlin, 1823, 1824, 4 vols.), and upon Religion, its Essence, its Manifestations, and its Influence upon Life (1827). There, also, he preached to a select but highly appreciative audience, and published five collections of sermons (Basel, 1825-29). Another series was published after his death (1819). In 1846 he issued the first part of his unfinished Bible History, or History of Revelation. In 1836 he began, and in 1848 he finished, his renowned Concise Exegetical Commentary on the New Testament, — a work marked by masterly brevity and precision and the most exact and accurate scholarship.

The numerous works already mentioned make up, after all, only a partial list of the writings of this extraordinary and prolific genius. Reviews, criticisms, essays, encyclopædia and newspaper articles, sermons, addresses, pamphlets, works upon art (Berlin, 1846), even a drama, — The Renunciation (Die Entsagung; Schauspiel in 3 Aufzügen), Berlin, 1823), and poems, came from his gifted pen. And the fullest record of his literary activity fails to set him forth as he was in himself. He was fond of society, and hospitably inclined; and, although rationalist and "heretic," he took a leading part in all philanthropic movements. He founded (1825) a society in Basel to help the Greeks in their struggle against Turkish tyranny, to send missionaries to Greece, and to educate their children. He took a little Greek boy into his own family, and was a tender foster-father to him. He also founded the Basel branch of the Gustavus Adolphus Union (see art.), to which he gave the name the "Union of Supporters of the Protestant Church."

It remains to speak of De Wette's philosophical and theological opinions, early embraced and worked out, and faithfully adhered to through life. These will be best read in his Ueber Religion u. Theologie, Erläuterungen zum Lehrbuch der Dogmatik (Berlin, 1815, new edition, 1821). The theism of the Kantian criticism forms the basis of De Wette's doctrinal system; but he leans visibly towards Jacobi's theory of religion as feeling. He makes a sharp distinction between knowledge and faith. The former refers to the intellect, and has to do only with finite things; while the infinite must be grasped by faith under the form of feeling, — devotion, enthusiasm, resignation, etc. The infinite is revealed by the finite in a symbolical manner. The whole historical revelation is a symbol in which the eternal and supersensuous ideas have found their expression. The miracle is a cross to the understanding, but as a symbol it shows its meaning. The dogma is inaccessible to the understanding, but opens itself to the intuition; for intuition is the only means of conception when the object is a symbol. All religious conception is consequently æsthetical, and this æsthetical elevation above the merely intelligible is to De Wette the only tenable form of supernaturalism. De Wette was pre-eminently an ethical theologian. He closely connected dogma with ethics, and made ethical considerations decisive in judging other systems. He held fast to the personality of Christ, and in the preface to his Commentary on Revelation made use of the following remarkable language: "I know that there is salvation in no other name but the name of Jesus Christ and him crucified; and that there is nothing higher for humanity than the God-mankind realized in him, and the kingdom of God planted by him. . . . Christianity must become life and deed." This was his dying testimony.

WETZER, Heinrich Joseph, joint editor, with Welte, of the great Roman-Catholic theological encyclopædia; b. at Anzefahr, Hessian, March 19, 1801; d. in Freiburg, Nov. 3, 1853. His favorite study was Oriental philology; and this he prosecuted at Marburg, Tübingen, and Paris. In 1824 he received from Freiburg the degrees of doctor of theology and canon law, and became extraordinary professor of Oriental philology in that university, 1828, and ordinary, 1830. He joined Van Ess in his translation of the Old Testament, Sulzbach, 1840. In 1846 he began the issue of the encyclopædia with which his name and that of the co-editor, Benedikt Welte, are indissolubly connected. The first volume was completed 1847. Wetzer put all his time, strength, and learning at the disposal of the work, and the result was eminently satisfactory. The encyclopædia of Wetzer and Welte is authoritative, fair-minded, and, for a Roman-Catholic work, impartial to a singular degree. (The first volume of a revised edition by Kaulen appeared 1882.) Wetzer was a layman, and married. See his biography in vol. xii. of Wetzer and Welte, pp. 1251-1254.

WHATELY, Richard, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin; b. in London, Feb. 1, 1787; d. in Dublin, Oct. 8, 1863. He was graduated at Oxford, 1808, and elected fellow of Oriel College, 1811. He did little to cultivate anybody's good will. His inexhaustible wit spared neither friend nor foe. Arguing was his passion, and he was as ready to defend a paradox as his genuine convictions. But he made good use of his time, and laid deep and broad foundations in learning. He also acquired repute as a preacher. The first public exhibition of his peculiar wit was Historic Doubts relative to Napoleon Bonaparte (1819), in which he reduced to absurdity the Hume dictum, that no testimony suffices to prove a miracle, by analyzing the unquestioned facts relative to Napoleon, and pretending to doubt his very existence. The brochure was both his first and his most popular publication. In consequence of his marriage, he resigned his fellowship (1821), and took the rectorship of Halesworth, Suffolk. In 1822 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, On the Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion. In 1825 he was elected principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, and in 1830 professor of political economy. In 1825 he brought out his first series of essays, On some of the Peculiarities of the Christian Religion, and The Elements of Logic. The latter book had already substantially appeared in the shape of an article in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana. By it he revived the study of logic in Oxford, and won great fame; for his book was extensively used as a text-book in England and America. But it contained no novelties, rather it was a clear presentation of the Aristotelian-scholastic logic. Next came his Elements of Rhetoric (1828), which likewise has been widely used and much prized. In the same year appeared his second series of essays, On some of the Difficulties in the Writings of the Apostle Paul, and in some of the Other Parts of the New Testament. In the second edition (1830) he inserted an essay, Thoughts on the Sabbath, which he also published separately. He gave great offence by opposing the current views. In 1830 appeared his third series of essays, The Errors of Romanism traced to their Origin in Human Nature. It is the best antidote to Roman-Catholic error yet published. By these different writings, and by his lectures and sermons, Whately had given evidence of peculiar fitness for the academic life, and had won fame as a liberal theologian of the most independent kind.

To the great astonishment of every one, and in the face of vehement opposition, Professor Whately was in 1831 promoted by the premier, Earl Grey, to the archbishopric of Dublin, and in the autumn of that year began his service. He showed in his new position the same absolute indifference to popular opinion or prejudice, the same delight in stinging wit and biting sarcasm, and the same recklessness in stating his convictions, which had already made him so unpopular. And yet Whately abundantly justified the wisdom of his promotion; for he won his way by the exhibition of a spirit of impartiality and kindness towards the Roman Catholics, by vigorous and twenty years' long-continued efforts in the cause of popular education, by his services in stemming the tide toward Rome, and by his interest in, and self-sacrificing labor for, all that tended to make Ireland better in body and soul. As primate of Ireland, he sat in the House of Lords, and made many speeches, which are noticeable for their independence. Thus he advocated a revision of the Liturgy, a revision of the Authorized Version of the Bible, the abrogation of the prohibition to marry a deceased wife's sister, the emancipation of Jews (cf. Speech on Jewish Disabilities, 1833) and Roman Catholics.

Whately's theological stand-point was substantially that of rational supernaturalism. He was, however, no creative genius, but followed, in his usual independent way, the direction of Paley. He left no systematic treatise; yet his principal ideas are easily gathered from his numerous essays, sermons, charges, and speeches; and the living proof of his great influence upon English theology is the Broad Church party. The limpid clearness of his style, and his soberness and impartiality, demand a word of recognition. In his theological writings he ever quietly opposed Tractarianism. The following are the principal points of his distinctive teaching. 1. Relation between Reason and Revelation.—What reason can discover is not revealed. What it cannot discover, and yet is not contrary to it, may be made an article of faith by proof from particular passages of Scripture. What is contrary to reason can only be so made by the most indisputable evidence. While believing in the right and necessity of a revelation, he found a place for reason within revelation's limits, and a duty for it,—to find out the truth. Whately was a genuine disciple of the "evidential" school. Faith is to him the conclusion drawn from historical premises. 2. The Scriptures.—Revelation is to be distinguished from mere matters of history, etc. The former is infallible, inspired, if not verbally, at least substantially. The peculiarities of Scripture, its omissions, etc., are to be referred to the special guidance of the Holy Spirit. Its contents are practical truths expressed in popular language. The Bible is to be interpreted as the persons immediately addressed would understand it. There is no infallible interpretation; but the effort should be to get at this primitive understanding by a study of the circumstances and religious ideas and customs of the first Christians. (The merit of this view was its demand for a historico-grammatical exegesis.) 3. Doctrine of Election.—In the Old Testament, election is set forth as arbitrary; but it concerns not individuals, but whole nations. In the New Testament it is represented as embracing all those members of the Christian Church who use the preaching of the gospel and the means of grace to their salvation. 4. Christology.—The self-witness of Jesus to his divinity is the strongest proof in the New Testament for the doctrine, and the most important part of it is that borne before the Sanhedrin and Pilate. The incarnation is an extraordinary act of revelation, in order (1) to make divinity more intelligible to us, and (2) to give a pattern of human perfection. The death of Christ was sacrificial; but, as circumstances conspired to bring it about, it was not necessarily an unavoidable catastrophe. 5. Doctrine of Justification.—The death of Christ is the only ground of our salvation. There is no such thing as imputed righteousness. 6. Christianity.—(Cf. The Christian's Duty with respect to the Established Government and the Laws, 1821, and The Kingdom of Christ, 1841.) The Christian revelation is substantially a revelation of the truth in the words and example of Christ. Christianity is, on the other hand, a social religion. The kingdom of Christ is a society, whose members may at the same time belong to other societies. Thus the problem of Church and State is solved. Christ has himself given the plan for the society's government, but the execution of this plan lies with the society. It has, like every other society, its officers, who have the right to draw up rules for the admission and expulsion of members. This is the so-called "power of the keys,"—a power which does not reach to the forgiveness of sins, but only to ecclesiastical penances. The essentials of Christianity are of universal, the minor matters, only of relative, importance. The authority of oecumenical councils is not justified by the Bible, which rather recognizes independence among churches. There is no such thing as apostolic succession in the sense of its securing the transmission of the Holy Ghost and the efficacy of the sacraments. The true apostolic succession is maintenance of apostolic principles. 7. The Sacraments.—(Cf. Scripture Doctrine concerning the Sacraments, 1857.) Baptism, analogous to circumcision, is the initiatory rite; and infant baptism, with its obligations on the parents, was therefore to be expected, unless it had been expressly prohibited. It is the removal from a state of damnation to a state of grace. The Lord's Supper is symbolical, else the Lord had instructed his disciples otherwise; for they could not have supposed that he gave them his actual body. 8. Eschatology.—(Cf. View of the Scripture Revelations concerning a Future State, 1829.) No revelation of immortality in the Old Testament. Belief in it among the Jews first sprang up in the Maccabean period. The only sure ground of it is the express promise of it as a free gift of God through Christ. Resurrection is not to be understood of the atoms of the body. 9. The Sabbath. If the Mosaic law has been abrogated, then the law of the sabbath is: if the Mosaic law of the sabbath is still binding, then there is no authority for the change of the day from Saturday to Sunday. Christ himself broke the sabbath, and gave his disciples no fixed command respecting it, but left it to the church to fix a day, precisely as in the case of other festivals.

[Whately edited Bacon's Essays, and added annotations, 1856, which have been adjudged worthy of the text; which is very high praise. See the catalogue of Whately's writings appended to his General View of Christianity, New York, 1860. In 1861 his daughter, Miss E. J. Whately, issued his Miscellaneous Remains. For biography, see his Memoirs by W. J. FITZPATRICK, London, 1864, 2 vols.; Life and Correspondence by E. JANE WHATELY, 1866, 2 vols., popular edition, 1868, 1 vol.]

WHEELOCK Eleazer, D.D., Congregational minister; b. at Windham, Conn., April 22, 1711; d. at Hanover, N.H., April 21, 1779. He was minister of the Second Church in Lebanon, Conn., 1735-70; established there a school for the Christian education of Indian boys, called, from Joshua Moor, who gave in 1754 a house and two acres of land for its use, "Moor's Indian Charity School." Out of this school, transferred to Hanover, N.H., 1770, sprang Dartmouth College, of which Dr. Wheelock was the first president. Famous among

Dr. Wheelock's pupils are Sampson Occum (see art.), Joseph Brandt the Indian chief, and his own son John. He wrote Narrative of the Indian Charity School at Lebanon, 1762, and several continuations to it, 1763-73. See his Memoirs by McClure and Parish, 1810. — John Wheelock, D.D., LL.D., Congregational minister; second president of Dartmouth College; b. in Lebanon, Conn., Jan. 28, 1754; d. at Hanover, April 4, 1817. He was graduated from Dartmouth in the first class, 1771; was tutor, 1772-76; served as major and colonel in the Continental army. On the death of his father (1779) he was chosen successor, and held the position to his death, except from 1815 to 1817, when, in consequence of an ecclesiastical controversy, he was removed. He published Sketches of Dartmouth College, 1816.

WHEWELL, William, D.D., b. at Lancaster, Eng., May 24, 1794; d. at Cambridge, March 5, 1866. He was successively undergraduate, fellow, tutor, and master of Trinity College, Cambridge, 1811, and in 1855 vice-chancellor of the university. He was elected F.R.S., 1820; was professor of mineralogy, 1828-32; professor of moral philosophy, 1838-55. His attainments took a very wide sweep: "Science was his chief forte, and omniscience, his foible." Probably his most valuable book is his History of the Inductive Science, 1837; his most widely read, Essay on the Plurality of Worlds, 1853. Valuable also are his Lectures on Systematic Morality (1846), Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy (1852), and The Platonic Dialogues for English Readers (1859-61, 3 vols.). See Account of his Writings, with Selections from his Literary and Scientific Correspondence, edited by Isaac Todhunter, London, 1876, 2 vols.

WHICHCOTE, Benjamin, one of the most eminent of the "Cambridge Platonists," or, as they were sometimes called, "Latitudinarians," of the seventeenth century (a party which also included such men as Cudworth, Wilkins, More, and Worthington); was b. March 11, 1609; and d. May, 1683. He was descended from an ancient family, and was the sixth son of Christopher Whichcote, Esq., of Whichcote Hall in the county of Salop, and parish of Stoke. His mother was the daughter of Edward Fox, Esq., of Greet, in the same county. Of his training in boyhood nothing is known. In 1626 he was sent to Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He took his degree of B.A. in 1629, and of M.A. in 1633. In the latter year he became fellow of his college, where he appears to have remained as tutor till 1643. In that year he was presented to the college living of North Cadbury in Somersetshire; but, before he had time to settle himself in this new sphere of duty, he was recalled (1644) to Cambridge, having been offered, and, after some hesitation, accepted, the preferment of the provostship of King's College, in room of Dr. Collins, who had been ejected by the Parliament. He had been brought up under Puritan influences, but can hardly be said to have belonged to that or any other ecclesiastical party; and when he returned to Cambridge to occupy a prominent position in the university, it was more, to use the words of Principal Tulloch, as "a thoughtful and independent student in religious matters than either as a Puritan or an Anglo-Catholic," that he took his place, and became a power in the university.

The date of the event just referred to, namely, Whichcote's appointment to King's College, marks the rise of the new philosophical and religious movement with which he is identified. Cambridge Latitudinarianism or Platonism, as a system, must be estimated by the works of its most eminent representatives. It may be enough here to indicate the Puritan view of the school in question as expressed in the letters of Whichcote's Puritan friend Tuckney, master of Emmanuel. Tuckney does not like Whichcote's "mode of preaching, the philosophical rational style . . . in contrast to the 'spiritual, plain, powerful ministry' for which Cambridge had been [formerly] distinguished." He goes on:—

"Whilst you were fellow here [in Cambridge], you were cast into the company of very learned and ingenious men, who I fear, at least some of them, studied other authors more than the Scriptures, and Plato and his scholars above others . . . and hence in part hath run a vein of doctrine, which divers very able and worthy men—whom from my heart I much honor—are, I fear, too much known by. The power of Nature [is] too much advanced. Reason hath too much given to it in the mysteries of faith,—a recta ratio much talked of, which I cannot tell where to find. Mind and understanding is all: heart and will little spoken of. The decrees of God [are] questioned and quarrelled, because, according to our reason, we cannot comprehend how they can stand with his goodness. . . . There our philosophers and other heathens [are] much fairer candidates for heaven than the Scriptures seem to allow of; and they in their virtues [are] preferred before Christians overtaken with weaknesses,—a kind of moral divinity minted, only with a little of Christ added. Nay, a Platonic faith unites to God. Inherent righteousness [is] so preached, as if not with the prejudice of imputed righteousness, which hath sometimes very unseemly language given it; yet much said of the one, and very little or nothing of the other. This was not Paul's manner of preaching."

To this must be added the opinion of Principal Tulloch as to the peculiar position of Whichcote:—

"He stood at the head of the Cambridge thought of his time. He moved the university youth with a force which Tuckney and others failed to imitate. He inspired the highest intellect which it was destined to produce for thirty years. Men like Smith and Cudworth and More and Tillotson looked back to him as their intellectual master."

He continued his university career till the Restoration, when, though clearly distinguished from them in many ways, he shared the fate of the Puritan leaders, and was removed from his provostship by the special order of the king. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he adhered, however, to the church, and in 1662 he was appointed to the cure of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, London. This church was burned down in the great fire of 1666, when he returned to a former preferment at Milton in Cambridgeshire, and in 1668 was promoted to the vicarage of St. Lawrence Jewry, where he passed his last years.

Four volumes of Discourses, and a series of Moral and Religious Aphorisms collected from his manuscripts, and his Correspondence, comprise all his works.

According to the editor of his Correspondence, "he was married, but I cannot learn to whom." He left no children. Tillotson preached his funeral sermon. Baxter numbers him with "the best and ablest of the conformists." Burnett describes him as a man of a rare temper, very mild and obliging. He had, Burnett says, "credit with some that had credit in the late times, but made all the use of it he could to protect good men of all persuasions. He was much for liberty of conscience; and being disgusted with the dry, systematical way of those times, he studied to raise those who conversed with him to a nobler set of thoughts."

WHISTON, William; as theologian, a leading defender of Arianism in England; as mathematician, a scholar of Sir Isaac Newton; a very prolific and eccentric writer; b. at Norton, in Leicestershire, Dec. 9, 1667; d. in London, Aug. 22, 1752. He was educated at Cambridge, entered holy orders, and was chaplain of the bishop of Norwich. During his period of service he wrote A New Theory of the Earth, from its Original to the Consummation of all Things, 1696, 6th ed., 1755. He became vicar of Lowestoft, Suffolk, in 1698, and in 1703 Sir Isaac Newton's successor as professor of mathematics at Cambridge. In 1702 he published A Short View of the Chronology of the Old Testament and of the Harmony of the Four Evangelists, in 1706, An Essay on the Revelation of St. John, in 1708, The Accomplishment of Scripture Prophecies (cf. The Literal Accomplishment, etc., 1724); in 1709, Sermons and Essays; in 1710, Praelectiones physico-mathematicae, sive philosophia clarissimi Newtoni mathematica illustrata, quickly Englished, and which first popularized Newtonian ideas. But his stay at Cambridge was destined to be abruptly terminated. In 1708 he prepared an essay upon the Apostolical Constitutions of Clement Romanus, in which he endeavored to prove that Arianism was the dominant faith in the first two centuries, and maintained that the Constitutions was the "most sacred of the canonical books of the New Testament." This essay was not allowed by the chancellor to be printed; but Whiston's ardent advocacy of his opinions rendered his heterodoxy incapable of concealment, and he was accordingly tried, and expelled the university in 1710. He passed the rest of his days in London. His next publication was Primitive Christianity Revived (1711, 1712, 5 vols.), in which he printed the essay referred to, gave text and translation of the Constitutions, and translations of the Ignatian Epistles, the Second Book of Esdras, the Patristic references to the Trinity, and the Recognitions of Clement, prefacing these with an account of his treatment at Cambridge and by convocation, and closing with observations on Dr. Samuel Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, and the proceedings of convocation in his own case. He showed his zeal for "Primitive Christianity" by organizing a society for its promotion; but as the more cautious Arians, noticeably Dr. Clarke himself, declined to join it, in a few years it died out. In 1712 Whiston accepted Baptist and Millenarian tenets (placing the millennium and the restoration of the Jews in 1776); yet he did not leave the Established Church until 1747, when he could no longer endure to hear read the, to him, hateful Athanasian Creed. He then set up a "Primitive Christian" congregation in his own house, and prepared for its use the Book of Common Prayer, "reduced nearer the primitive standard" (2d ed., 1750). His enthusiastic spirit led him into many freaks, and his fancy overmastered his critical judgment. Still one must admire the manly openness and truthfulness of his character, the consistency of his life, and the straight-forwardness of his conduct. He seems to have had little influence upon his time. Many were attracted to him; but his peculiar, not to say dangerous, views, and great self-assertiveness, soon drove them away. By one piece of work, out of the many which proceeded from his learned brain and busy pen, he has made himself familiar to thousands,—his translation of Josephus (1736), which has appeared in innumerable subsequent editions, and never been superseded. As a curiosity, may be mentioned his Primitive New Testament, 1745, translated from the Codex Bezae in Gospels and Acts, from the Clermont manuscript for the Pauline Epistles, and from the Codex Alexandrinus (ed. Mill) for the Catholic Epistles. See his Memoirs, Written by Himself, 1749-50, 3 vols., and the Biographia Britannica, s.v.

THEODOR CHRISTLIEB.

WHITAKER, William, D.D., b. at Holme, Lancashire, 1518; d. at Cambridge, Dec. 4, 1595. He was graduated at Cambridge, where he was successively fellow of Trinity College; Regius Professor of divinity, 1579; chancellor of St. Paul's 1580; and master of St. John's College, 1586. He was a man of great learning, very staunch in his Protestantism and Calvinism. Among his polemical works may be mentioned Disputatio de sacra scriptura, Cambridge, 1588 (Eng. trans., A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton, ed. for Parker Society, 1849); An Answer to the Ten Reasons of Edward Campian, the Jesuit (Eng. trans. from Latin of 1581), London, 1606.

WHITBY, The Council of, was convened in 664 by King Oswy for the purpose of settling the questions of the time of the celebration of Easter, the shape of the tonsure, etc., concerning which different opinions and customs prevailed among the Roman and the Iro-Scottish ecclesiastics. On the Roman side, Wilfrid spoke; on the Iro-Scottish, Colman. The former was victorious. The latter left the country with most of his monks. But from that day the English Church took up a new direction in its course of development,—a direction towards Rome,—and the doom of the Iro-Scottish Church was sealed.

WHITBY, Daniel, D.D., b. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, 1664; prebendary of Salisbury, 1668; rector of St. Edmund's, Salisbury, 1672; d. there March 24, 1726. A man of great learning, he is best remembered for his striking theological changes. He began as an ardent advocate of Protestantism in his book on The Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship (1679); and next appeared, as a champion of ecclesiastical union, The Protestant Reconciler humbly pleading for condescension to Dissenting brethren in things indifferent (1683), in which he expressed very liberal opinions respecting "things indifferent," contending that they should not be made legal barriers to union among Protestants. But the book raised a storm. The High-Church party were loud in protestations. The university of Oxford ordered the book to be publicly burnt by the university marshal: and the bishop of Salisbury, whose chaplain he then was, obliged him to make humble confession of his two principal "heresies:" (1) That it is not legal for the authorities to require in worship any thing to be said or used which the older custom did not; and (2) That the Christian duty not to offend the weaker brethren was inconsistent with the legal requirement of these "indifferent things." Accordingly, in the same year, Whitby issued a second part of his Protestant Reconciler, in which he commanded the nonconformists to re-enter the Church of England, and endeavored to refute their objections to such a proceeding. His next work of importance was A Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, 1703, in two vols., which now forms part of the familiar Commentary of Patrick, Lowth, and Arnald, commonly called "Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary." Whitby says his Commentary was the fruit of fifteen years' study. It belongs to the old orthodox school. But scarcely was it out of the press before its changeable author was upon a new line of thought. Influenced by deistic attacks upon the doctrine of original sin, he issued his Discourse (1710) on the "five points" of Calvinism; viz., (1) election, (2) extent of the atonement, (3) divine grace, (4) liberty of the will, (5) perseverance of the saints. In this he revealed his Arminianism. Four years later his treatise on the patristic interpretation of the Scriptures appeared (Dissertatio de S. Scripturarum interpretatione secundum patrum commentarios, in qua probatur, I. S. S. esse regulam fidei unicam II. Patres non esse idoneos S. S. interpretes, 1714), in which he maintained, not only that the Scriptures are the only infallible rule of faith, but that the Fathers are mostly very incompetent exegetes and unsafe guides in theological controversies. This book was intended to show that the controversy upon the Trinity could not be decided by appeal to the Fathers, the councils, nor ecclesiastical tradition. By it the public was prepared for his next theological change. From being an "orthodox" Arminian, he became an Arian; had a controversy with Waterland, and in his Last Thoughts, containing his Correction of Several Passages in his Commentary on the New Testament, issued after his death by Dr. Sykes, 1727, retracted his exposition of the trinitarian dogma, which he declared to be a tissue of absurdities.

The little thin man spent his whole life in his study, and was a child in all worldly matters. His character is very favorably described by ANTHONY WOOD, in Athenæ Oxonienses, II. See also Dr. SYKES's sketch of him in Last Thoughts, mentioned above. THEODOR CHRISTLIEB.

WHITE, Henry, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Durham, Greene County, N. Y., June 19, 1800; d. in New-York City, Aug. 25, 1850. He was graduated at Union College, New York, 1824; studied two years in Princeton Theological Seminary, New Jersey; was pastor of the Allen-street Church, New York, 1828-36, when he became professor of theology in the newly founded Union Theological Seminary, and held this position till his death. He was an excellent teacher and a sound theologian, but he never published any thing except a few sermons. See SPRAGUE: Annals of the American Pulpit, iv., 691 sqq.

WHITE, Henry Kirke, whose pathetic history has won him wider fame, perhaps, than his talents might have commanded during a longer life, was born at Nottingham, March 21, 1785; managed to educate himself while apprentice to a lawyer; took to verse at fourteen; published Clifton Grove, 1803; entered St. John's College, Cambridge, 1804; and, after two years of severe and successful study, died of consumption, Oct. 19, 1806. His Remains were published in 2 vols., by Southey, 1807. His few hymns were included in Dr. Collyer's Collection, 1812, and have been extensively used. F. M. BIRD.

WHITE, Joseph, D.D., Church-of-England divine, and Orientalist, b. at Stroud, Gloucestershire, 1746; d. at Oxford, May 22, 1814. He was educated at Oxford, where he was successively fellow of Wadham College, 1774; Laudian Professor of Arabic, 1775; Bampton Lecturer, 1781; Regius Professor of Hebrew, 1802; and canon of Christ Church. His works are of great value. Among them are an edition of the whole Harclean version, 1778-1803, 4 vols (see BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 287); A View of Christianity and Mohammedanism (Bampton Lectures), 1784; Diatessaron (with Greek text), 1799, new ed., 1856 (see DIATESSARON, p. 631).

WHITE, William, D.D. This person, so generally regarded as the "Father" of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, was the son of Col. Thomas White of London, Eng., and Esther Hewlings of Burlington, N. J., having been born in Philadelphia, March 24, 1747 (O. S.), where, also, he died July 17, 1836. He was educated in the schools and College of Philadelphia, graduating in 1765. At the age of sixteen he decided to become a clergyman; and in 1770 he sailed for England to receive orders, having pursued his theological studies under the direction of leading divines of the church in the city of his birth. Dec. 23, 1770, he was ordained deacon in the Royal Chapel, London, by Dr. Young, bishop of Norwich. Being under age with respect to further advancement, he delayed in England until June, 1772, when he was ordained priest by Dr. Terrick, bishop of London. Sailing at once for Philadelphia, and arriving there Sept. 13, he entered upon his duties as assistant minister of Christ Church and St. Peter's. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he promptly sided with the Colonies, and was chosen chaplain to the Continental Congress in September, 1777. April 19, 1779, he was elected rector of Christ Church, Philadelphia. In the year 1782, before the acknowledgment of American independence, he published his celebrated but poorly understood pamphlet, The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States considered, proposing a temporary administration by the presbyters of the church; there being no prospect, at the time, of obtaining the episcopate. Shortly after, however, independence was recognized, when he immediately abandoned the plan. The pamphlet referred to urged the introduction of the laity into the councils of the church, which, together with the adoption of Articles, was opposed subsequently by Seabury. The counsels of White prevailed when the church was organized. Sept. 14, 1786, he was elected bishop of Pennsylvania, and, Nov. 2, sailed for England, in company with the Rev. Samuel Provoost, who had been elected bishop of New York, receiving consecration with the latter, at the hands of the archbishop of Canterbury, the archbishop of York, and other prelates, in Lambeth Palace, Feb. 1, 1787. He reached New York on Easter Sunday, April 7, 1787. Bishop Seabury had been consecrated for Connecticut by the Scotch non-jurors, Nov. 14, 1784; but the church was not altogether satisfied with that transaction, desiring a threefold succession, through the English line, which was completed by the consecration of the Rev. James Madison of Virginia, at Lambeth, 1799. Three years before, however, Bishop Seabury had passed away. Bishop White exercised the Episcopal Office until his death, having been in orders more than sixty-five years, and standing at the head of the American Church nearly half a century. About twenty-six bishops were consecrated by him. He married Miss Mary Harrison of Philadelphia, in 1773; and his descendants are honorably represented both among the clergy and laity of the church of which, in such an eminent sense, he was the founder. He finally passed away, leaving the Episcopal Office, which, at the beginning of his administration was viewed with distrust, one of the most honored institutions in America. Throughout his entire life he bore an unblemished reputation, bearing his high office with that meekness which formed its great adornment. Bishop White was a man of large and comprehensive views, sound in his theology and churchmanship, temperate in opinion, and wise in his administration, occupying a position in the Church similar to that held by Washington in the State. As a writer he evinced usefulness rather than popularity. Some account of his works may be found in WILSON'S Memoir (p. 305), and SPRAGUE'S American Pulpit (v. 283). His principal work, and one that will always continue a prime necessity for students, is his Memoirs of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, first published in 1820. A second edition appeared in 1836, and third in 1880, with an introduction and notes by the Rev. B. F. De Costa, D.D. See also, on Bishop White, the Account of the Meeting of the Descendants of Col. Thomas White of Maryland, Philadelphia, 1879. B. F. DE COSTA.

WHITEFIELD, George, a famous evangelist; b. in Gloucester, Eng., Dec. 27, 1714, in Bell Inn (of which his father was keeper); d. in Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 30, 1770. His grandfather and great-grandfather on the paternal side were clergymen of the Established Church. He was the youngest of a family of six sons and one daughter. When he was two years of age, his father died, and his mother kept the inn. His own account of his early years, published in 1740, and severely criticised as imprudent, exaggerated his youthful follies and vices. He speaks of himself as given to various forms of wickedness, fond of cards, despising instruction, and, when larger, exhibiting a great love for plays. He says, however, that his mother was careful of his education, and it was she who urged him to go to Oxford. At twelve he was placed in a grammar-school in Gloucester, where he developed gifts as a speaker. Three years later he withdrew from school, and became a drawer in the inn, but returned the next year, with a new impulse, to prepare for college. The religious impressions which he had felt on different occasions were deepened while he was at school the second time. He became attentive to his church duties, and went to Oxford in 1732, resolving to live a holy life. At Oxford he fell in with the Wesleys, joined the famous "Holy Club," observed its rules rigorously, and was enabled, after great distress of mind over his spiritual condition, to testify that the "day-star" which he "had seen at a distance before" "rose in his heart," and to trust that the Spirit of God had sealed him "unto the day of redemption." This was in 1735, and Whitefield was the first of the "Oxford Methodists" to profess conversion. His health being impaired, he left Oxford for a year, returning in March, 1736. He was ordained in the following June. The youthful deacon preached his first sermon in Gloucester, with marked effect, and took his degree of B.A. from Oxford the same year. He spent much time among the prisoners in Oxford, preached in London and elsewhere, and at once rose to great prominence as a pulpit orator. Nine of the sermons preached the first year of his ordination were published. The Wesleys had requested him to come to them in Georgia; and he finally resolved to go, but did not sail until the beginning of 1738, just as John Wesley returned. Whitefield spent several months in Georgia, preaching with great acceptance. He sailed for England the same year, to be ordained priest. He found many of the London churches closed to him, because he was considered as erratic and fanatical. The Wesleys had obtained the peace of mind they had so long been seeking, and were preaching very earnestly the doctrine of justification by faith; and they impressed Whitefield, who had been emphasizing the doctrine of the "new birth," with its great importance. He busied himself preaching in such churches as would receive him, and in visiting and working among the Moravians and religious societies in London. Early in 1739 he held a conference with the Wesleys and other Oxford Methodists, and in February went to Bristol. Being excluded from the churches, he preached to colliers on Kingswood Hill, in the open air, — a step which he induced Wesley to take, thus establishing an innovation which gave opportunity to the Methodist movement. Whitefield had no lack of hearers. Thousands thronged about him. At Rose Green, a month after his first open-air sermon, twenty thousand persons formed his audience. At Kingswood he laid the foundations of the Kingswood School, which became so important to Methodism. He now began his career as an itinerant evangelist. He visited Wales, and gave an impulse to the revival movement already begun by Howell Harris. He visited Scotland, and great results followed. He travelled through England, attracting extraordinary attention everywhere. His arraignment of the clergy as "blind guides" roused many to oppose him; and in 1739 no less than forty-nine publications for and against him appeared. The hostile feeling preceded him to America. On his second visit to the Colonies, some of the Episcopal churches refused him their pulpit; but other churches were open to him. He preached in Philadelphia and New York, and on his way to Georgia, drawing delighted multitudes everywhere. Visiting New England, the revival which had begun in Northampton in 1736 broke out again, and perhaps Boston never saw a greater awakening. He paid seven visits to America; and the results of his evangelistic tours were shared by the Congregational, the Presbyterian, and the Baptist churches, from Massachusetts to Georgia. When he was not in America, he was stirring by his mighty eloquence the great audiences that greeted him in England, Scotland, and Wales. He early became Calvinistic in his views, and his association with Calvinistic divines in America deepened them. He complained to Wesley of his attacks on the doctrine of election; and there was a short, sharp controversy between them, which led to a temporary alienation. But Whitefield had a noble and generous spirit, and loved Wesley, and neither wished to contend with the other: so a reconciliation took place, and the two great men, the evangelist and the organizer, were henceforth fast friends, though their paths were different. Whitefield was nominally the leader of the Calvinistic Methodists, but he left to others the work of organization. The result, however, of his embracing Calvinism, was the opening of "a wide field of usefulness, which, without it, neither he nor Wesley could have occupied." So says his impartial Methodist biographer, Tyerman, who also says that his services to Methodism were greater "than Methodists have ever yet acknowledged," and that it is "impossible to estimate" the value of the work he and his "female prelate, the grand, stately, strong-minded, godly, and self-sacrificing Countess of Huntingdon, performed for the Church of England. In a true cosmopolitan spirit he divided his time between Great Britain and America; with a catholicity as broad as the gospel, he gave his wonderful labors to all denominations.

He married, in 1741, a widow, Mrs. Elizabeth James. A son born of this union lived only a short time. He saw little of home-life. His activities were incessant, all-absorbing. He never spared himself, preaching every day in the week, and often three or four times a day. His last sermon was preached in Exeter, Mass., the day before his death. He was ill, and a friend remarked that he was more fit to go to bed than to preach. "Yes," said he; then pausing, he added, "Lord Jesus, I am weary in thy work, but not of it. An immense audience gathered to hear him. At first he labored; but soon all his faculties responded for a last great effort, and he held the multitude spell-bound for two hours. He proceeded to Newburyport the same day. In the evening, as he took his candle to go to bed, many who were gathered in the hall tempted him to an exhortation, which continued till the candle burned out in the socket. The next morning, Sept. 30, 1770, he was dead.

In person Whitefield, as described by Dr. Gillies of Scotland, was graceful, well-proportioned, above the middle size in stature. His eyes were dark blue, small, and sprightly. His complexion was fair, his countenance manly. Both his face and voice were softened with an uncommon degree of sweetness, and he was neat, easy in deportment, and without affectation. He had a strong, musical voice, under wonderful command. Twenty thousand people could hear him. "Every accent of his voice spoke to the ear: every feature of his face, and every motion of his hands, spoke to the eye." His preaching melted Dr. Jonathan Edwards to tears. Benjamin Franklin went to hear him in Philadelphia, and was completely won. He perceived, he wrote, that Whitefield would finish with a collection; and although he had gold, silver, and copper in his pocket, he resolved to give nothing. But, as the preacher proceeded, "I began to soften, and concluded to give the copper. Another stroke of his oratory determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admirably, that I emptied my pocket wholly into the collector's dish, — gold and all." Whitefield was once asked for a copy of a sermon to publish. "I have no objection," said he, "if you will print the lightning, thunder, and rainbow with it." The Franklin incident exhibits his great persuasive power. A scene described by Dr. James Hamilton shows how vivid were some of his pictures. Chesterfield was listening while the orator described the sinner as a blind beggar led by a dog. The dog leaving him, he was forced to grope his way, guided only by his staff. "Unconsciously he wanders to the edge of a precipice; his staff drops from his hand, down the abyss, too far to send back an echo; he reaches forward cautiously to recover it; for a moment he poises on vacancy, and — 'Good God!' shouted Chesterfield, 'he is gone,' as he sprang from his seat to prevent the catastrophe."

Wesley's sermon on his departed friend contains a high but just estimate of him. He spoke of Whitefield's "unparalleled zeal," "indefatigable activity," "tender-heartedness," "charitableness toward the poor," his "deep gratitude," "tender friendship" (which he himself had tested), his "frankness and openness," "courage and intrepidity," "great plainness of speech," "steadiness," "integrity." "Have we," said Wesley, "read or heard of any person since the apostles who testified the gospel of the grace of God through so widely extended a space, through so large a part of the habitable world? Have we heard or read of any person who called so many thousands, so many myriads, of sinners to repentance?"

Whitefield's sermons and journals were published in instalments at different periods during his life. His collected works, — comprising about seventy-five sermons, — his journals, and his letters, together with Memoirs of his Life, by Dr. GILLIES, were published in London, in 7 vols. 8vo. 1771-72. Dr. Gillies was his first biographer: his latest, and perhaps best, is TYERMAN: Life of George Whitefield, London, 1876, 2 vols. 8vo. Lives have also been written by ROBERT PHILIP (Lond., 1838, 8vo), J. R. ANDREWS (1864, 8vo), D. A. HARSHA (Albany, N.Y., 1866, 8vo). See also Life and Times of the Countess of Huntingdon, Lond., 1840, 2 vols., 8vo; STEVENS'S History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century called Methodism. N.Y., 1859-62. H. K. WHITGIFT, John, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at Great Grimsby, Lincolnshire, in or about 1530; d. at Lambeth, Feb. 29, 1604. He was fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge University, 1555; ordained priest, 1560; appointed Lady Margaret professor of divinity, 1563; master of Pembroke Hall, master of Trinity College, and then regius professor of divinity, all in the same year, 1567; prebendary of Ely, 1568; dean of Lincoln, 1568; bishop of Worcester, 1577; and in 1583 he was raised to the primacy. During Mary's reign he observed a discreet silence, which enabled him to keep his position; but on the succession of Elizabeth he appeared as the defender of the Church of England, and advocate of extreme opinions respecting her authority. He headed the prelatical party, and for years carried on a controversy with Thomas Cartwright, the great champion of Puritanism (see arts.). When raised to the primacy, Whitgift was in position to carry out repressive measures against the detested Puritan party. He obtained the decree (June 23, 1585) of the Star Chamber (to which he belonged) against liberty of printing, by which no one was allowed to print except in London, Oxford, and Cambridge: no new presses were to be set up, but by license of the primate and the bishop of London; and only matter authorized by the archbishop of Canterbury, or the bishop of London, or their chaplains, could be printed. Persons selling or binding an unauthorized book suffered three months' imprisonment. And this decree was a mere specimen of his proceedings. He determined to uproot Puritanism, and to this end drew up several articles which he well knew the Puritans could not and would not subscribe, particularly one declaring that the Book of Common Prayer contained nothing contrary to the word of God; and, because they would not sign, he summarily suspended them, and in their places appointed inferior, and in some cases, probably without his knowledge, even immoral men. He carried out his programme so imperiously that Lord Burleigh once and again remonstrated with him, but to no purpose. The amount of suffering he caused is incalculable. Hundreds of worthy ministers, for no other fault than conscientious scruples against alleged unscriptural and Romanizing practices and doctrines in the Church of England, were deprived of their charges, hurried off to prison, harried by deferred hopes, and, if they left prison at all, were, after their harsh and unjust treatment, ruined in health and property. The incoming of James I. (1603) did not affect his position nor manners. He was shrewd enough to treat that vain monarch with peculiar respect. In the famous Hampton Court conference, he knelt before him, and even told a falsehood concerning the practice of lay baptism in the Church of England, denying its permissibility in order to give the king a higher idea of that church. But, ere the first Parliament of the new reign met, Whitgift died. Whitgift's administration "embodied the worst passions of an intolerant state priest. It knew no mercy; it exercised no compassion. It is in vain to defend the administration of Whitgift on the grounds of the excesses of the Puritans. Those excesses were provoked by his cruelty. Neither can the archbishop be justified on the plea that he acted on the commands of the queen. He was the queen's adviser, to whose judgment she deferred, and of whose hearty concurrence in every measure of severity and intolerance she was fully assured." He acted, doubtless, conscientiously, and is said to have been "personally pious, liberal, and free from harshness." His Works, consisting mostly of polemical tracts, were edited for the Parker Society by Rev. John Ayre, Cambridge, 1851-54, 3 vols.; and Life, written by Sir George Paule, 1612, and by John Strype, 1718. Cf. NEALE'S History of the Puritans, and Hook's Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury.

WHITTEMORE, Thomas, D.D., Universalist clergyman; b. at Boston, Jan. 1, 1800; d. at Cambridge, Mass., March 21, 1861. He was pastor in Cambridgeport, 1822 to 1831; editor and proprietor of the Trumpet, a Universalist religious newspaper, for nearly thirty years, from its commencement in 1828. He was prominent in political and railroad affairs, being president of the Vermont and Massachusetts Railroad, and repeatedly a member of the Massachusetts Legislature. He wrote The Modern History of Universalism, 1830, enlarged edition, 1860; Notes and Illustrations of the Parables of the New Testament, 1832; Plain Guide to Universalism, 1838; Commentary on Revelation (1838) and On Daniel: Life of Walter Balfour, 1853; Life of Hosca Ballou, 1853-55, 4 vols.; Autobiography, 1859.

WHITTINGHAM, William Rollinson, D.D., LL.D., D.C.L., b. in New-York City, Dec. 2, 1805; d. at West Orange, N.J., Oct. 15, 1879. He was professor of ecclesiastical history in the General Theological Seminary (where he had been graduated in 1825) from 1835 till 1840, when he was consecrated (Sept. 17) bishop of Maryland. He was one of the scholars of his church, and belonged to the High-Church party. See his Life by W. F. BRAND, New York, 1883, 2 vols.

WHITTLESEY, William, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. probably at Whittlesey, near Cambridge; d. at Lambeth, June 6, 1371. He was educated at Cambridge. In 1349, became master of his college, Peterhouse; in 1361, bishop of Rochester; and on Oct. 11, 1368, primate of all England, and metropolitan. He was an unhappy choice, for the times required a vigorous prelate. Edward III. was laying heavy taxes on the people, and especially the clergy, in order to keep up the lavish extravagance of the court, and Whittlesey was weak physically, most of the time an invalid, and destitute of commanding mental gifts. He was, however, sadly conscious of his deficiencies, and conscientiously did his best. See Hook: Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, iv, 221 sqq.

WICELIUS, or WITZEL, Georg, b. at Vach, in Hesse, 1501; d. at Mayence, 1573. He studied theology at Erfurt, and went in 1520 to Wittenberg to hear Luther and Melancthon, but was nevertheless ordained as priest by Bishop Adolph of Merseburg. Appointed vicar in his native town, he preached the doctrines of the Reformation, married, and was expelled in 1525. Driven away by the Peasants' War from Wenigen-Lubnitz in Thuringia, where he had settled, he was, on the recommendation of Luther, appointed pastor of Niemeck, but relapsed into Romanism, began to write with great violence against Luther and Melancthon, and was expelled in 1530. After some years of uncertain endeavors, he entered the service of Abbot John of Fulda in 1540, published his principal book, Typus ecclesie prioris, presented his Querela pacis to Charles V. at the diet of Spire (1544), and took part in the drawing-up of the Augsburg Interim. As the Reformation spread, he felt compelled to leave Fulda, and settled in 1554 at Mayence, where he spent the rest of his life in quiet retirement. WICHERN, Johann Heinrich, D.D., the founder of the Inner Mission in Germany (see art.), and one of the foremost Christian philanthropists of the century; b. at Hamburg, April 21, 1808; d. there April 7, 1881. He studied theology in Göttingen and Berlin, and reached the degree of "candidate," and afterwards received the honorary degree of doctor of divinity. On his return home, encouraged by his pious mother, he started a Sunday school for the poorest and wickedest children in the city, and ultimately had five hundred children under his care. It was this school which gave him the idea of the institution which he opened on Nov. 1, 1833, at Horn, a suburb of Hamburg. He called it the "Rough House" (Das Rauhe Haus). It has served as the pattern of many similar institutions in Germany, France, England, Holland, etc. It is a house for the correction of juvenile offenders. Here these evil-minded and often weak-minded children are received, portioned off into "families" of twelve, placed under the charge of a young workman, and taught a trade. In connection with the Haus there is a book printing, binding, and selling business carried on. The Haus celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in November, 1883. For the education of persons competent to take charge of similar institutions, or to serve in them, there was started in 1845 a "Brotherhood." In 1841 Wichern sent out his Fliegende Blätter ("Flying Leaves"), now the organ of the Inner Mission, in which he urged the duty of laying to heart the misery of our fellow-mortals, and at the same time told the story of his own institutions. His story was eagerly read, and incited many imitators. In 1848, at the Kirchentag (see art.) held at Wittenberg, he presented with such extraordinary eloquence the claims of the sick, the suffering, and the sinful who were their countrymen, that from that hour a new movement on their behalf was begun. This was the so-called "Inner Mission" (see art.), the very name of which is due to Wichern. Under Friedrich Wilhelm IV. (who came to the throne in 1840), Wichern found favor in court-circles, and exerted great influence upon the aristocracy. In 1851 he was commissioned by the Prussian Government to visit the reformatory and correctional institutions in all the provinces of the kingdom, and suggest improvements. In 1858 he was made a member of the council in the department of the interior, and also of the highest church council. In the same year he founded in Berlin the Evangelische Johannisstift,—a similar institution to the Rauhe Haus. Its twenty-fifth anniversary was celebrated in 1883. He interested himself particularly in prison-reform, and also organized the Prussian military diaconate. In 1872 he had a stroke of paralysis, from which he never recovered. It prevented him from visiting America as a delegate to the General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York, 1873, for which he had engaged to prepare an essay. Wichern was of commanding person, full of faith and the Holy Ghost, and always made a powerful impression by his speeches at the Church Diet and in the Annual Congress for Inner Missions. He wrote Die innere Mission der deutschen evangelischen Kirche, Hamburg, 1849; Die Behandlung der Verbrecher u. entlassenen Sträflinge, 1853; Der Dienst der Frauen in der Kirche, 1858, 3d ed., 1880. His biography has been written by F. OLDENBURG, Hamburg, 1882, and by Dr. HERMANN KRUMMACHER, Gotha, 1882.

WICLIF, John,<sup>1</sup> the "Morning Star of the Reformation;" b. at Spresswell, one mile from Old Richmond, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, several years, perhaps even ten, earlier than the usual date, 1324; d. at Lutterworth, Dec. 31, 1384.

His Life.—He entered Oxford University about 1335; belonged probably to Balliol College; was graduated about 1345, or perhaps not until 1351; became a fellow of Balliol College, and in 1361 appears as its master. On May 16, 1361, he was nominated by his college, rector of Fillingham, ten miles north-north-west from Lincoln, but continued to reside in Oxford. In the same year he became incumbent of Abbotsley. From Dec. 6, 1365, to March, 1367, he was warden of Canterbury Hall; took the degree of doctor of divinity between 1365 and 1374; and in 1368 exchanged his parish of Fillingham for that of Ludgershall, Buckinghamshire, which he held until his resignation in April, 1374, in order that he might conscientiously accept the rectorship of Lutterworth, Leicestershire, to which he had been nominated by Edward III. But in all these changes he never broke his connection with the university, for there he habitually resided, and there taught and debated. His life up to 1361 is largely conjectural and uncertain, but after that time can be traced by documents. Strangely enough, the first appearance of the learned doctor of theology as a leader was occasioned by politics and patriotism. He defended (1366) before the university of Oxford the action of Edward III. and the entire Parliament, in refusing to pay the papal claim to feudatory tribute made by Urban V.,—an action which was so emphatic, that the claim was never again made. Wiclif maintained on this occasion the political independence of the crown and the country from the Pope. It is very likely that he was a member of this Parliament, for he certainly shows an intimate acquaintance with its proceedings. On July 26, 1374, Wiclif was appointed by Edward III. a royal commissary in Bruges to conclude such a treaty with the papal nuncios on the pending points (viz., the papal reservations in filling English church offices, encroachments upon the electoral rights of cathedral chapters, and the like) as should at once secure the honor of the church, and uphold the rights of the English crown and realm. But the meeting came to nothing material; for, although the Pope abandoned for the future his claim to the reservation of English church livings, it was only on condition that the king abstained in future from conferring church dignities in the way of simple royal command: hence there was no real ecclesiastical reform accomplished. But Wiclif was not to blame for this outcome. He had faithfully striven to advance the popular rights; and his efforts had won enthusiastic recognition from the people and the king, who had called him to successive Parliaments. His very position rendered him the object of hatred to the hierarchy, whose designs he had so persistently opposed. At length they proceeded to attack him publicly. He was summoned before convocation, and appeared on Thursday, Feb. 19, 1377, in St. Paul's. He was accompanied, for protection's sake, by the Duke of Lancaster, the grand marshal of England (Lord Henry Percy), and a band of armed men. But a violent dispute between William Courtenay (bishop of London) and the duke breaking out, the meeting abruptly terminated, and Wiclif retired without being called upon to say a word. Of course this fiasco did not put an end to the hierarchical opposition. The Anglican episcopate was the prime mover in the next step, — an appeal to the Pope, Gregory XI., to put Wiclif down as a heretic. The alleged nineteen heresies were carefully stated: and so well managed was their effort, that the Pope issued (May 22, 1377) no fewer than five bulls against Wiclif. Three of them were addressed to the primate and to the bishop of London, the fourth to the king, and the last to the chancellor, and the university of Oxford. The nineteen theses in which Wiclif's heresies are stated fall into three groups: I. 1–5, concerning rights of property and inheritance, which he maintained were dependent upon God's will and grace; II. 6, 7, 17–19, concerning church property, and its rightful secularization in certain circumstances (e.g., in case the Church should fall into error); III. 8–16, concerning the power of church discipline, which he claimed belonged to every priest, and concerned only God's matters, not temporal goods and revenues. But, ere the five bulls were officially delivered, Edward III. died (June 21, 1377), and so the bull to the king became inept. With his successor, Richard II., Wiclif stood in high favor, and so no adverse action came from the king. It was not until Parliament had been prorogued (Nov. 25, 1377), that a mandate was addressed to the chancellor of Oxford, requiring him to appoint a commission to find out whether Wiclif did advocate the alleged heresies, and also to cite Wiclif within thirty days before the papal commissaries, or their delegates, in St. Paul's Church, London. But since the papal bull had required Wiclif's imprisonment, subject to further order from Rome, it is evident that the commissaries departed widely from their instructions, owing to their appreciation of the impossibility of laying violent hands upon Wiclif, the people's idol and the favorite of the university. In March, or perhaps February, 1378, Wiclif appeared before the papal commissaries, agreeable to the chancellor's citation, not, however, at St. Paul's, but at the archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth. He came alone: but it was quickly evident that he had powerful friends; for at the very beginning of the session, Sir Henry Clifford appeared from the court of the mother of the king, commanding the commissaries to abstain from passing against Wiclif any final judgment; and citizens of London forced a passage into the chapel, and loudly and threateningly took his part. The upshot of the matter was, that Wiclif was merely prohibited to teach any longer the alleged heresies. So he departed as free as he had come, and without giving any formal promise of obedience.

Shortly after this event Gregory XI. died (March 27, 1378), and the papal schism broke out. The year 1378 marked the turning-point in Wiclif's career. Hitherto he had concerned himself with matters of mixed ecclesiastical and political import; but henceforth he devoted himself exclusively to doctrinal matters, and came out as the Reformer. He welcomed the new pope (Urban VI.) because he thought him to be the long-expected leader in ecclesiastical reform. But when the French cardinals (Sept. 20, 1378) elected a rival pope (Clement VI.), and the two popes attacked one another, his eyes were opened, and he rejected both. He also began in earnest the translation of the Bible into English, and took the next decisive step by an open attack, forced upon him by his study of the Bible, against transubstantiation. The effect was immediate. The university itself turned against him. The chancellor, William of Berton, acting under the advice of a learned commission which he had appointed, prohibited the promulgation of Wiclif's doctrine in the university, on pain of suspension from every function of teaching, of the greater excommunication, and of imprisonment. So, from that time forward, Wiclif abstained from giving oral instruction upon the subject, but used the freedom left him to give his views the widest currency by means of writings, and produced his Confession, in Latin, and his tract, The Wicket, in English, which was so popular that it was much read even in the sixteenth century. Indeed, ever afterwards did he in nearly all his writings introduce in some way a statement of his views upon transubstantiation.

Beaten upon this field, the opponents of Wiclif turned themselves to the archbishop, William Courtenay, who in October, 1381, had succeeded Simon Sudbury, beheaded by the peasant revolt, June 13, 1381. Courtenay had already, while bishop of London, shown his hatred of Wiclif's doctrines, and therefore gladly availed himself of the authority of his primacy to wreck the hopes of the Wicliffites. He skilfully adopted a line of attack likely to attain his end. He first had the doctrines and principles of Wiclif and his adherents condemned by ecclesiastical authority, and then persecuted those who continued to maintain the obnoxious doctrines. The first step was easy. He summoned an assembly of ten bishops, sixteen doctors of laws, thirty doctors of theology, and four bachelors of laws, in the hall of the Dominican Monastery, Blackfriars, London, May 17, 1382, and received the expected verdict. During their session a terrific earthquake shook the city:

hence the name, "The Earthquake Council," uniformly applied to it by Wiclif, — an ill omen, in the judgment of Wiclif's party, but favorably interpreted by Courtenay as an emblem of the purification of the kingdom from false doctrine. On the ground of the finding of the council, expressed in twenty-four articles, either heretical or erroneous, of which ten relate to the Lord's Supper, — indirect testimony to the interest awakened by Wiclif's attack on the doctrine of transubstantiation, — the archbishop issued mandates to his commissary at Oxford (May 28, 1382) and to the bishop of London (May 30), in which he forbade the public proclamation of the obnoxious doctrines, and even listening to them, on pain of the greater excommunication. But the second step could not be taken without State aid; and the Commons refused to agree with the Lords in giving it, and even compelled the withdrawal of a royal ordinance, which ordered, upon certification of the bishops, the imprisonment of the itinerant Wiclif preachers and their adherents. But armed with a royal patent of June 26, 1382, the archbishop began the persecution, and with such success, that in four months he silenced the Wiclif party at the university of Oxford, and either drove the principal friends of Wiclif out of the country, or to recantation. Meanwhile Wiclif was untouched, — although deprived, in consequence of the mandate, of his offices at the university, — and pursued his quiet, busy, pastoral life at Lutterworth. It was, perhaps, Courtenay's plan, first to strip Wiclif of all his friends, and then to attack him personally. At length, on Nov. 18, 1382, he was summoned to appear before a provincial synod at Oxford; but again he was not asked to recant, nor was a sentence of condemnation passed upon him. The Parliament of that year met Nov. 19. To it Wiclif addressed a memorial upon the subject of monastic vows, the exemption of the clergy and church property, tithes and offerings, and on the Lord's Supper. The document was so cleverly drawn up, that it was sure to influence the members, and therefore increase the disinclination of the clerical party, on the score of prudence, to lay violent hands upon Wiclif, who was manifestly so intrenched in the popular regard. The council at Oxford was the last effort to molest him. For the next two years and the last of his life, he lived in Lutterworth, more or less incapacitated by the paralytic stroke of 1382, yet busily engaged with his literary work and his preaching itinerancy. In his parish-work he was assisted by his chaplain, John Horn. During this period he wrote the largest number of those short and simple English tracts, by which he spread his doctrines over all the land. He also revised his translation of the Bible, in which work he was largely aided by John Purvey. It was not earlier than 1381 that he began his attacks upon the mendicant orders, of which he had previously spoken in terms of great respect. The occasion of his doing the contrary was the position of the Mendicants as his vigorous and persistent antagonists upon the doctrine of transubstantiation. Although really unmolested, his life was always in danger, and he lived prepared for martyrdom. But on Holy Innocents' Day (Dec. 28, 1384), as he was hearing mass in his parish church, at the moment of the elevation of the host, he was stricken for a second time with paralysis, and fell speechless on the spot. As his tongue was particularly affected, he never spoke again, though conscious of the presence of his friends, and breathed his last, three days afterwards. He was buried under the choir of his church, St. Mary's, Lutterworth.

On May 4, 1415, the Council of Constance declared him a heretic, anathematized forty-five articles drawn from his writings, and ordered that his books be burnt, his bones taken up, and thrown far out of consecrated ground. For thirteen years the command rested on paper; but in 1427 Pope Martin V. laid its execution upon Bishop Fleming of Lincoln, who in the year following (1428) carried it out. His bones were taken up, burnt, and the ashes thrown into the Swift, a branch of the Avon, which runs by the foot of the hill on which Lutterworth is built.

His Preaching. — His activity as a preacher was in two directions, — in the university, where his sermons were in Latin, and followed scholastic forms and ideas; and in his Lutterworth church, where he preached in English, and in simple, direct, and vigorous fashion. He occasionally preached in London, and with such effect that the citizens were stirred up to demand the reform of some flagrant omissions of clerical duty. But the principles he not only advocated, but exemplified, remained always the same. He taught that the object of preaching was the edification of the church; the matter of preaching was the Bible itself in all its simplicity, and not, as the evil habit of the times was, stories, fables, and poems, which were pagan, and not biblical, in origin, and served only to amuse and interest. The Bible was Wiclif's standard and staple: his sermons are really saturated with it. He handles, it is true, many subjects which are not by any means biblical (e.g., the mendicant orders); but he judges them according to the Bible. But one cardinal doctrine of modern evangelical Christendom is not found in his sermons: he has not a word to say about justification by faith. The one thing about Wiclif's sermons which gives them now their great value as an indication of his inner life is their fulness of earnest godliness and Christian conscientiousness. They breathe a true zeal for God's glory, a pure love for Christ, and a sincere concern for the salvation of souls. The man who could preach as Wiclif preached could not fail to make a profound impression.

His Itinerants. — Besides being a preacher and pastor, he was organizer of an itinerancy which carried his doctrines over a wide territory. He began this latter work while in uninterrupted connection with Oxford (i.e., before 1382); and his first itinerants were university students and graduates: in short, he taught a theological seminary. These preachers were by no means intended as opponents to the parochial clergy, except as the latter grossly disgraced their office: indeed, the first itinerants were all priests; hence they were called "poor priests," and under no obligation to remain unsettled, although, as a matter of fact, they could not settle conscientiously, even if the way were open, for the three reasons given in the tract, Why Poor Priests have no Benefice, — (1) Benefices were usually obtainable only by simony, whether collated by a spiritual or temporal lord; (2) Beneficed priests were compelled to give up to their ecclesiastical superiors all that portion of their revenues in excess of their own necessities, and this was nothing less than a robbery of God's poor; (3) Unbeneficed priests were free to preach the gospel anywhere, and, when opposed by the "clergy of Antichrist," could flee without hinderance. But Wiclif also sent out lay-preachers; and this fact led him to use repeatedly the expression "evangelical" or "apostolical" men in his latest sermons, when referring to his itinerants. They were now not all priests. Oxford was the first centre of this activity, and Leicester the second. Clad in commonest clothing, bare-foot, and staff in hand, they wandered through the surrounding country, preaching as they had opportunity. They opened the Scriptures, and summoned their hearers to repent. They exhorted them to live in Christian brotherhood, peace, and beneficence. But they did not stop here. They depicted the sinful lives of too many of the clergy, and so powerfully, that the hierarchy were alarmed. How thoughtful Wiclif was for his itinerants is manifested by the many sermon outlines and tracts for their benefit found among his literary remains.

His Translation of the Bible.—Before Wiclif sent out his translation, the Psalter was the only complete book of Scripture accessible in English, although other parts had been rendered. The credit of producing the first translation which was intended for popular use is due to Wiclif. How long he was engaged upon this work is unknown. He probably began with several single books of the New Testament. As a preliminary labor may be regarded the translation of the Latin Harmony of the Gospels of Prior Clement of Lanthony, Monmouthshire, written in the second half of the twelfth century. Wiclif translated the Bible from the Vulgate, for he was ignorant of Greek. He rendered the entire New Testament into English; but, ere he had finished, Nicolas of Hereford began upon the Vulgate Old Testament, and translated as far as Baruch iii. 20, when he was compelled to desist, owing to the sentence of excommunication which had been passed upon him. From there on, another hand may be seen upon it, perhaps Wiclif's. In 1382 the entire translation was finished: copies of it, in whole or in part, were made and circulated. But immediately the important work of revision was begun by Wiclif himself and by John Purvey, who carried it on after the former's death; for it was not until 1388 that the Wicliffite version was given out in its revised and much improved form. This version marks an epoch in the development of the English language. His Bible prose is the earliest classic Middle English.

His Theology.—Of Wiclif's doctrinal system it is somewhat difficult to form a complete and fully satisfactory opinion. The principal of the as yet available sources of his theology is his Triologus or Dialogorum Libri IV., written in 1382, and printed for the first time in 1525, probably at Basel. It deviates considerably from the common scholastic form, being a dialogue between three allegorical characters,—Alithia, Pseudis, and Phrenesis. The first of the interlocutors is a staid theologian; the second, a sophist and infidel; and the third, a ripe and erudite scholar, who decides the questions. The first book treats of the doctrine of God; the second, that of the universe, especially the ideas of matter, man, angels, evil spirits, etc.; the third book contains the Christian morals; and the fourth, which occupies about one-half of the whole work, gives the author's views of the sacraments, the ecclesiastical institutions, eschatology, etc. Besides from the Triologus, some stray remarks useful for the understanding of Wiclif's doctrinal stand-point may also be gleaned from his minor treatises and popular pamphlets, and from extracts now and then published from his unprinted manuscripts, etc.

The basis of all Wiclif's teaching is his doctrine of the absolute authority of Scripture. He places the Bible infinitely higher than any other book, not only those of the more recent teachers, but also those of the ancient Fathers; yea, he places the Bible infinitely higher than any ordinance of the Roman-Catholic Church. The evidence of this absolute authority is the dignity of Christ as the God-man, and the reason why the Bible is not held in due esteem is owing to the lack of true faith in Christ; for, if we trusted fully in the Lord Christ, that faith would not fail to bring forth in our heart a firm conviction of the authority of the Bible. All other writings, even those of Augustine, are trustworthy only so far as they are founded in Holy Writ: all other truth, except that which depends upon simple observation, can be accepted only so far as it is derived from the Bible. "Even though there were a hundred popes, and all the monks were transformed into cardinals, in matters of faith their opinions would be of no account, unless they were founded on Scripture" (Triol., iv. c. 7). From this maxim sprung the enthusiasm and the energy which produced the first English translation of the Bible.

But Wiclif's doctrine of God is a piece of scholasticism. Instead of planting himself on Scripture, or on the individual Christian self-consciousness, he institutes dialectical processes, develops ideas, defines notions, etc. More closely characterized, his scholasticism is realism. The infinite is to him not an idea, but a reality. He recoils from the conceptions of God as a mere universale, or a mere individuale, both of which sprung from the principle of nominalism. To him, God is the absolute cause, the mysterious source of all. The doctrine of the Trinity he develops after Augustine and Anselm, without adding any thing of his own, and following closely the method of the schoolmen. But already in his christology a curious contest arises between scholastic dialectics, in which he was trained, and an instinctive craving for a biblico-ethical construction of the idea of the God-man. On the one side he cannot free himself from the common questions, categories, definitions, etc., of the scholastic christology. on the other side he sees very well the hollowness and sterility of the whole proceeding. His great problem is to represent the incarnation from a moral point of view. He loves to set forth Christ as the centre of humanity, and he is inexhaustible in varying the expression of that truth by means of the most manifold ideas and figurative illustrations.

In his cosmology, Wiclif broke through the bounds of scholasticism, mixing up the metaphysical researches concerning the materia prima with various anatomical and psychological questions concerning the structure of the brain, the action of the senses, etc. Of greatest interest is his theological anthropology. Hereditary sin he considers as depending on some moral, and not on any physical condition. He denies that the state of sinfulness is propagated from generation to generation through the seed; for the kernel of human nature is the spirit. To this aspect of anthropology corresponds his general view of evil. Who is the originator of evil? Does it come from God? No; for evil has by itself no positive existence: it is only a defectus, a non-ens, a negation of the divine. The single act of sin is certainly a reality, and as certainly an evil, but only so far as it refers to the person who committed it. So far as it enters into the web and woof of objective reality, it ceases to be an evil, and is by God turned into a mediate or secondary good: it becomes a means to an end, something willed by God. Sin, so far as it is a reality, is an act of the will; and evil results from the freedom of the will, which is misused, and turned into a denial of God; in which latter point Wiclif differs from his older contemporary, Thomas of Bradwardine, who, in his rejection of the reality of evil, ended with rejecting the freedom of the human will (see G. Lechler: De Thoma Bradwardino, Leipzig, 1862).

In his doctrine of the church, Wiclif became almost wholly a Protestant. The prevalent ecclesiastical idea of the church as the communion of the clergy, to the exclusion of all non-clergy, he expressly rejected. The church he defines as the communion of the elect; and as he carries back conversion, salvation, and membership of the church, to the election of grace (that is, to the eternal and free counsel of God in Christ), he refutes the assumption, which up till that time was universal, that participation in salvation, and the hope of heaven, were conditioned exclusively by a man's connection with the official church, and were dependent entirely on the mediation of the priesthood. His idea of the church, sharply distinguishing between the visible and the invisible church, involves the recognition of the free and immediate access of believers to the grace of God in Christ: in other words, of the general priesthood of believers. The true church is to him invisible, while the visible church is made up of elect and hypocrites. But he acknowledges that it is impossible to distinguish sharply between the true and the false members of the church; and he altogether denies that anybody has a right either to canonize or to condemn. The worldliness of the visible church he is very well aware of; and the whole hierarchical organization, from the doorkeeper (ostiarus) to the Pope, he ascribes to the avarice and pride which early took possession of the heart of the Christian clergy, driving out the humility and meekness which were their only true virtues.

Of the whole doctrinal system, however, of mediæval Romanism, there is no part which Wiclif has attacked with greater energy than the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. In a threefold way this institution of Christ had been corrupted,—by the doctrine of transubstantiation, by the withholding of the cup from the laity, and by the doctrine of the mass. Luther attacked the last point, Hus the second, and Wiclif the first; and he often repeated, that, of all the heresies which had ever crept into the church, none was at once so vicious, and so cunningly covered, as that of transubstantiation. He seems not to have paid any particular attention to this doctrine until about 1351; but from that time he was steadily occupied with it, in sermons, disputations, and written publications, in the form both of Latin treatises for the learned world, and English pamphlets for the common people. His criticism is sharp and penetrating, though it cannot be denied that his own positive view is somewhat vague,—as far from Zwingli's conception of a merely symbolical presence of Christ in the elements as from Luther's conception of a real presence. In his Confessio he defines the presence of Christ in the bread and wine of the sacrament as simul veritas et figura. The definition is certainly somewhat vague. For the criticism, however, of the absurdities of the Roman-Catholic Church it proved amply sufficient.

His Character.—His contemporaries found his wonderful learning and intellectual ability most admirable. It was this which gave him such commanding influence in the university. His was a many-sided mind; and his sermons and theological treatises contain illustrations borrowed from all the sciences of his time. He was eminently gifted with the critical spirit, and so, although he accepted many fictions as truths, he yet subjected the doctrines, ordinances, and usages of the church to rigid scrutiny, and brought them to the test of the Bible. With him the critical genius was not merely an efflux of scientific power and independence, but also a fruit of moral sentiment and of Christian character. He cared very little in what form his ideas were expressed, so long as they were understood. Hence his style is inartistic, and often very bad. But by way of compensation he always communicates his whole personality, undissembled, true, and full. He was a man of intellect, not of feeling; yet everywhere we recognize the moral pathos, the holy earnestness, which comes from deep convictions. Curiously, he oftentimes burst out into indignant or horror-stricken denunciation while carrying on a dialectical discussion: an outburst of triumphal joy is found in the very middle of a disputation. He is always himself, conscious of his own perfect integrity, and fearless in the expression of his views. He used other weapons than sober reasoning: wit, humor, irony, and sarcasm are the edged-tools he handles, especially against the monks. But his object is always to defend the truth of Christ; and it was from glowing zeal for the cause of God, sincere love to the souls of men, upright conscientiousness before God, and heartfelt longing for the reformation of the church, that he labored so abundantly and assiduously.

His Place in History.—He was the first evangelical Reformer. As such, a development can be distinctly marked in him. He began as an ecclesiastico-political worker, sat in Parliament, and earnestly advocated the independence of the English Church and State of the dictation of the curia, the disruption of monasteries, and the removal of the crying evils of simony and licen-tiousness. But from 1378 he put religious motives in the front, and attacked the doctrines of the church, particularly that of transubstantiation. He maintained, on the other hand, with all his soul, the doctrines of Christ as the only Mediator, Saviour, and Leader, and the church as the whole body of the elect. Wiclif was the embodiment of the reform movement of preceding centuries, and the first important personality among the Reformers.

In 1880 the fifth centennial of Wiclif's translation of the Bible was celebrated by the Bible societies of English-speaking lands, especially by the American Bible Society in New-York City, Dec. 2, 1880; on which occasion Dr. Storrs delivered the brilliant oration mentioned below.

LIT. — Lechler gives the completest list of Wiclif's writings (vol. ii. 337-339). The small number printed has long been considered a disgrace. But in 1883 the Wyclif Society, organized in 1882, began the publication of his Latin works, up to that time in manuscript. The following list probably embraces nearly all that have at any time appeared: Dialogorum libri quatuor, Basel, 1525; Wycliffes Wycht, Norenburch, 1546 (later eds., 1546, Oxford, 1612, 1828); The true cople of a prolog written about two c years past by John Wycliffe, London, 1550; Two short treatises against the orders of the Begging Friars (edited, with glossary, by Thomas James, D.D.), Oxford, 1608; Last Age of the Church, Dublin, 1810; Apology for Lollard Doctrine, London, 1812, and Three Treatises, Of the Church and her Members, Of the Apostasy of the Church, Of Anti-Christ and his Mynece, 1851 (the above three volumes were edited by J. H. Todd, D.D.; the first volume and the last treatise have been pronounced spurious); Tracts and Treatises, with Selections and Translations from his Latin Works (edited for the Wycliffe Society by R. Vaughan, D.D.), London, 1845; Tractatus de officio pastoralis, Leipzig, 1863, Dialogus, and Supplementum Dialogi sive de dotatione ecclesie, Oxford, 1869 (all three edited by Lechler); Select English Works (edited by T. Arnold), Oxford, 1871, 3 vols.; English Works of Wyclif hitherto unprinted (edited by F. D. Matthew, for the Early English Text Society), London, 1879; De Christo et suo adversario Antichristo, Ein polemischer Tractat Johann Wiclifs zum ersten Male herausgegeben (edited by Dr. R. Buddensieg), Gotha, 1880, pp. 60; Polemical Works (edited by Buddensieg), London, 1883, 2 vols. Some of his pieces were printed in vol. vii. of British Reformers. Wiclif's translation of the Bible was first edited in a scholarly and satisfactory manner by Rev. Josiah Forshall and Sir Frederick Madden, Oxford, 1850, 4 vols. The New Testament portion was separately printed, with introduction and glossary by W. W. Skeat, Cambridge, 1879; and Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon, in 1881, with the same apparatus from this editor.

Wiclif's biography has been written by JOHN LEWIS (Oxford, 1719; new ed. with additions, 1820), ROBERT VAUGHAN (London, 1828, 2 vols.; 2d ed., 1831; new ed., under title John de Wycliffe, a Monograph, 1853), CHARLES WEBB LE BAS (1833), and by GOTTHARD VICTOR LECHLER: Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgeschichte der Reformation, Leipzig, 1873, 2 vols. (vol. i. translated, with important additional notes, by Principa Lorimer: John Wiclif and his English Precursors, London, 1878, 2 vols.; in 1 vol., 1881). This biography supersedes all the others. SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

WIDOWS, Hebrew. Besides the general law against their hard treatment (Exod. xxii. 22-24), there was special legislation respecting them. 1. Their rights should always be respected (Deut. x. 18, xxvii. 19); nor should their clothing or cattle be pledged (Deut. xxiv. 17), nor their children be sold for debt (2 Kings iv. 1; Job xxiv. 9). According to Maimonides (Synedr. 21, 6), their cases must be tried next after those of orphans. 2. They must be invited to the feasts accompanying sacrifices and tithe offerings (Deut. xiv. 29, xvi. 11, 14, xxvi. 12 sq.). Childless priest-widows living in their fathers' houses had right to the priests' meat (Lev. xxii. 13). In later times the rich sent them presents of wine. In the Maccabean time they were allowed to deposit their property in the temple treasury (2 Macc. iii. 10). 3. Gleanings were left for them (Deut. xxiv. 19 sq.), and they shared in the battle spoils (2 Macc. viii. 28, 30). Their re-marriage was contemplated, but the high priest was forbidden to marry one (Lev. xxi. 14). Only on the childless widow did the Levirate law operate (Deut. xxv. 5; see art. LEVIRATE). The Jewish doctors greatly facilitated the re-marriage of widows, only stipulating that they must not marry inside of ninety days of their husbands demise. If they chose to remain in the house of their father-in-law, they must be supported, and receive their dowry. But if they went to their fathers' home they forfeited their right to support more than was absolutely necessary; and neither they nor the heirs could lay claim to their dowry until the expiration of twenty-five years and then only on their oath that they had not in that time derived any benefit from it. In order to get subsistence, they were allowed to sell the property of their husbands, both real and personal. In case a man left widows, the first wife had prior claims. Betrothed women whose prospective husbands died were considered as widows and therefore high priests could not marry them. In spite of these laws and regulations, complaint of the unjust treatment of widows were frequent (Isa. i. 17, 23, x. 2; Jer. xxii. 3; Ezek. xxii. 7 Mal. iii. 5; Matt. xxiii. 14).

WIGAND, Johann, b. at Mansfeld in 1523; d. a Jena, Oct. 21, 1587. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed pastor of his native city in 1546, superintendent of Magdeburg in 1553, professor of theology at Jena in 1560 (from which position he was discharged the next year) superintendent of Wismar in 1562, and again professor at Jena in 1569. He was an Ultra-Lutheran, an ardent champion of Flacius, an took part with great vehemence in all the controversies of the time, persecuting with blind fanaticism any one who differed from him in opinions. At last he fell out even with his own master, Flacius, with whom he at one time labored for the establishment of a Lutheran popedom. His autobiography in Sammlung von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen (Leipzig, 1738) gives a list of his very numerous writings, of which none, however, have any scientific value. See also SCHLÜSSELBURG: De vita J. W., Franc., 1591. NEUDECKER.

WIGBERT, St., the first abbot of Fritzlar; d. 747; was a native of England, and educated in the monasteries of Winbrun and Glaston. In 731 he went to Germany on the invitation of Boniface, and settled at Fritzlar as abbot of the newly founded monastery, and director of the school, which he brought to a very flourishing condition. His life, written by Servatus Lupus, is found in MABILLON: Act. Bened., iii. 1. See also Miracula S. Wigberti, in PERTZ: Mon. Hist. Ger., vi.

WIGGLESWORTH, Michael, b. Oct. 28, 1631, probably in Yorkshire; d. at Malden, Mass., June 10, 1705; was brought to New England, 1638; graduated at Harvard, 1651; was tutor there a while, and minister or "teacher" at Malden from 1656. He published in 1661 or 1662 his remarkable Day of Doom, a poem which preserves, as in amber, the ideas of his time and school. It was very popular, reaching a sixth edition, 1715, and others since. That printed in New York, 1867, has amused, if not edified, modern readers. He also wrote Meat out of the Ewer, 1669. F. M. BIRD.

WIGHTMAN, William May, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; was born in Charleston, S.C., Jan. 8, 1808; and died in the same city, Feb. 15, 1882. He professed religion at the age of sixteen, under the preaching of Rev. James O. Andrew, afterwards bishop. He graduated at Charleston College in 1827, and the following year joined the South-Carolina Conference. He gave early promise of future usefulness and eminence in the ministry; and, after filling many important stations in his conference, he was appointed in 1831 agent for Randolph-Macon College in Virginia; which office he held for three years. He then became professor of English literature in this institution. In 1839 he returned to South Carolina, and became presiding elder of the Cokesbury District. At the General Conference of 1840 he was elected editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, and continued to serve the church in this capacity for fourteen years. He was a member of every general conference from 1840 till his elevation to the episcopacy. In 1854 he became president of Wofford College, Spartanburg, S.C., where he remained until 1859, when he became chancellor of the Southern University at Greensborough, Ala. This position he filled with great efficiency and acceptability until 1866, when he was elected to the episcopacy. He then returned to Charleston, where he continued to reside until he died. He was through life a zealous advocate for the evangelization and elevation of the colored race. He was possessed at one time of considerable property, which he always used with judicious and conscientious liberality. He was a man of uncommon neatness in apparel, of polished and courteous manners, a fervid, eloquent, and ornate speaker, and an easy and fluent writer. Besides many contributions of a high character to the periodical press, and many public addresses and sermons, he published a Life of Bishop Capers (Nashville, 1858), which is a most worthy contribution to the religious biography of the church. WILBERFORCE, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of Winchester, son of the eminent philanthropist William Wilberforce; b. at Clapham, near London, Sept. 7, 1805; killed by a fall from his horse, near Dorking, July 19, 1873. He was graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1826; curate of Checkendon, Berkshire, 1828-30; rector of Brightstone, Isle of Wight, 1830-39; of Alverstoke, Hampshire, 1839; archdeacon of Surry, 1840; and canon of Winchester Cathedral. In 1844 he was appointed sub-almoner to the queen, and in 1845 dean of Westminster, and, later in same year, bishop of Oxford. In 1869 he was transferred to the see of Winchester. As bishop of Oxford he made his mark. He was a man of broad views, genial wit, and ready eloquence, in which latter respect he led all the bishops. He delighted in out-door life. He was a leader of the High-Church party, but in point of doctrine was an evangelical. Besides his work upon his father's life referred to below, he left nothing of importance. See his Life by ASHWELL and WILBERFORCE, London, 1881-82, 3 vols.; abridged edition, New York, 1883, 1 vol.

WILBERFORCE, William, the English philanthropist; b. at Hull, Aug. 24, 1759; d. in London, Monday, July 29, 1833. By the death of his father he came at ten years of age into the family of his uncle, whose very pious wife was a great admirer of Whitefield; and although permitted by his grandfather (who feared his becoming a Methodist) to be only two years in his uncle's family, his religious views received a coloring which they permanently retained, and the main-spring of his philanthropy was his piety. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; left the university at twenty-one (1780), and immediately entered Parliament, where he continuously sat as a member of the House of Commons until 1825, when his advanced years obliged him to retire. Being rich, witty, and fond of society, he at first mingled in the world of fashion. But in 1781, and again in 1785, he travelled on the Continent with Isaac Milner (see art.), his former teacher at Hull; and Milner's serious conversation upon religion, little as his conduct was regulated by it, turned Wilberforce to serious thought. His latent piety was aroused. The two read together Doddridge's Rise and Progress, and studied the New Testament in the original. The energies of Wilberforce's soul were set in a new direction. He was converted (1785), and became the Wesley of the upper circles of English society, and the leader of the evangelical party in the English Church. In 1787 he founded a "society for the reformation of manners," and the same year set out upon that great mission which has immortalized him,—the abolition of slavery in the English domains. Henceforth his life was devoted to this cause. His attention had been drawn to the subject in childhood, and in his fifteenth year he wrote an essay upon it; but his efforts to secure the realization of his youthful dreams date from his twenty-eighth year. The slaveholders quickly perceived the ability and strength of their antagonist, who was determined to fight until the victory was gained. Year after year the struggle went on. At last, after twenty years of tireless exertion, the bill for the abolition of the slave-trade was introduced in the House of Lords by Lord Grenville; passed Feb. 4, 1806; went to the House of Commons, and passed its first reading by a vote of 283 to 16, Feb. 23, and finally, March 23, 1807. It received the royal assent March 25; and after Jan. 1, 1808, slave-trading was illegal. In the carrying-out of this measure Wilberforce was not, of course, unaided. Burke, Pitt, Fox, the Quakers, and especially Thomas Clarkson, gave him powerful support. But Wilberforce was the leader of the abolitionists, and to him the major part of the credit is due. In the prosecution of his mission he met with repeated disappointments; and his scheme, along with other abolitionists, to demonstrate the fitness of the negro race for civilization by the organization of the Sierra Leone Company (1791), for the extension of lawful commerce in Africa, and the promotion of the useful arts among the negroes, lamentably failed. The abolition of the slave-trade legally accomplished, Wilberforce turned his attention to the enforcement of the law and the emancipation of the slave himself. For the rest of his life he keenly watched the interests of the negro race, and toiled for the abolition of slavery in every land. Three days before his death he had the satisfaction of learning that slavery itself was abolished.

The decided religious convictions of this remarkable man find their expression in his book, A Practical View of the Prevailing Religious System of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country Contrasted with Real Christianity, London, 1797. Five editions (7,500 copies) were sold in its first half-year; and it has been translated into French, German, Italian, Spanish, and Dutch. It is impossible to overestimate its influence in awakening a warm, practical, determined religious life, and in stemming the tide of infidelity and indifferentism, especially in the upper classes of England. The book consists of seven chapters, treating two questions: first, whether morality without belief can be wholesome and sufficient; second, whether Christianity satisfactorily meets all the demands of life. But not only by this book did he proclaim his Christianity. In 1801, with a few friends, he established The Christian Observer, a religious newspaper, and in 1804 took a prominent part in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was ever a champion of the Church of England; but, far from being partisan, he contended with equal warmth for the rights of dissenters and Roman Catholics. The great influence was due to his character, although his gifts were of a high order. He was one of the foremost public speakers, ever self-contained and dignified. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. One son, Samuel, became bishop of Oxford and Winchester successively; but three others entered the Roman-Catholic Church.

The chief sources to the study of his life are his Life by his sons Robert Isaac and Samuel, Lond., 1838, 5 vols., and his Correspondence, edited by the same, 1810, 2 vols. [most accessible in the abridged Life of William Wilberforce, by SAMUEL WILBERFORCE, London, 1868, 1 vol.]. WILBRORD, or WILLIBROD, the apostle of the Frisians; b. in Northumbria about 657; d. in the monastery of Epternach, near Treves, 730. He came to Friesland towards the close of the seventh century; settled at Utrecht, and preached with success among the wild Pagan inhabitants of the country, powerfully supported, however, by the victories of Pepin and Charles Martel. He also visited the Danish Frisians settled on the western coast of Sleswick. See BEDE: Hist. Eccl., v.; and MABILLON: Ann. Ord. S. B. lib. xviii.

WILDERNESS. The Bible word means, not a mere waste, but rather a tract of country, plain or mountainous, which is not under cultivation, although it may be capable of it, and actually afford rich pasturage. Several such wildernesses are mentioned in the Bible. I. Chief in importance is the "Wilderness of Sinai" (see SINAI). II. "Wilderness of Moab" (Deut. ii. 8), the east boundary of the territory Israel conquered. III. "Wilderness of Beersheba" (Gen. xxi. 14), upon the extreme south-west border. IV. The largest in Palestine is the "Wilderness of Judah," which comprehends the easterly and southerly slopes of the mountain of Judah, and is bounded on the north by the "Wilderness of Jericho" (between the north end of the Dead Sea and Jerusalem), on the east by the Dead Sea, on the west by the mountains of Judah, and on the south runs out into the "Wilderness of Zin" (Josh. xv. 1, 3) and of "Edom" (2 Kings iii. 8), between the mountains of Seir and the southern point of the Dead Sea. Into this wilderness David fled from Saul. As component parts of it are mentioned the wilderness of (a) "Engedi" (1 Sam. xxiv. 1), (b) "Maon" (1 Sam. xxiii. 24 seq.), (c) "Ziph" (1 Sam. xxiii. 14), (d) "Tekoa" (2 Chron. xx. 20), (e) "Jeruel" (2 Chron. xx. 16). V. The northern continuation of the Wilderness of Judah is "the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho throughout Mount Bethel" (Josh. xvi. 1), i.e., the whole stretch along the western slopes of the mountains of Judah, from the neighborhood of Jericho north to Bethel. Into this wilderness fled David from Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 23), and so did Zedekiah on the capture of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 4). It was the scene of our Lord's temptation (Matt. iv. 1), and there he laid the parable of the Good Samaritan (Luke x. 30). Tradition points out the exact spot of Satan's exhibition to our Lord of "all the kingdoms of the world," the so-called Mount Quarantana (Jebel Kereutel), and also the exact location of the inn to which the good Samaritan brought the wounded Jew. In the "Wilderness by Jordan" (Mark i. 4) John preached, and the place of Christ's baptism is pointed out to-day. Tradition, however, puts the Wilderness of John six miles south-west of Jerusalem; but here is no wilderness at all. VI. "Wilderness of Beth-aven," a northerly part of the Wilderness of Jericho (Josh. xviii. 12). VII. "Wilderness of Gibeon" east of Gibeon. VIII. "Wilderness of Dothan" (Gen. xxxvii. 22).

ARNOLD.

WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING. The so-called forty-two journeys of the Israelites from Egypt to Canaan are enumerated in Num. xxxiii. On leaving Egypt they bent their steps to Sinai (see EXODUS, SINAI). The general direction was south-east along the Gulf of Suez, until the Wady Feiran was struck, which was followed to Mount Sinai. The stations are not yet fully and unanimously identified. The first was probably Ayûn Musa ("the wells of Moses"), seven to eight miles from the Gulf of Suez, where the triumphal song of Moses was sung. Thence the host went three days' journey through the Wilderness of Shur ("fort-wall," derived, according to E. H. Palmer, from the long wall-like range which is the feature of this part of the wilderness), and came to Marah ("bitterness"), generally identified with Ain Hawarah ("fountain of destruction;" Palmer spells it Hawwarah, and interprets it "a small pool"). Here the water was miraculously sweetened (Exod. xv. 25). Thence they journeyed to Elim ("trees"), identified either with Wady Ghurundal or Wady Useit. The next station was upon the shore of the Red Sea (Num. xxxiii. 10), probably in the beautiful Wady Taiyibeh; and thence they "encamped in the Wilderness of Sin," now the Plain of El-Markha. It extends twenty-five miles along the east shore of the Red Sea, from Wady Taiyibeh to Wady Feiran. There the Israelites were first fed with manna and quails (Exod. xvi.). Entering the Wady Feiran, they came, by way of Dophkah and Alush, to Rephidim, usually located in this wady, at the base of Serbal, although some would put it in Wady es-Sheikh. At Rephidim there was "no water for the people to drink;" so Moses was instructed to get water by smiting a rock in Horeb (Exod. xvii.). From Rephidim they came to Sinai (see art.).

It was the original expectation of Moses to lead the Israelites directly out of Egypt into the Promised Land. But the enormous host, cumbered with flocks and herds, could not travel rapidly; and it was in the third month after leaving Egypt that they arrived at Sinai. By Sinai they tarried until the twentieth day of the second month in the second year, when the cloud above the tabernacle lifted, and went ahead of them. They came, in fourteen stations, to Kadesh (see art.), and sent out the spies, whose almost unanimous report as to the prowess of the inhabitants of the Promised Land so disheartened the people, that they rebelled against the Lord's leadership, and in punishment the murmurers were condemned to die in the wilderness.

For some thirty-eight years were the Israelites scattered upon the wilderness, the present Badiet et Tih, the great central limestone plateau between the granite region of Sinai on the south, the sandy desert on the north, and the valley of the Arabah on the east. There are abundant evidences that the country was formerly much more fertile than at present. The host probably lived a nomad life, like the present Bedouin, staying for a while in a place, and then going elsewhere, according as they could find pasture for their flocks. God's object was finally accomplished: the murmurers had all died, and their children were strong for battle. They gathered at Kadesh, whence they had separated so many years before. There Moses and Aaron offended, and were told that they should not enter the Promised Land (Num. xx. 12). The succeeding events may be thus summarized: application for passage through Edom was refused; Aaron died upon Mount Hor; the Israelites suffering from the plague of serpents were healed by the sight of the brazen serpent; Sihon, king of the Amorites, and Og, king of Bashan, were overcome; Balak, king of Moab, in vain used enchantments against Israel, but instead, heard from Balaam the glorious future of that people; the census of Israel was taken on the plains of Moab; the Midianites were slaughtered and spoiled; the Reubenites and Gadites received their inheritance on the east side of Jordan; finally, the host made their last journey prior to the Conquest, and reached the east shore of the Jordan. Moses delivered his farewell address on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year, and then ascended Mount Nebo, and died. Thus ended the Wandering. The Israelites were now on the borders of the Promised Land. See SMITH: Dictionary of the Bible, s.v. "Wilderness of the Wandering;" E. H. PALMER: Desert of the Exodus; GEIKIE: Hours with the Bible, vol. ii., chaps. vii., viii., xi., xii.

WILFRID, Bishop of York, b. in Northumbria, 634; d. at York, Oct. 12, 709. He was educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne, but having found out that the way to virtue taught by the Scotch monks was not the perfect one, he set out for Rome, where he arrived in 654. After his return from Rome, he was, by King Aswy of Northumbria, appointed tutor to his son Alchfred, 664; and having, at the synod of Strene-shale (Whitby in Yorkshire), persuaded the king and the clergy that the Roman computation of Easter, and the Roman shape of the tonsure, were the only right ones, he received the episcopal see of York as a reward (665), and held it for forty years. He was one of the most prominent champions of the Church of Rome in England. Several times he was deposed or expelled from his see by the kings; and each time he repaired to Rome, where he was sure to find support. On one of his journeys to Rome he suffered shipwreck on the Frisian coast, and began that missionary work among them which afterwards was so successfully continued by Wilbrord. See HEDDIUS: Vita Wilfridi; and BEDE: Hist. Eccl., i., iii.-v. THEODOR CHRISTLIEB.

WILL, The. A theme of endless debate, and one respecting which there is, apparently, an irreconcilable difference of opinion. It illustrates better than almost any other subject the close relation subsisting between philosophy and theology; for it belongs to both departments, though it would be better if the psychological and theological aspects of this question were more sharply distinguished than is sometimes done. Difficult as the problem of the will confessedly is, there can be no doubt that much of the confusion that exists regarding it arises from a want of precision in the use of terms. It is important that the nature of the problem should be understood, however impossible it may be to find a satisfactory solution of it.

I. NATURE OF THE WILL. — Psychologists of a former day usually distributed mental phenomena under two heads, — understanding and will. In this way the moral and active powers, the desires and affections, as well as the volitions, came under the latter designation. To say that the will was in bondage was only saying that a man's desires and affections are not determined by his volitions. So understood, few would deny the bondage of the will. For whatever power there may be to control appetite, or restrain desire, no one claims that a man may have or not have an appetite or desire at his pleasure. It is common now to distribute the phenomena of the mind under a triple division, — intellect, feeling, will. According to this classification, the emotions are treated separately, and are not embraced in discussions pertaining to the will. Yet even here there is a wider and a narrower sense of the word 'will'; for, as the third term of this triple division, it stands for both desire and volition. Locke's distinction between these two forms of conation is a good one, and the attempt of Edwards to overthrow it was not successful. There is a clear difference between a desire to act that may be vague, spontaneous, and motiveless, and a volition or determination to act that is direct, definite, and deliberate. Indeed, the two may be opposed to each other, as when we so often see desire struggling in the strong grip of volition.

It should be understood, that, when the will is spoken of under the limitations of the freewill controversy, reference is made to volitions, and not to desires. It is not easy, however, to substitute 'volitions for 'will at all times; for it is convenient to speak of the will abstractly as the power of choice, in distinction from volitions as the concrete manifestations of choice. But, when the word 'will' is so used, care must be taken not to hypostatize the will, — not to conceive of it as something different from the man, or of the man as divided into three parts, of which the will is one. The will means the man willing; just as the intellect means the man knowing. It must be remembered, moreover, that no mental state belongs exclusively to any one of these three divisions just referred to. An act of will is likewise an act of the intellect. An act of will may be also very closely related to an emotion. So closely related, in fact, are the feelings and the will, that Bain's attempt to explain the genesis of the will is in some respects the most plausible defence of empiricism in print. At the other extreme, but still illustrating the close relation between intellect, feeling, and will, stand those who hold, with Schopenhauer, that the will is the præius of all mental phenomena. We cannot stop to inquire whether the will begat the emotions, or whether the emotions begat the will, or whether (though this is what we believe) intellect, feeling, and will are co-ordinate elements in man's nature, there being no right of priority in favor of either the first, second, or third. But it is evident that the problem of the will occupies to-day, and must continue to occupy, a large place in religious philosophy. It is not necessary to hold, on the one hand, that will is generated out of emotion, or, on the other, that all objective reality is the manifestation of the causal activity of will in order to see that the problem of the will is one that concerns matters of far more importance than the doctrinal differences of Calvinists and Arminians. For however much men may differ in regard to the questions referred to above, it, nevertheless, seems to be true: (1) That though there can be no will without intelligence, the manifestation of will is the first sign of intelligence — purposive action is not reflex action; (2) That the will, both in man and in the brutes, is the great barrier to automatism; (3) That physical determinism cannot explain the phenomena of the will, and that in the consciousness of power revealed to us in the exercise of will we have a type of causation to which physical causes furnish no analogy, if, indeed, physical causes be, in the true sense of the word, causes at all.

II. FREEDOM OF THE WILL. — It is impossible in the short space allowed for this article to enter fully into the history of the freewill controversy. It holds such an important place, however, both in philosophy and theology, that some notice must be taken of those who have been the most conspicuous participators in it. Some knowledge of the history of the controversy may greatly help in the consideration of the particular points which it involved.

1. History of the Freewill Controversy. — At first this was altogether a theological question. It was not treated metaphysically. Sharp distinctions between ability and liberty were not known. The question was not, How are individual volitions explained? but, How has sin affected man's ability to do what God commands? Tertullian distinguishes between the will before and the will after the fall. Augustine does the same thing, and says that by the fall Adam lost himself and his freewill. In opposition to Pelagius, he taught, that since the fall man is totally depraved, that he can do no spiritual good, and that efficacious grace is a sovereign gift of God. This is what he meant by denying freewill. This is what Luther meant in his controversy with Erasmus, what Calvin meant in his controversy with Pighius, what the Reformers preached in opposition to the Council of Trent. This, too, is the Calvinistic position in opposition to Arminianism. Total depravity, inability, efficacious grace, — these doctrines are closely related; and they stand opposed to Pelagian or semi-Pelagian error. But the servitude of the will, which Augustinian theologians have always contended for on scriptural grounds, must be distinguished from the doctrine of philosophical necessity that was advocated in the period that follows the one of which we have been speaking.

In the next period the discussion assumed a philosophical form; Hobbes, Collins, Priestley, and Leibnitz defending the necessitarian, while Price and Clarke advocated the libertarian position. Hobbes anticipated Edwards in resolving the doctrine of the self-determination of the will into an infinite series of choices, where the freedom in each case was conditioned upon an antecedent choice. Leibnitz, in his doctrine of the sufficient reason, furnished the argument that has been made use of ever since in support of determinism.

And it is safe to say that the argument has not advanced much beyond the position it occupied when Clarke urged on the one hand the self-determining power of the will, and Hobbes, on the other hand, claimed that volitions, like all other events, come under the law of causality. Spinoza was a determinist, of course. Descartes argues against Hobbes, but admits all that a determinist could ask. So does Locke, whose discussion of this subject is admirably clear and discriminating.

Jonathan Edwards stands apart and above all others in the discussion of this problem. He is the first in a long succession of able men in America who have dealt with this and kindred anthropological questions according to a metaphysico-theological method, and who have contributed a most important chapter to the history of opinion. The treatise on The Will was intended as a polemic against Arminianism. It has been criticised. A library of literature has grown up around it in defence of, or in opposition to, its teaching. Its faults have been conceded even by those who, nevertheless, accept its main positions. But it has never been refuted. The libertarian doctrine is now taught by appealing to consciousness, by denying that causation reigns in the empire of the will, and by affirming, as Whedon does, that the Ego can "project volitions" without any reason whatever: but the "self-determining power of the will" has not come back from the trip up the infinite series whither Edwards sent it; and the "liberty of indifference," Calderwood tells us, has been "laid upon the shelf." Edwards holds, that the will is determined by the strongest motive, and the strongest motive is the greatest apparent good. His arguments are, for the most part, philosophical; but the doctrine advocated in his treatise follows also, in his judgment, from the divine foreknowledge. Here he is wrong; for while foreknowledge may insure the certain futurity of a volition, it does not determine the question how it shall be brought about. It would have been better had he followed Locke's example, and, refusing to consider "consequences," confined himself to the psychological study of the problem.

The Edwardean doctrine of the will, besides meeting with opposition at the hands of Tappan, Hazard, Upham, Bledsoe, and Whedon, who have all written specially upon the subject, has been strongly objected to by the Scottish philosophers, Reid, Stuart, and Sir William Hamilton. Empirical philosophers are naturally determinists, so are all those who deny the separate personal existence of the individual self. Determinism follows as naturally from the scheme of Hegel as from that of Comte. Kant postulated freedom under the practical reason, when he could not find it by means of the speculative reason. Sir William Hamilton, following the suggestions of Kant's antinomies, found freedom and necessity both inconceivable, but believed in freedom, since, being contradictories, one or the other must be true. This is one form of his doctrine of the conditioned. And a great many who do not follow Kant or Hamilton are yet compelled to take an agnostic position regarding the whole matter, believing that there is no answer to the question, Why this rather than that volition? but believing, nevertheless, that they are free, and convinced beyond all peradventure that the reign of physical determinism would be the blight of humanity.

2. Points in the Freewill Controversy. — If it were asked what is meant by saying that a man is free, the reply would be, 'He can do as he wills.' Will being the norm of freedom, there seems to be something incongruous in the inquiry whether the will is free. How can we predicate freedom of the will when our only idea of freedom is through the will? How can will be measure and measured at the same time? It would not settle the freewill controversy to discontinue the use of the word 'free' in connection with the will, but it would make it capable of more intelligible statement. If, however, it must be used, let it be said that the man is free in willing. But then what does this mean? 'I will.' That is a simple psychological fact. I at pleasure determine a certain mental state which is attended with a certain expenditure of energy. The mental state is a volition: the muscular change is action. What is meant by calling this volition a free volition? Does it mean that nothing outside of me forced it upon me? that it is free, inasmuch as it is my act? Then we all believe in freewill. To this fact, that I am self-determined, that I am the cause of my volitions, consciousness bears witness; and in this sense the freedom of the will is irrespective altogether of the relation of the volitions to antecedent mental states. But it is commonly maintained, that, in order to believe in freewill, one must hold a particular view of the relation of a given volition to the past. This, however, must not be conceded. The difference among men regarding the will relates to the question how a given volition came to pass, and not to the question whether the will is free. That the problem may be understood, let us take the case of a single volition. When the question arises, What is the cause of a given mental state? there is no doubt that I am the cause; I am the agent, the efficient cause. But while the volition is accounted for by saying, "I am the cause of it," the question also arises, Why did I choose this rather than that? why did I walk east rather than west? It is true that the volition is an effect produced by me, but is it not also an effect produced in me? That I am an agent explains the coming about of a volition, but how does it happen to be such a volition? If this question could be answered, the problem of the will would be solved. There are two generic answers to this question, and it seems impossible that there should be a third. Some hold that each volition is unconditioned by antecedents, and in this sense, before it comes into existence, is contingent. Others hold that each volition was antecedently determined, and therefore certain. Indeterminism and determinism are therefore the two rival theories of the will.

(a) Indeterminism. — Without entering into the discussions suggested by such familiar phrases as "power of contrary choice," "liberty of indifference," "self-determining power of the will," we may say that indeterminism is capable of being presented in two forms. It either means, that, in every free volition, 'I not only do as I choose, but choose as I choose,' or else it means that the whole philosophy of the will is expressed in the two words, 'I choose. If the free choice is one conditioned on an antecedent choice, then we have the old difficulty of the "infinite series" over again. But if, with Whedon, we cut off the infinite series by saying that each choice is a separate and distinct creation by the soul out of nothing; if to the question, What reason is there for this and not that volition, the answer is, "None whatever,"—then behold the effect of such a statement! What becomes of character? of the unity of life? of moral accountability? of purpose? of all effort to influence men by arguments addressed to their active nature? The mind simply "projects volitions" blindly, without motive, without reference to past or future: so that, according to the tenets of indeterminism, there is no way of having a free choice, except through an infinite series of choices, or else through a theory that makes all choices purely fortuitous. These difficulties are very serious, and they are not removed by pointing to the evils that are connected with determinism; nor are the arguments that are urged in support of indeterminism so strong, that these difficulties may be safely overlooked. Indeterminism is supported, (1) By appeals to consciousness. But it may be doubted whether consciousness testifies to any thing beyond the fact that the Ego is the sole agent in each volition, and is undetermined by any thing ab extra. (2) It is said that the will can decide against the strongest motives; but this is true, only when by "motive" is meant something outside of the mind as end or object. In this sense no one believes that the stronger motive determines the will. (3) It is said that we sometimes choose when there is no motive for choosing this rather than that. But it is one thing to say that we see no reason why the choice should be this, and not that, and a different thing to say that no reason exists for such choice. (4) It is said that power of contrary choice is essential to moral responsibility, but this is an a priori assertion without warrant. We are morally accountable, whatever be the true doctrine of the will. The question under discussion is a psychological question, and should be discussed on its proper grounds. The advocates of indeterminism have done great service in magnifying the testimony of consciousness respecting self-determination in all acts of will. This is not only an important, but a vitally important truth, and one that needs special emphasis at the present day. Indeed, it is not too much to say, that many who oppose determinism mean only to express their abhorrence of physical determinism, and their belief in the true causal efficiency of the Ego. On these points there is no room for any difference of opinion among those who believe in one personal God and in the separate and perdurable personality of man. But the advocacy of these great truths does not entail upon us the absurdities that have so often been shown to inhere in the theories of indeterminism.

(b) Determinism.—There are two forms of this theory that should be carefully distinguished. It is altogether unfair to represent Spinoza, Priestley, and Huxley as holding the same view of the will as that advocated by Edwards, Chalmers, and Hodge. It is true that these men are all determinists, that they all hold the antecedent certainty of every volition; but they are the poles apart in regard to the explanation of that certainty. Physical determinism is simply the application of the doctrine of physical causation to psychical phenomena. According to that doctrine, the phenomenal world of to-day is the necessary result of all the past. Given the world at any one period, and its condition at any subsequent period is mathematically and unalterably certain. The craving for unity accounts for the attempt to place mind and matter under one generalization. The law of uniformity, indeed, cannot be true regarding matter, unless it be true regarding mind. To bring mental phenomena under the law of physical causation is simply to blot out mind, and teach materialism in fact, however much materialism in name may be denied. This physical determinism, which is now advocated by so many scientific men, is something which every theist must look upon with abhorrence; and we protest against the unfair attempts of some of its advocates to secure a hearing for it by pleading in its behalf the support of Jonathan Edwards. Physical determinism is a very different thing from psychical determinism. Physical determinism blots out the soul, the separate personality. It makes man an automaton, and interprets history in the terms of matter and motion. Psychical determinism, as taught by Edwards and others, is simply the determinism of character. It is allowed, that, in defending his position, Edwards is often at fault in the use of such words as "cause," "motive," and "will;" and those who accept his theory would not always employ his phraseology. Taking, then, any given volition for illustration, the advocate of psychical determinism would say that the cause of the volition is the Ego. A great deal can be said for limiting the meaning of cause to agent; and in volition certainly the agent is the Ego. But now the question is, why the agent put forth this and not that volition. And if the answer be, "There is no reason," it will be replied, (1) This is inconceivable; (2) This destroys responsibility, for actions are moral as expressing will, and will is moral as expressing character. If volitions are simply "projected" without reason,—if they are separate units, sustaining no relation to the man, other than that the man having the power to shoot out volitions does so, it is hard to see what is to be the subject of moral accountability;—not the volition, certainly; and not the man, for these volitions are not related to him in any other way than that he projected them. If character does not determine conduct, how can we know that it is not the bad man who exhibits good behavior, and the good man who is filling the world with all the bad volitions? (3) Why, then, do the volitions of the same man manifest a general similarity? Why are the mean man's volitions unlike the generous man's volitions? Indeterminism has no answer to this question. (4) We must choose, then, between the theory that affirms that uniformities of conduct which we suppose to reveal character are simply fortuitous, and that which says that character determines conduct. We may express this latter belief by saying that the strongest motive influences the will, or that the will is as the greatest apparent good, or that the will follows the last dictate of the understanding, or that character determines volitions, or that the mental state in the indivisible moment prior to volition determines the volition. These expressions all mean practically the same thing; and those who hold the view embodied in these words are determinists of the second class above named, as distinguished from those who advocate the doctrine of physical determinism.

III. FREEWILL AND MORAL RESPONSIBILITY.

— Without free agency there can be no moral accountability. A man forced to do a bad action is not blamed for it. A man who cannot do as he chooses, or who is forced to do contrary to his choice, is not free, and therefore not responsible. But it is wrong to say that power of contrary choice is essential to moral responsibility, or that volitions that are certain are not free. God cannot will contrary to his holy nature. The volitions of Christ were certainly holy: so are the volitions of the redeemed in heaven. And, more than that, all Christians pray that the Holy Spirit will exert a controlling influence upon their minds, so that they may have wise and holy choices. No one feels that a Christian is less holy or less moral because his choices are influenced by the Holy Ghost. The certain connection between a man's nature and his volitions does not deprive the volitions of moral quality. It would be difficult to see how they could have moral quality without such certain connection. The question is not, how a man shall be held accountable whose will conforms to his character, but how a man with a bad character shall be held under obligation to holiness. Whatever difficulties there may be in answering this question, there is nothing in psychological determinism, that is to say, in the certain connection of character and volitions, which is inconsistent with moral responsibility. It is important that the distinction just made should be kept in mind; for in the judgment of some writers, as, for example, Sidgwick, the strongest objection to the deterministic theory of the will is the difficulty of reconciling it with the consciousness of moral responsibility. The difficulty would not be felt if our actions were all holy: it is only when we are told that we are responsible for acts of will which were nevertheless determined by an unholy nature, that the objection arises. And on any theory of individual probation it cannot be met. But on the theory of the oneness of Adam and his posterity, however that oneness may be represented, there is no difficulty in saying that a man is responsible for acting according to his nature, since he is also responsible for his nature. But this subject belongs properly to the next division.

IV. INABILITY. — The deterministic theory of the will that has just been considered rests upon purely psychological grounds. It must be carefully distinguished from the theological doctrine of inability, which rests upon the authority of revelation; although it is common to speak of both doctrines as illustrating alike the bondage of the will, and even to treat them as identical.

1. Difference between Determinism and Inability.

— The theory of determinism proposes a general philosophy of volition. We have no reason to believe that the relation of volition to antecedent mental states was different in the case of Adam from what it is in our own. If, therefore, determinism is true in regard to our volitions, it was probably true in regard to his. If he was free, we are free. If we are under bondage by reason of determinism, he was under bondage also. It is on this account that the Edwardean theory of the will has been held by some to be contrary to the Westminster Confession of Faith, for there the distinction between the will before and the will after the fall is made emphatic. If, however, the distinction between determinism and inability be kept in mind, it will be seen that there is no foundation for this criticism of the Edwardean theory. Determinism is simply a theory that affirms of all men, fallen or unfallen, that their volitions stand in necessary relation to antecedent states of mind. The Confession of Faith, on the other hand, teaches, that, so far as holy choices are concerned, there is a great difference between the will before and the will after the fall. Determinism is applicable to all volitions without exception; whereas it is only in respect to any thing spiritually good that the Confession of Faith and the Reformed theology predicate of men, since the fall, an inability of will. The word 'inability' itself expresses an important point of difference. It states, concerning a certain class of volitions, that they are beyond the power of a certain class of men. Determinism, on the other hand, affirms nothing regarding the ability or inability of men as to volitions. It is, of course, very natural for those who believe in inability to be determinists; for if all volitions are determined by antecedent mental states, then, assuming that the nature of man since the fall has been corrupt, there is no difficulty in supposing that the volitions correspond to the nature. Determinism will account for inability, but whether we are obliged to adopt determinism in order to account for inability is another question. Principal Cunningham thinks we are not. But, however this may be, determinism does not affect the question raised by the Confession of Faith in regard to the will before and after the fall. And it may be said, that whatever conflict may be supposed to exist between freewill and determinism exists likewise between freewill and inability. There is really no conflict in either case; for we are free in choosing, whatever may be the underlying reason that determines choice; and we are self-determined in every volition, although a certain class of volitions may be out of the power of unregenerate men. But if, on the one hand, determinism be not contrary to the Westminster Confession of Faith, neither, on the other hand, does it necessarily involve the doctrine of a fourfold state of will, which is taught in that Confession; that doctrine belonging altogether to the theological side of the freewill debate.

2. Nature of Inability. — To the question, How did the sin of Adam affect his posterity? three generic answers have been given. The Pelagian says that mankind have been practically unaffected, and that men have plenary ability to do all that is required; the semi-Pelagian says that man's moral powers have been weakened, and that there is need of divine grace; the Augustinian says that man is dead in trespasses and sins, and that he is unable to do any thing spiritually good before regeneration. Augustine taught, and it has been repeated by Peter Lombard and also by the Reformed theologians, that there is a fourfold state of the human will, — before the fall, when Adam had freedom to either good or evil; after the fall and before regeneration, when there is freedom in sin only, and an inability of will to any thing spiritually good; after regeneration, when there is ability to do both good and evil; and after glorification, when the will is unalterably determined to holy choices. If we are to include under the category of Augustinianism those who reject Pelagian and semi-Pelagian error, we must comprehend under this designation some who cannot be called Augustinians in the strictest sense of the term. That is to say, we must include some, who, while they reject Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism, would not say that fallen man is "indisposed, disabled, and made opposite to all good," or would not accept the full Augustinian theology on other points of doctrine. The Augustinian (using the word in the broad sense just stated) doctrine of inability is represented in several forms. (a) The Roman-Catholic. The doctrine of the Church of Rome, as taught by representative theologians and the Council of Trent, is substantially Augustinian in regard to original sin, though the full Augustinian doctrine of inability is denied in denying the passivity of the soul in regeneration. (b) The Arminian. Augustinian as to their views regarding total depravity and consequent inability, Arminians nevertheless deny the Augustinian forms of the doctrine of efficacious grace. This denial was one of the "five points" in the "Remonstrance." Wesleyan Arminians hold that a "gracious ability" is given to all men, whereby they may co-operate with the Spirit of God. (c) Lutheran Doctrine of Inability. Lutheran theology is thoroughly Augustinian upon this point. (See Augs. Conf., art. xviii.; Form. Concord., art. ii.) (d) Modified Calvinism. The anthropological discussions among the New-England divines turned largely upon the distinction between natural and moral ability. Edwards held that men have natural ability to repent, and turn to God: they have all the qualifications for doing so, and there is nothing to hinder them if they will. "There are faculties of mind, and a capacity of nature, and every thing else sufficient, but a disposition: nothing is wanting but a will." Moral ability means, then, inability through unwillingness. Edwards will not allow us to ask whether a man can will; for he says that could only be answered by saying, that, if he wills, he can will, or, if he wills to will, he can will. In other words, we must take our choice between an identical proposition and the infinite series. Dr. Taylor, however, pressed the question, Can a man choose God for his portion? and answered it by saying that he was able to do so, but it was certain he would not do so. He had natural ability to will, but moral inability. This he generalized in this formula: "Certainty, with power to the contrary." Moral inability in the theology of Edwards, and moral inability in the theology of Taylor, were two different things. In the first case it meant, 'I cannot act, since I am unwilling;' in the latter case it meant, 'I shall not will, though I am able to will.' According to this view, inability consists in the certainty, that, without divine grace, a man will not make a generic choice of God as his chief good. (e) Symbolical

Calvinism. The symbols of the Reformed churches state the doctrine of inability very positively as the necessary consequence of the doctrine of original sin, and without any reference to the psychological problem regarding volitions. The Westminster Confession affirms this doctrine in the following terms: "Man by his fall into a state of sin hath wholly lost all ability of will to any spiritual good accompanying salvation; so as a natural man, being altogether averse from good, and dead in sin, is not able by his own strength to convert himself, or prepare himself therefor." Does this loss of "ability of will" imply impotence in regard to volitions or to prevailing inclinations? If the reference be to volitions, the criticism of Edwards would be pertinent; that is to say, it is absurd to ask, Can a man will? We could only say that it is certain that the volitions of the unregenerate will be unholy, whatever the ground of that certainty may be. If the ground of that certainty be in an unholy character, it will be for the advocates of indeterminism to say how they can hold determinism as to volitions considered as good or bad, and indeterminism as to volitions otherwise considered. If, however, the inability of will here referred to applies not to volitions, but to desires, inclinations, and propensities, the question whether a man can will is altogether relevant; for it is not only true that a man cannot repent, and turn to God, because he will not, but it is also true that he cannot will to do so. Regarding the Confession's statement as to a loss of ability as having special reference to the will in the large sense, and not the specific sense of volitions, it is correct to say that true moral inability is not inability through unwillingness, but inability to be willing.

V. RELATION OF FREEWILL TO GOD'S PRESCIENCE AND PURPOSE. — The doctrine of inability does not necessitate belief in determinism. Neither does the doctrine of predestination, though it has been supposed by some that the two stand or fall together. If determinism be true, it assures the certain futurity of volitions, and this may make it easier to believe that volitions have been fore-ordained. But it does not follow, that, being fore-ordained, they must come to pass in connection with any law respecting the relation of volitions to antecedent mental states. It is a mistake, as Principal Cunningham has shown, to suppose that Calvinists have any dogmatic interest in maintaining the Edwardean theory of the will. On the contrary, some of the most earnest and intelligent Calvinists have distinctly repudiated that theory, and have advocated the libertarian doctrine. To the objection, therefore, that the doctrine of predestination interferes with man's liberty, it is replied, that the Calvinist can hold any theory of the will that the Arminian can hold. The fore-ordination of all events makes all events, and therefore all volitions, certain, but not more certain than the doctrine of foreknowledge makes them. If certainty is inconsistent with freedom, the Arminian's freedom is put in jeopardy quite as much as the Calvinist's. And the only way for him to be consistent in criticising the bearing of predestination upon freedom is to follow Dr. McCabe in giving up the divine foreknowledge regarding future contingent events.

WILLEHAD, St., b. in Northumbria about 730; d. at Blexen on the mouth of the Weser, Nov. 8, 789. He was educated at York under Alcuin, and went in 770 to Friesland as a missionary. He began his work with great success at Dockum, the place where, some years ago, Boniface had been killed. Nor was he altogether without success when he afterwards entered East Friesland, where Christianity had never been preached before. When Charlemagne heard of the great impression he made, he invited him to come and preach the gospel in the regions along the Lower Weser, where the Frisians and the Saxons met together. Willehad accepted the invitation (781); but his labor was interrupted, and his work destroyed, by the rebellion of the Saxon chief, Widukind, in 782. He then made a journey to Rome, where he was most cordially received by Pope Adrian I.; and after his return to Germany he settled at Epternach, a monastery founded near Treves by Wilbrord. Meanwhile the Saxon revolt was subdued, Widukind himself was baptized, and Willehad was able to resume his work. Churches were built at Bremen and Blexen; and at the synod of Worms, July 13, 787, Willehad was consecrated the first bishop of Bremen. He had, however, only two more years to work in. On a tour of inspection through his diocese, he was seized with a violent fever, and died soon after, at Blexen. But for centuries July 13 and Nov. 8, the dates of his consecration and death, were celebrated in the churches of Bremen. See ANSGAR: Vita S. Willehadi; PHIL. COSAR: Tri apostulatus Septentrionis, Cologne, 1642; also found in Act. Sanct. Ben., iii., and in PERTZ: Mon. Hist. Ger., ii.; ADAM OF BREMEN: Gesta H. Eccl. Pontificum. G. H. KLIPPEL.

WILLERAM, or WILTRAMUS, was first teacher in the cloistral school of Bomberg, the favorite establishment of Henry II., then monk at Fulda, and finally abbot of Ebersberg in Bavaria, where he died Jan. 5, 1085. He was very busy in promoting the material welfare of his monastery, exchanging devotional books for good vineyards (Oefele: Rev. Boicar. Script., ii. p. 46). But he won his great reputation as a scholar and poet. His double translation of the Song of Songs into Latin hexameters and Old-High-German stanzas, accompanied with commentaries extracted from the Fathers, was highly appreciated and often copied. The Latin translation was published by Merula, Liège, 1598; the German, by Hoffmann, Breslau, 1827. His life is found in the above collection by Oefele. EULER.

WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE, Archbishop of Paris from 1228; b. at Aurillac about the close of the thirteenth century; d. March 30, 1249; sided with the court and the monks in the contest between the university of Paris and the queen-regent, Blanche of Castile. He was a Platonist, having derived his Platonic views from Arabic sources, and opposed realism in philosophy, and mysticism in theology, to the reigning Aristotelian scholasticisms. His works (Cur Deus homo? De Fide et Legibus, De Virtutibus, De Anima, etc.) were published by Leféron, Orléans, 1674, 2 vols. See VALOIS: Guillaume d'Auvergne, Paris, 1880.

WILLIAM OF CHAMPEAUX, b. at Champeaux about 1070; d. at Châlons-sur-Marne, Feb. 15, 1122. He was a pupil of Anselm of Laon, a realist; and, having defeated the nominalist Roscelin, he began a brilliant career as a teacher in Paris, until he himself was defeated by Abelard. Tormented by the invectives and sarcasms of Abelard, he retired (1108) to St. Victor (Cella Vetus); and there he founded a celebrated school, which afterwards became the seat of French mysticism in its opposition to scholasticism. In 1113 he was elected bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, and as such he took part in the controversies concerning investiture between Abelard, and Bernard of Clairvaux, etc. He was a friend of Bernard, often visited him, and was buried at Clairvaux. Of his works, only fragments, though large fragments, have come down to us: Sententiae, in two manuscripts, in the libraries of Paris and Châlons-sur-Marne; De anima, in Martene: Anecd., v. 879; De eucharistia, etc. From the last-mentioned work it is evident that at that time the Lord's Supper was still generally administered in the church sub utraque specie. See E. MICHAUD: G. de Champagne et les écoles de Paris au 12<sup>m</sup> siècle, Paris, 1867, 2d edition, 1868; HAUREAU: Histoire de la phil. scol., Paris, 1840.

WILLIAM OF MALMESBURY, b. in Somersetshire, probably in 1096; d. at Malmesbury after 1142. He was the son of a Norman father and a Saxon mother; was educated in the monastery of Malmesbury, where he spent his whole life as a monk, librarian, and cantor, and gained a lasting reputation as one of the foremost of the early English historians. His principal works are, De gestis regum, containing the history of England from the Anglo-Saxon Conquest to the end of the reign of Henry I., 1129; Historie novelle, a continuation of the preceding; and De gestis pontificum Anglorum, containing the history of the Christian Church in England from the introduction of Christianity to 1123. These three works were first edited by Savile, in his Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, London, 1596, but after a poor manuscript: the best edition is that of the English Historical Society, 1840, 2 vols. Among his other works are, De vita Aldelmi and De antiquitate Glastoniensis ecclesie, both in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii., Vita S. Patricii, of which extracts are found in Leland's Collectanea, iii.; and several books, Itinerarium Joannis, De miraculis dicte Marice, etc., which seem to have perished. He was a cautious, careful, and accurate writer, using the materials which he drew from other chronicles with discrimination, and showing great impartiality and love of truth in the treatment of his own time. There is an English translation of the Gesta rerum and the Historia novella by J. Sharpe, edited by Dr. Giles, in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, William of Malmesbury's Chronicle of the Kings of England, Lond., 1847. TH. CHRISTLIEB.

WILLIAM OF NASSAU, commonly called William the Silent, b. at Dillenburg, Nassau, April 16, 1533; d. at Delft, Holland, July 10, 1584. As heir of the large possessions of the house of Nassau in the Netherlands, he was educated at the court of the queen-regent, Mary of Hungary, in Brussels; that is to say, he was educated in the Roman-Catholic faith, though both his parents were Lutherans. In his fifteenth year he became page to Charles V.; and the emperor soon showed him the most extraordinary confidence, employing him in the most difficult positions, diplomatic and military. Philip II. also seemed inclined to use him; but when, after the conclusion of the peace of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559), he, together with the Duke of Alva, was sent to Paris as hostage for the fulfilment of the treaty, the French king, Henry II., one day told him that there existed a treaty between himself and the king of Spain for the extermination by fire and sword of all Protestants in Spain, France, and Netherlands; and from that moment, though the man of silence betrayed no emotion, the policy of his life was completely changed. As governor of the provinces of Holland and Zealand, and member of the council at Brussels, he steadily opposed the policy of Philip II., though without declaring openly in favor of the Protestants. But when, in 1566, Philip II. decided to send the Duke of Alva to the Netherlands at the head of a large Spanish army, William resigned all his government offices, retired to his possessions in Nassau, and publicly embraced Calvinism. During the war which ensued, he twice raised an army at his own expense; and, though he achieved no signal military success against the Spaniards, he succeeded in gradually rousing the whole Protestant population of the Netherlands to throw off the Spanish yoke. On Jan. 23, 1579, the Union of Utrecht was signed, by which the northern provinces established themselves as an independent state, intending to confer the sovereignty on some foreign prince. Philip II. answered by putting a prize of twenty-five thousand crowns on the head of William, March 15, 1580; and July 10, 1584, Balthazar Gerard shot him in his house in Delft. Besides his Correspondance, collected and published by Gachard (Brussels, 1847-56, 5 vols.), he wrote an Apologie de Guillaume de Nassau, a most remarkable document, of which there is a recent edition, Brussels and Leipzig, 1858. See MOTLEY: The Rise of the Dutch Republic, New York, 1856, 3 vols.

WILLIAM OF ST. AMOUR, b. in the first decade of the thirteenth century, probably at St. Amour in Burgundy; d. in Paris, probably in 1272. He was professor at the Sorbonne, and became famous on account of his spirited opposition to the Mendicant orders. In 1228 the Dominicans succeeded in penetrating into the university of Paris, and obtaining possession of a chair of theology. And hardly had twenty years elapsed before they claimed to control the whole institution, refusing to obey the laws of the corporation. Their most dangerous opponent was William. He preached against people who taught that labor was a shame, and beggary a glory; that prayer was sufficient to make the corn grow in the field, etc.; and his sarcasms hit. In 1254 he was summoned before the archbishop of Paris; but, as his accusers dared not confront him publicly, he was acquitted. In 1256 he published his De periculis novissimorum temporum, which, put into French verse, became very popular, and consequently very dangerous. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura wrote against it. The Pope condemned the book to be burnt, and the author was banished from Paris. He returned, however, in 1263, was received with enthusiasm by the students, and continued his activity till his death, unmolested by the Dominicans. See BULFUS: Hist. Univers. Parsi., iii.; CORNEILLE ST. MARC: Étude sur Guillaume de St. Amour, Lons-le-Saunier, 1865. W. HOLLENBERG.

WILLIAM OF TYRE, b. in Syria in 1130; was educated in Antioch or Jerusalem, but went in 1160 to the Occident, and studied for several years in Italy and France. After his return to Jerusalem he gained the favor of King Amalric, who made him archdeacon of Tyre in 1167, sent him to Constantinople as ambassador in 1168, and in 1169 appointed him tutor to his son Baldwin, the heir-apparent. Baldwin ascended the throne in 1173, and in the following year he made his former tutor archbishop of Tyre. In this quality William was present at the third Lateran synod; but of the last years of his life the accounts are very contradictory, and the date of his death is unknown. Of his two great historical works, Gesta principum orientaliū and Belli sacri historia, the former has perished. The latter, containing the history of the Crusades from 1100 to 1181, is one of the finest specimens of mediæval historiography, full, accurate, and impartial. It was first printed at Basel, 1549, and then by Bongarsius, in his Gesta dei per Francos, i., 1564, reprinted by Migne. The best editions are that in the Récueil des historiens des croisades, 1841-44, 2 vols., and that edited by P. Paris, Paris, 1879-80, 2 vols. There is an old French translation, Estoire de Eracles (1573), and a modern German, by Kausler, Stuttgart, 1844, 2d edition, 1848.

WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM, English statesman and divine; b. at Wykeham, Hampshire, 1324; d. at South Waltham, Sept. 24, 1401. He was educated at Winchester; and in 1356 was surveyor of King Edward III.'s works at Windsor, and was rewarded for his merit by the gift of the rectory of Pulham, Norfolk, and in 1359 by a prebendary's stall at Lichfield. At this time he was a layman, and did not become a clergyman until 1361. In 1364 he was made keeper of the privy seal; secretary of state, 1366; and bishop of Winchester the same year. He was lord-chancellor from 1367 to 1371, when he resigned. He founded New College at Oxford, 1373. In 1376 he was accused of malefeasance in office, and deprived of the temporalities of his see. But the rectitude of the bishop was subsequently established (for the charge was shown to have arisen from his having forgiven half of a fine of eighty pounds); and Richard II. restored him to his offices and dignities, 1379. He was again lord-chancellor from 1389 to 1391. He rebuilt Winchester Cathedral, 1395-1405. See CAMPBELL: Lives of the Lord-Chancellors.

WILLIAMS, Daniel, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Wrexham in Denbighshire, in North Wales, about 1644; d. in London, Jan. 26, 1716. His education was defective; yet he began to preach 1663, and was chaplain to the Countess of Meath; pastor of Wood-street Dissenting Chapel, 1668-87; of Hand-alley Chapel, Bishopsgate Street, London, 1688, till his death. His publications are mentioned in Allibone. By will he founded the Red-Cross-street Library. This originally embraced his own library and that of Rev. Dr. William Bates, purchased by him for some five hundred pounds. The trustees purchased a site in 1727, and opened the building to the public 1729. Since 1872 the library has been housed in a new building. The number of volumes has been gradually increased, until now (1883) it embraces thirty thousand printed volumes and a thousand manuscripts. Among the latter are the original minutes of the Westminster Assembly, and letters and treatises of Baxter. All schools of theology are represented; and, besides many rare historical volumes, the library is rich in theosophical books and manuscripts. The building is also the rallying-point for dissenting ministers.

WILLIAMS, Helen Maria, was b. near Berwick, 1762; and d. in Paris, Dec. 14, 1827. She went to London, 1780, and entered literary circles; visited Paris, 1786, and settled there soon after, publishing, from 1790 to 1819, various Letters from France, etc., besides A Tour in Switzerland, 1798, 2 vols., and translations of St. Pierre's Paul and Virginia, 1796, and Humboldt's Personal

Narrative, 1814-29, 7 vols. She was imprisoned during the Reign of Terror, and again after the Peace of Amiens, and afterwards became a Legitimist. The late Athanasie Coquerel was her nephew and pupil. Her poems, containing the familiar hymn, While thee I seek, Protecting Power, appeared in 2 vols., 1786, and with later additions, in 1 vol., 1823.

F. M. BIRD.

WILLIAMS, Isaac, B.D., was b. in Wales, 1802; and d. at Stinchcombe, May 1, 1865. He was educated at Oxford, and settled at Windrush, 1829, Oxford, 1832, and Bisley, 1842-45. His health failing, he retired to Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, and there died, May 1, 1865. He was a candidate for the professorship of poetry at Oxford in 1842, and was associated with Newman and Keble in Lyra Apostolica and Tracts for the Times, writing Tracts 80, 86, and 87. His literary industry was great. In prose he published a Harmony and Commentary on the Whole Gospel Narrative, 1842-45, 8 vols.; The Psalms interpreted of Christ, 1864-65, 3 vols.; The Apocalypse, 1852; and several other volumes of somewhat mystical theology, greatly valued by some; four in verse, Thoughts in Past Years, 1838; The Cathedral, 1838; The Baptistry, 1840; The Altar, 1849; and The Christian Scholar, 1849. More important than these were two books of less size. In Hymns from the Parisian Breviary, 1839, he was first to follow Chandler and Bishop Mant in translating from the Latin. His versions are often unnecessarily ornate, and in peculiar and difficult measures; but they have been largely drawn upon by Anglican hymnals, and occasionally by others. His Hymns on the Catechism, 1843 (reprinted in New York, 1847), are simple, unpretentious, fitted for great usefulness, and at times of much beauty.

WILLIAMS, John, Archbishop of York; b. at Aberconway, March 25, 1582; d. at Glodded, March 25, 1650. He was graduated at Cambridge, 1603; ordained priest, 1609; dean of Salisbury, 1619; and of Westminster, 1620. From July 10, 1621 (succeeding Lord Bacon) to Oct. 25, 1626, he was lord-keeper of the great seal of England. In 1621 he was consecrated bishop of Lincoln. He discharged his multifarious and laborious duties as chancellor, statesman, and bishop, with diligence. He lost his chancellorship on the accession of Charles I., and won the enmity of Laud, who instituted three prosecutions against him in the Star Chamber: (1) for revealing the king's secrets; (2) for tampering with the king's witnesses; (3) for divulging scandalous libels against the king's privy councillors. He was sentenced to pay fines to the amount of eighteen thousand pounds, to be suspended from his bishopric, and to be imprisoned in the Tower during the king's pleasure. He was in prison from 1636 to 1640. The Long Parliament released him. The king raised him to the archbishopric of York, 1641, and had all records of his trial cancelled. He is said to have died of grief over the king's execution. Williams was a man of learning and ability, although perhaps not equal to the demands of those stormy times. He won the favor of the Puritans by his conduct toward them. In 1641 he was chairman of the parliamentary committee "for innovations," i.e., "to examine all innovations of doctrine and discipline introduced into the Church without law since the Reformation." See JOHN HACKER: Scrinia reserta: The Life of Archbishop Williams, London, 1693, abridged editions, 1700 and 1715; NEAL: History of the Puritans, vol. i.; STOUTINGTON: Religion in England, vol. i.; CAMPBELL: Lives of the Chancellors, iii.

WILLIAMS, John, "The Apostle of Polynesia," missionary; b. at Tottenham, June 29, 1796; murdered at Erromanga, New Hebrides, Nov. 20, 1839. By trade an ironmonger, he was led at the age of twenty to give himself to missionary labor, and was sent by the London Missionary Society to the Society Islands (November, 1816). He settled in the Island of Raiatea. In 1823 he discovered the Island of Rarotonga. On both islands he did most useful and permanent work, not only for their religious, but also for their secular interests. In connection with the latter, especially, he will be remembered; for he reduced its language to writing, and in connection with Messrs. Pitman and Buzacot translated the New Testament into it. He visited England 1834-38, and on his return made a tour of the group of Society Islands, in the course of which he was killed by the natives. He wrote A Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South-Sea Islands, London and New York, 1837, often since (a very valuable and interesting work). See his Memoirs by PROUT, London, 1843.

WILLIAMS, Roger, b. about 1600, the exact date being uncertain; d. April, 1683, at Providence, R.I. His birthplace, whether Wales or Cornwall, is also in dispute. Pious parentage may be inferred from his remark, "From my childhood, the Father of lights and mercies touched my soul with a love to himself." In London, while he was still a youth, his skill in reporting sermons and also speeches in the Star Chamber attracted the notice of Sir Edward Coke, who sent him to Sutton's Hospital (now Charterhouse) School; and Williams afterwards writes to Sir Edward's daughter, "Your dear father was often pleased to call me his son." His university course, said by some to have been pursued in Oxford, was probably taken at Pembroke College, Cambridge. Tradition has it that he studied law; but it is certain that he soon gave his attention to theology, was admitted to orders in the Established Church, and, it has been said, held a benefice in Lincolnshire.

But his "conscience was persuaded against the national church and ceremonies and bishops." His statement, "Bishop Laud pursued me out of this land," may not refer to any direct persecution; but it is evident that so radical a Reformer as he was could find safety and freedom only in exile. Accordingly, he sailed for America, arriving in Boston in February, 1631.

Here he is spoken of by Winthrop as "a godly minister;" and the church in Boston immediately asked for his services. But not even the men of Boston had taken sufficiently strong ground in renunciation of the errors of the national church. He says, "Being unanimously chosen teacher at Boston, I conscientiously refused, because I durst not officiate to an unseparated people, as, upon examination and conference, I found them to be." He went to Salem, where, in April, the church asked him to become their teacher.

But, as we learn from Winthrop, "at a court holden at Boston (upon information to the governor that they of Salem had called Mr. Williams to the office of teacher), a letter was written from the court to Mr. Endicott to this effect; that whereas Mr. Williams had refused to join with the congregation at Boston, because they would not make a public declaration of their repentance for having communion with the churches of England while they lived there; and besides had declared his opinion that the magistrate might not punish a breach of the sabbath, nor any other offence, as it was a breach of the first table: therefore they marvelled they would choose him without advising with the council, and withal desiring that they would forbear to proceed till they had conferred about it." The issue of these interferences was, that, in the summer or early autumn, Williams withdrew to Plymouth.

Here he remained two years, being "well accepted as an assistant in the ministry." Gov. Bradford says he was "a man godly and zealous, having many precious parts," and "his teaching [was] well approved; for the benefit whereof I still bless God, and am thankful to him even for his sharpest admonitions and reproofs, so far as they agreed with truth." These words, though so commendatory, reveal the fact that the good brethren had not always seen eye to eye; and the governor pronounces Williams "very unsettled in judgment."

Bradford's opinion regarding Williams has been echoed by many since his day. But is it true that Williams was peculiarly crotchety and contentious? He broached many ideas new and strange; but that was an age of reform, — a day of attack on many institutions and customs which had long stood unchallenged. It is by no means strange that some good men thought him extreme, and unreasonably destructive; for this was just the opinion held of the Separatists by the Puritans, of the Puritans by the Anglicans, and of the Anglicans by the most enlightened Romanists. Seldom will two Reformers agree as to the extent to which amendments shall be carried. In each of his ideas which will now be deemed untenable, he had the countenance of some of the very best of his contemporaries; and the verdict of the present day will be, that the best and wisest of Williams's antagonists held as many erroneous opinions as he, while his views, taken as a whole, were much nearer right than theirs.

Williams returned to Salem in the latter half of the year 1633, some of the Plymouth people having become so attached to him that they removed thither also. He became assistant to the pastor, and on the death of the latter, in 1634, was himself made pastor of the church. During his whole ministry there, he held the very highest place in the love and honor of the people of Salem.

But certain of his opinions brought upon him the displeasure of the authorities of the Colony. He was repeatedly cited to appear before the General Court; and in October, 1635, it was "ordered that the said Mr. Williams shall depart out of this jurisdiction within six weeks now next ensuing." Permission was afterwards given him to remain at Salem until spring; but as it was soon reported, that, at gatherings in his own house, he had continued to utter the objectionable teachings, an officer was sent to Salem in January, 1636, to apprehend him, in order to put him on board ship, and send him back to England. On the officer's arrival at Salem, it was found that Williams had departed three days before, whither could not be learned.

The most noted of the proscribed opinions of Williams was the doctrine that the civil magistrate should not inflict punishment for purely religious error. It has been urged that it was not simply for his doctrine of religious liberty, but for other opinions also, that Williams was banished. This, however, will not exculpate the General Court; for we find them enacting a law, that "If any person or persons within this jurisdiction . . . shall deny . . . their [the magistrates'] lawful right or authority . . . to punish the outward breaches of the first table . . . every such person or persons shall be sentenced to banishment." In other words, though it be admitted that Williams was banished for other utterances, together with the proclamation of the doctrine of religious freedom, the court deemed it proper to decree banishment for that teaching alone. Certain others of Williams's opinions were condemned, e.g., those regarding the royal patent, the administration of certain oaths, etc.; and it is declared by some that these doctrines threatened the civil peace, and thus rendered him justly liable to exile. But in Rhode Island, where the teachings of Williams and of all others were freely permitted, life and property and civil order were as secure as in Massachusetts. In other words, the Rhode-Island experiment showed that Williams's teachings were not dangerous to civil order, and that therefore his banishment from Massachusetts was unnecessary, and consequently unjust.

Departing from Salem, Williams, with four companions, made his way to Seekonk, where he began to build and plant. But in a few weeks, finding that this spot was within the jurisdiction of Plymouth Colony, he went on and made a new settlement, to which he gave the name of "Providence."

Three years after Williams's settlement at Providence came a change in his ecclesiastical relations. It should be remarked that the doctrine of religious liberty was not first set forth by Williams, but had been preached for a long time by the Baptists. It is found in their Confession of Faith, put forth in Amsterdam in 1611, when Williams was but a lad; and he must have been familiar with the teachings of the Baptists on this point. Possibly a leaning, on his part, to Baptist views, is revealed in the fear of Brewster at Plymouth, that Williams might "run the course of rigid separation and anabaptistry, which Mr. John Smith, the Se-Baptist at Amsterdam, had done." At any rate, in 1639, Williams, with others, renounced his baptism in infancy, and was baptized again, Ezekiel Holliman baptizing Williams, and Williams in return baptizing Holliman and several others. This reciprocal baptism is generally given as the origin of the First Baptist Church of Providence. Williams, however, remained connected with the new society only some four months; for, becoming dissatisfied with his baptism as not coming down from the apostles, he withdrew, and henceforth remained outside all ecclesiastical connections. In 1643 Williams went to England to procure a charter for the Providence and Rhode-Island colonists; in which mission he succeeded, returning the following year. In 1651, in company with John Clarke of Newport, he sailed again for England to secure the interests of the Colony, returning in 1654. He lived to advanced years, dying in 1683.

Williams's character as a man and a Christian was above reproach. Though he was much engaged in sharp discussion, and the age was one in which disputants indulged in bitter invective, opponents spoke of him personally in terms of high respect. He was an especial friend of the Indians. He studied their language, respected and defended their title to their lands, and, when the Massachusetts Colony and other white settlements were threatened with Indian hostilities, he was able, by his acquaintance and friendship with leading chiefs, to avert the impending dangers.

He was a somewhat copious and a vigorous author. His writings contain many striking passages, and can still be read with interest. He had the intimate friendship of Cromwell, Milton, Vane, and others of the noblest Englishmen of his day.

Williams's extant writings (all published in London except when otherwise designated) are, — A key into the Language of America, or an help to the language of the Natives, etc., 1643, 12mo, pp. 216; Mr. Cotton's letter examined, etc., 1644, 4to, pp. 67; The Bloody Tenent of Persecution, etc., 1644, 4to, pp. 271; Queries, etc., 1644, pp. 13; Christenings make not Christians, a tract, 1645; The Bloody Tenent yet more Bloody, etc., 1652, 4to, pp. 373; The Hirling Ministry none of Christ's, 1652, 4to, pp. 44; Experiments, etc., 1652, 4to, pp. 69; George Fox Dugged out of his Burrows, Boston, 1676, 4to, pp. 335. Many of his letters are also published, edited by J. Russell Bartlett, Providence, 1882. His works, except one or two of the shorter writings, were republished by the Narragansett Club, in 6 vols. 4to, Providence, 1866-74. A seventh volume will complete the set.

He was graduated at King's College, Cambridge, and chosen fellow of his college, 1839; travelled from August, 1840, till the autumn of 1841, upon the Continent; B.A., 1841; ordained deacon, October, 1842, and priest the next year; classical tutor of King's College, 1843; M.A., 1844; was elected vice-principal, and professor of Hebrew, in the Welsh theological college of St. David's, Lampeter, 1849; resigned his tutorship; began his new duties in the spring of 1850; B.D., 1851, appointed select preacher at the University of Cambridge, December, 1854; D.D., 1857; became vicar of Broad-chalke, 1859; resigned his professorship, and retired to his parish, Aug. 16, 1862. He wrote Bunsen's Biblical Researches in the famous volume, Essays and Reviews, London, 1860, of which 22,500 copies were sold by March, 1863. For his part in it he was tried by the Arches Court of Canterbury, condemned (Dec. 15, 1862) to suspension for one year, with payment of costs. He appealed to the Privy Council, which reversed the judgment (Feb. 8, 1864), and he was not further molested. By his writings he made himself a place in literature. Among them may be mentioned his prize essay on The Principles of Historical Evidence applied to Discriminate between the Authority of the Christian Scriptures and of the Religious Books of the Hindus, 1847, of which the expansion was the standard volume, Christianity and Hinduism, Cambridge, 1856, which Baron Bunsen and Dr. Muir praised in the highest terms; Rational Godliness after the Mind of Christ and the Written Voices of the Church, 1855; Broad-chalke Sermon-essays, On Nature, Meditation, Atonement, Absolution, 1867; The Hebrew Prophets, translated Afresh, and Illustrated for English Readers, 1868 71, 2 vols.; Open Glendower, a Dramatic Biography: and Other Poems, 1869 (issued shortly after his death); Psalms and Litanies, Counsels and Collects for Devout Persons, 1872. 2d ed., 1882 (edited by his widow). See his Life and Letters edited by his widow, London, 1871, 2 vols.

WILLIAMS, William, alliteratively called "the Watts of Wales;" was b. in Carmarthenshire, 1717; and d. at Pantycelyn, Jan. 11, 1791. He was converted under the preaching of Howell Harris. Leaving the Established Church for the Calvinistic Methodists, he itinerated for near fifty years with great approval and success. He published sundry volumes of theology and hymns in Welsh, and, in English, Hosannah to the Son of David, 1759, and Gloria in Excelsis, 1772. These two together, numbering a hundred and twenty-one hymns, were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1859. The famous hymn, Guide Me, O Thou Great Jehovah, is now known or supposed to have been completed by this Williams in 1773, from the beginnings of another Welsh evangelist, Peter Williams, who wrote the first stanza and part of the second somewhat earlier. WILLIAMSON, Isaac Dowd, D.D., Universalist; b. at Pomfret, Vt., April 4, 1807; d. in Cincinnati, Nov. 26, 1876. He began preaching when twenty years old, and was pastor in different parts of the Union. He also edited several religious denominational papers, and published An Exposition and Defence of Universalism, New York, 1810; Examination of the Doctrine of Endless Punishment, Cincinnati, 1851; The Philosophy of Universalism, Cincinnati, 1866.

WILLIBALD, St., the first bishop of Eichstadt, Bavaria; was b. in England, 700; a relative of Boniface, and was educated by Abbot Egbert in the monastery of Waltham. In 720 he made a pilgrimage to Rome, and thence to the Holy Land; and after his return to Italy he spent ten years in the monastery of Monte Casino, 729-739. In 740 he met Boniface in Rome, and accompanied him to Germany, where in 741 he was consecrated bishop of the newly founded see of Eichstadt. He built the monastery of Heidenheim, over which his brother Wunnebald presided till 763, and then his sister Walpurgis till 778. The year of his death is given as 781 and as 786 or 787, and the latter is the most probable. His life (Vita Willibaldi, also called Hodoeporicum) was written by a nun of Heidenheim, and is found in CANISIUS: Lect. Ant., iii.; and MABILLON: Act. S. B., iii.

He was a leader in his denomination, and an eloquent preacher. He was editor successively of The Evangelical Witness (1822-26), The Christian Statesman (two years), and of The Albany Quarterly. Among his publications may be mentioned An Historical Sketch of Opinions on the Atonement, 1817. See SPRAGUE'S Annals, ix. p. 40 sqq.

In 1808 was ordained; from 1808 until 1812 he was rector at Chester Parish, Md.; from 1812 until 1826 at Alexandria, Va.; from 1819 until 1826 an editor of the Washington Theological Repository; and from 1823 till 1826 he was professor of systematic theology, ecclesiastical history, and church polity in the theological seminary of Virginia, located at Alexandria; from 1826 till his death he was president of William and Mary College at Williamsburgh. In 1820, 1821, 1823, and 1826, he was president of the house of clerical and lay deputies. See SPRAGUE'S Annals, v. 515 sqq.

nence, and in 1802 was president judge of the Court of Common Pleas for the Seventh Circuit of Pennsylvania. But he turned eventually to theology; was rector in Morristown, Penn., 1819-21; professor of systematic divinity in the general seminary, New-York City, 1821-50; and professor emeritus from 1850 till his death. He was secretary of the house of bishops, 1829-41. He was the author of The Memoirs of the Life of the Right Rev. William White, Philadelphia, 1839. See his Memorial, by W. W. Bronson, Philadelphia, 1864.

WILSON, Daniel, D.D., Bishop of Calcutta; b. in Spitalfields, London, July 2, 1778; d. in Calcutta, Jan. 2, 1858. He was educated at Oxford; took holy orders; was tutor and vice-principal of St. Edmund's Hall, 1807-12; curate in London, 1812-24; vicar of Islington, 1824-32, when he was consecrated bishop of Calcutta, and metropolitan of India. In theology he was an evangelical. He was an indefatigable worker. As bishop, he was noted for fidelity and firmness. His publications were numerous; but they are only sermons, lectures, and charges. Two of such volumes attained a wide circulation, and have been highly prized: Sermons on Various Subjects of Christian Doctrine and Practice, London, 1818, 6th ed., 1827; and Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity, 1828-30, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1860. WILSON, John, D.D., an eminent missionary to India; b. Dec. 11, 1801, near Lander in Scotland, where his father was a farmer; d. Dec. 1, 1875, in Bombay, India. At an early period he came under the power of divine truth, and resolved to give his life to the missionary cause. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh. From the first he showed a remarkable capacity for learning, and all through his life he united the perseverance of the scholar to the laborious diligence of the missionary. He went out to India in the service of the Scottish Missionary Society, a body of Christian friends that took up the cause of missions before the Church of Scotland; but, when that church became earnest in the cause, the society was merged, and Dr. Wilson became a missionary of his own church. He was the head of the mission college of Bombay, in which city he spent his whole public life. In 1843, along with all the other missionaries of the Church of Scotland, he adhered to the Free Church. At Bombay he occupied a kind of patriarchal position. Ultimately all missionaries looked on him as a father. He was greatly respected by the natives, and on many important questions of government his advice was eagerly sought by the highest of the British authorities. He was vice-chancellor of Bombay university, and president of the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society. His chief work was on caste, but lesser publications from his pen were numerous. An important treatise on the Lands of the Bible appeared in 1845. In 1870 he was called to the chair of the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland. The record of his laborious and honored life will be found in a volume entitled The Life of John Wilson, D.D., F.R.S., by GEORGE SMITH, LL.D., London, 1878. W. G. BLAIR.

WILSON, Thomas, D.D., Bishop of Sodor and Man; b. at Burton, Cheshire, Sunday, Dec. 20, 1663; d. on the Isle of Man, March 7, 1755. He was graduated B.A. at Trinity College, Dublin, 1685; and became curate of Newchurch, Kenyon, Eng., 1686, where he remained until August, 1692, when he was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Derby, who, on Nov. 27, 1697, appointed him bishop of Sodor and Man; the benefice being in his gift as Lord of the Isle of Man. Wilson was consecrated at the Savoy Church, London, Jan. 16, 1697, and thus entered upon fifty-eight years of faithful labor. He accomplished two great reforms in his diocese,—the first (1703) relating to the tenures of landed property, which had been very uncertain; and the second, to the rules and discipline of the church there. He had, indeed, remarkable qualities as an administrator, and was, from his position, compelled to take a great share in secular affairs. He wrote comparatively little. In 1707 he issued his Principles and Duties of Christianity, commonly called the "Manx Catechism," in English and Manx; being the first book ever printed in Manx. In 1735 he showed his interest in the missionary aspects of Gen. Oglethorpe's Georgia plantation scheme, by writing his Essay towards an Instruction for the Indians, explaining the most Essential Doctrines of Christianity, in Several Short and Plain Dialogues, with Directions and Prayers. The Essay was not published until 1740, and then not by the bishop, but by his son, who, it is noteworthy, subjected both the manuscript and the proofs to the perusal and alteration of the famous Dr. Watts. But Dr. Watts made few changes, since, in large measure, distinctive Church of England teaching had been omitted. The success of the Essay was great; five editions being called for in four years, and eight editions being printed before Bishop Wilson's death. In the fifth edition (1744) the greater part of the bishop's Principles and Duties of Christianity (the English of the Manx Catechism) was incorporated with the Essay, and in 1755 the title was changed to The Knowledge and Practice of Christianity made easy to the Meanest Capacities. It was translated into French, 1744, and into Italian before 1757. In 1749 he accepted from the United Brethren the office of Honorary President of the Reformed Section of the Moravian Church, or, as it was also called, Antistes of the Reformed Tropus in the Unity of the Brethren. His age at the time debarred him from active service, but he was glad of the opportunity of publicly testifying to his interest in that noble people. Keble says of him,—

"As far as man can judge of man, few persons ever went out of this world more thoroughly prepared for the change than Bishop Wilson, not only in heart and conscience, but in comparatively trifling arrangements. He had even provided his coffin long beforehand."

His death occasioned a great outburst of sorrow. He was a model bishop; and, wherever he is now known by his writings, he receives the involuntary encomium, "Surely he was a saintly man." The best known of these writings, besides those already mentioned, are, Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper, London, 1736, 32d ed., 1807, repeatedly republished, e.g., New York, 1868; Parochialia, or Instructions for the Clergy, Bath, 1788, several editions and reprints; Maxims of Piety and Christianity, 1789, several reprints, e.g., London, 1869; Sacra privata, Private Meditations, Devotions, and Prayers, London, 1800, new ed., 1873. A translation of the Bible into Manx was begun at his request; but he only lived to see the translation of the Gospels and the printing of Matthew (London, 1748). The Manx Bible was published at Whitehaven, 1772-75, 3 vols. 8vo. His Works were first published in a collected edition, with his Life, by Rev. C. Cruttwell, Bath, 1781, quarto, several times reprinted in different sizes and numbers of volumes; but the best edition is by Rev. John Keble, as part of the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1847-52, 7 vols. in 8 parts, of which vol. i. in 2 parts is the Life, — an elaborate, not to say prolix, account of Bishop Wilson and his surroundings. Keble's Life of Wilson appeared in a new edition, 1863, 2 vols. For a literary judgment upon Wilson, see MATTHEW ARNOLD'S Culture and Anarchy, London, 1869, Preface.

WIMPHELING, Jakob, b. at Schlettstadt, in Alsace, July 26, 1450; d. there Nov. 17, 1528. The school in which he was educated was controlled by the Brethren of Common Life, — a circumstance which seems to have exercised a decisive influence on his whole life. He studied at Freiburg (1464-71) and at Heidelberg, where he took his degree, and began to lecture. In 1483 he was ordained priest, and appointed preacher at the Cathedral of Spire; but in 1498 he was called to Heidelberg as professor in the facultas artium. That position, however, he gave up in 1500, and joined Geiler von Kaisersberg at Strassburg, where for some time he was occupied with the editing of Gerson's works. In 1515 he finally retired to his native city, where he spent the rest of his life in his sister's house. He was one of those well-meaning but weak humanists, who were always clamoring for reform, but who were, nevertheless, frightened almost to death by the Reformation. He was one of the first to attack the monks, by his De integritate (1504); and in spite of the intervention of the Pope, who commanded silence, the controversy had not died out in 1523. At Luther's first appearance he saw in him the realization of his own ideas; but afterwards he became disgusted and indignant, when, of the various members of the peaceable literary society he had founded in Schlettstadt, Butzer began to preach justification by faith, Capito rejected the worship of the Virgin, etc. A complete list of his works (eighty-seven), and materials for his biography, are found in RIEGGER: Aménités littéraires Friburgenses, Ulm, 1775; [SCHWARZ: Jakob Wimpfeling, Gotha, 1875]. WIMPINA, Conrad, also called Cocus from Koch, his family name; b. at Buchen or Buchheim, in Odenwald, 1159 or 1460; d. in the monastery of Amorbach, May 17, or June 16, 1531. He studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor there in 1491, and in 1506 rector of the newly founded university of Francfort-on-the-Oder. When the Reformation began, he espoused the cause of Romanism, defended Tetzel in 1517, and afterwards appeared at the side of Eck and Faber. Among his writings are Farrago Miscellanearum (1531), De fato, De providentia, etc.

WINANS, William, D.D., b. near Braddock's Grave, Pa., Nov. 3, 1788, and d. in Amite Co., Miss., Aug. 31, 1857; was a leading minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South. He joined the Western Conference in Pennsylvania in 1808, and two years later moved to Mississippi. Here he soon took high rank in his conference, and rose to great eminence in the connection. He was one of the strongest advocates in the South for the American Colonization Society. He took a prominent part in the organization of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South in 1844-46. Intellectually he was one of the strongest men the Southern Methodist Church has ever produced. A close student, a clear thinker and reasoner, a vigorous writer, a powerful preacher, a debater of decided ability and reputation, he is justly regarded as one of the leading minds and representative men of the Southern Church in his day. In addition to many public addresses, he published a volume of Discourses (8vo, Nashville, 1855) of a theological nature, which are remarkable for clearness of analysis and vigor of style, and evince, in a masterly treatment of the individual themes, a depth and compass of thought rarely, if ever, surpassed in sermonic literature. WINCHESTER, the seat of an English bishopric since 662; is the capital of Hampshire, and is situated on the right bank of the Itchen. It was called by the ancient Britons Caer Guent ("The White City"); by the Romans, Venta Bulgarum, and by the Anglo-Saxons, Wintanceaster. The Romans are supposed to have built its walls. It has witnessed a number of important events in former times; such as the coronation of Egbert as Bretwalda, 827; its capture by the Danes, 860; the great assembly held by Cnut, between 1016 and 1020; the reconciliation of King John with Archbishop Langton and the prelates, 1213; the marriage of Queen Mary with Philip II., 1554. It was the capital of England from its capture by the Danes till after Henry II. Its cathedral was first built by Cenwalch, 643-648, but has been rebuilt and enlarged several times. The present structure is 545 feet long, with transepts 186 wide, and a tower 139 feet high, but only 26 feet above the roof. The present stipend of the bishop is £6,500.

WINCHESTER, Elhanan, Universalist; b. in Brookline, Mass., Sept. 30, 1751; d. in Hartford, Conn., April 18, 1797. In 1769 he joined a Separate Church in his native town, and became a preacher; but the next year he went over to the Open-Communion Baptists in Canterbury, Conn.; later, became a close-unionist, and in consequence was excommunicated; but from 1771 to 1780 he preached in various parts of the country. In 1780 he was settled in Philadelphia, and there avowed his belief in Restorationism, and, followed by most of his congregation, established a Universalist Church. From 1787 to 1794 he preached Restorationism in England. His publications number upwards of forty volumes. See list (imperfect) in Allibone. His Life has been written by WILLIAM VIDLER (London, 1797) and by E. M. STONE (Boston, 1836).

WINCKLER, Johann, b. at Gölzern in Saxony, July 13, 1642; d. at Hamburg, April 5, 1705. He studied at Leipzig and Jena, and was appointed pastor of Hamburg in 1671, superintendent of Braubach in 1672, court-preacher in Darmstadt in 1676, pastor of Mannheim in 1678, superintendent of Wertheim in 1679, and pastor of St. Michael in Hamburg in 1684. In 1668 he made the acquaintance of Spener, and he soon became one of his most intimate friends and one of his most active co-workers. See his Bedenken über Krügermann's Symphonies (1679), Antwort auf Dillfeld's, etc. (1681), Sendschreiben an Dr. Hannekenium (1690), etc. But this relation involved him in violent controversies with his colleague in Hamburg, Mayer, first, concerning the theatre, (1687-88), then concerning the oath of orthodoxy, etc. See J. GEFFCKEN: Johann Winckler, Hamburg, 1861. J. GEFFCKEN.

WINDESHEIM, or WINDESEN, a convent of regular canons, founded in 1386 by the Brethren of Common Life, and situated in the diocese of Utrecht. It was a very prosperous institution. In 1402 it had founded, or entered into connection with, six other convents; towards the end of the fifteenth century, with eighty. In 1435 it was by the Council of Basel charged with the reforming of all the convents of regular canons in Germany; and after the visit of Nicolaus Cusanus, in 1451, its reformatory activity was extended also to other orders. It was closed towards the end of the sixteenth century. See BUSCH: Chronicon Windesemense (Antwerp, 1621), and De Reformatione Monasteriorum quorundam Saxonie, in LEIBNITZ: Scriptores Brunsvicensis.

WINE-MAKING AMONG THE HEBREWS.

The vine was brought from Armenia to Palestine before the time of Abraham; and it found there, more especially in the southern part of the country, a soil and a climate most congenial to it. It was from the Judæan Valley of Eschol that the spies sent out by Joshua cut down the gigantic cluster of grapes. About Beersheba, and east of the Jordan, in regions now utterly desert, miles of artificially formed stone-heaps, on which in ancient times the vines were trained, still remain. Numerous passages in the Old Testament show how common a drink wine was among the Hebrews (Gen. xiv. 18, xix. 32, xxvii. 25, xlix. 12; Job i. 18; Prov. xxiii. 30, 31; Isa. v. 11).

The grape-vine was trained upon the side of the house (Ps. cxxviii. 3), or upon a tree in the garden, more especially upon the fig-tree,—whence the proverbial expression, “to repose under one’s own vine and fig-tree” (Mic. iv. 4; Zech. iii. 10),—or upon trellis-work of various forms. In the vineyards, however, the vines were generally made to creep along artificial ridges of stones, which afforded a dry and warm exposure for the ripening of the fruit; or they were annually trimmed down to a permanent stock, and fastened to a stake. The vineyards were enclosed with hedges or walls to defend them from the ravages of beasts, to which they were often exposed. A tower was also built as station for a watchman (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxx. 8-13; Prov. xxiv. 31; Cant. ii. 15; Matt. xxi. 33).

The Hebrews devoted as much care to their vineyard as to their cornfields. The regular vintage began in September, and lasted for two months (Lev. xxvi. 5; Amos ix. 13). Ripe clusters, however, could be found as early as June and July,—a difference, no doubt, due to the three-fold growth of the vine, which puts forth fruit-bearing shoots in March, in April, and in May. The gathered grapes were thrown into the press, consisting of a shallow vat excavated in the rock, and, through holes at the bottom, communicating with a lower vat, also excavated in the rock (Joel iii. 13). The grapes were then crushed by treading; and the treaders sung and shouted (Isa. xvi. 10) while the red blood of the grapes flowed around them, and stained their skin and garments (Isa. lxiii. 1-3; Jer. xxv. 30, xlviii. 33; Lam. i. 15; Rev. xix. 13-15). From the upper vat the juice of the crushed grapes trickled down into the lower vat.

Various kinds of wine were produced in Palestine, and some of them were remarkable both for their power and for their flavor; as, for instance, the wine of Lebanon, and that of Helbon, near Damascus (Ezek. xxvii. 18; Hos. xiv. 7). The manner of preserving wine was the same among the Hebrews as among the Greeks; namely, in large earthen vessels or jars, which were buried up to their necks in the ground. When wine was to be transported, the Persians sometimes decanted it into flasks or bottles; but skins were used in ancient times, just as they are now. But when skins were used to hold new wine, must, care had to be taken that the skin was also new, lest it should be burst asunder by the fermentation (Matt. ix. 17).

WINE, Bible. There are in the Old Testament distinct terms for grape-juice in all states into which it can pass. Among the Hebrews the juice of the grape was expressed by treading with the feet. Hence the word asis, which means literally trodden (see the root, Mal. iii. 21, Heb.), is used to denote must, or the newly expressed juice of the grape. A more common term for must is tirosk. For grape-juice when it has undergone the vinous fermentation, the proper word is yayin. The acetous fermentation converts it into chometz, or vinegar. So in Latin, vinum (“wine”) stands intermediate between mustum (“must”) and acetum (“vinegar”). In Greek we have the same gradation. gleukos (“must”), oinos (“wine;” cf. the definition in Passow, or in Liddell and Scott’s Dictionary), and oxos (“vinegar”). The references to wine-making in the Bible let us see that no effort was made to preserve the expressed juice of the grape from exposure to the air; and it would, of course, ferment. But long before it was matured, so as to be proper yayin, it could intoxicate: hence we find an inebriating power ascribed to asis (Isa. xlix. 26) and to tirosk (Hos. iv. 11) and to gleukos (Acts ii. 13). Daghan (“corn”) is regularly joined with tirosk (“must”), e.g., Gen. xxvii. 28; while lechem (“bread”) is found in conjunction with yayin (e.g., Gen. xiv. 18), and not with tirosk. But corn is not eaten in its crude state: it must be prepared in order to be fit for food. So tirosk needs to mature into yayin to be a proper drink. In all wine-producing countries this is acknowledged. Our Lord (Luke v. 39) attests the universal preference for old wine to new (cf. Columella, iii. 4; Eccles. ix. 10; Perke Aboth, iv. 21). But intemperate Jews of old would not wait till the juice of the grape had fully matured. They could get drunk on it a few days after it had been expressed. So Dr. J. H. Shedd relates of the drunken Armenians and Nestorians of the present day: "The drinking is usually done up between the vintage and spring. The wine is exhausted at Easter. Till then drunkenness is too common to excite remark" (Missions and Science, p. 433). If tiros were, as a few modern writers contend, "the fruit of the vineyard," it would not be "found in the cluster" (Isa. lxy. 8), but would be the cluster. That it is a fluid is clear from Joel ii. 24. Tiros is described as trodden (Mic. vi. 15); but 'asis, which all allow to be must, is literally that which is trodden. There is, then, no reason for altering the meaning with which tiros has come down to us. Yayin, when it first occurs (Gen. ix. 21), appears as the fermented juice of the grape; and in no place in the Old Testament are we required to give it another meaning. Like oil (shemen), it is said to be gathered (Jer. xl. 10), by a prolepsis; just as bread is represented as "brought forth out of the earth" (see Hebrew text, Ps. civ. 14). So iron is "taken out of the earth" (Job xxviii. 2). Examples of this figure are frequent. Corresponding to the association of yayin with bread, and of tiros with corn, is the fact, that, where yayin and tiros are in juxtaposition, tiros is the natural product, yayin the liquor proper for drinking. Thus, in Gen. xxvii. 25, Isaac drinks yayin, but prays (ver. 28) that God may give Jacob tiros along with corn. Compare Isa. xxiv. 7, 9, and Mic. vi. 15, where not tiros, but yayin, appears as proper to be actually drunk. Indeed, Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxiii. 15) roundly declares that every kind of must is hurtful to the stomach; and in this judgment Hebrew and Greek authors agree. Thus the nature of the drink prescribed to Timothy, who had an ailment in the stomach (1 Tim. v. 23), is determined. As to the ordinary wine of Ephesus, where Timothy was living, consult Eph. v. 18. Scripture never hints at a distinction between intoxicating and un-intoxicating wines. That the good wine which Timothy was directed to use was a source of danger is evident from only "a little" of it being prescribed. A deacon (1 Tim. iii. 8) is required to be "not given to much wine," — an unintelligible proviso against excess, on the theory that the wine approved by God was no more liable to abuse than fresh grape-juice. The same wine is interdicted to some, and allowed to others (Prov. xxxi. 4-7). So strict an observer of the law of Moses as Nehemiah had "all sorts" of wine on his table with a good conscience (Neh. v. 18). He certainly held that every kind of wine known in Palestine could be lawfully drunk. Some take the warning, "Look not thou upon the wine," etc. (Prov. xxiii. 31), as indicating that there was a particular kind of hurtful wine that was absolutely prohibited. But the wine there spoken of has the qualities of the best wine ascribed to it. It is a glowing look that is forbidden. Similarly, in Cant. i. 6, the bride speaks, "Look not upon me, because I am black," etc., deprecating a look of contempt on account of her complexion. Yet the same bride can (chap. vi. 10) be regarded with admiration. "Wine is a mocker" (Prov. xx. 1). This declaration sets forth the danger connected with the use of wine in general, but does not specifically condemn any variety of it. No one interprets the statement, "knowledge puffeth up" (1 Cor. viii. 1), as the condemnation of a certain kind of knowledge; or the words, "the tongue is a fire," etc. (Jas. iii. 6), as suggesting a distinction of tongues as to substance or structure. Ancient Jewish and Gentile authors attribute good and bad effects to wine according to its proper use or abuse (cf. Ecclus. xxxi. 25-30; Pliny, H. N., xiv. 7; and Pricæus on 1 Tim. v. 23). No Christian or heathen moralist has ever, in condemning wine, and advocating temperance, alluded to a wine the use of which was free from peril. In fact, the theory of two kinds of wine — the one fermented and intoxicating and unlawful, and the other unfermented, un-intoxicating, and lawful — is a modern hypothesis, devised during the present century, and has no foundation in the Bible, or in Hebrew or classical antiquity. Examples of unfermented wines are, indeed, adduced from Latin and Greek authors; but they do not bear examination. Those who take the pains to study the authorities appealed to must be amazed at the purpose for which they are brought forward. That must pass into wine by fermentation, see Varro, De Re Rustica, i. 65; Columella, De Re Rustica, xii. 25; Pliny, H. N., xiv. 11. These writers mention only one way of trying to hinder must from becoming wine; viz., by keeping the casks containing it in cold water. But no instance of this preserved must being drunk as a beverage alone, or simply mixed with water, has been pointed out. To complete the evidence against the unfermented wine theory, no trace of such a wine can now be discovered in the lands of the Bible. Missionaries of the highest character and attainments, and long resident in Syria, such as Drs. W. M. Thomson, C. V. A. Van Dyck, H. H. Jessup, and W. Wright, have united with some of the most intelligent natives of Syria in testifying that they have never seen or heard of an unfermented wine in Syria or the Holy Land, nor have found, among Jews, Christians, or Mohammedans, any tradition of such a wine ever having existed in the country. We need not here inquire how certain travellers were led to make mistakes and misstatements on this subject. It is enough to refer to what is written in Dr. T. Laurie's work on Missions and Science, pp. 430-441. No one who duly weighs the evidence there presented can believe that such a thing as unfermented wine is known in the country in which our Saviour lived in the days of his flesh. Dibs, which is sometimes referred to as a specimen of an unfermented wine, is simply honey of grapes, the Hebrew debâsh. It is not drunk diluted with water, but is used as molasses or jelly.

The expression "the fruit of the vine" is employed by our Saviour in the synoptical Gospels to denote the element contained in the cup of the Holy Supper. The fruit of the vine is literally the grape. But the Jews from time immemorial have used this phrase to designate the wine partaken of on sacred occasions, as at the Passover and on the evening of the Sabbath. The Mishna (De Bened. cap. 6, pars i.) expressly states, that, in pronouncing blessings, "the fruit of the vine" is the consecrated expression for yayin. For further proof of this usage the Jewish Prayer-Book may be consulted. How naturally the phrase "the fruit of the vine" is put for wine is seen from Herodotus (book i. 212), where Tomyris, the Queen of the Massagetæ, is made to employ the three expressions, ampelou karpos ("the fruit of the vine"), pharmakon ("a drug"), and oinos ("wine"), to denote the wine by which a part of her army was so intoxicated as to fall an easy prey to Cyrus. Wine is not whiskey, but compare the phrase "old rye" for the latter; The Christian Fathers, as well as the Jewish rabbis, have understood "the fruit of the vine" to mean wine in the proper sense. Our Lord, in instituting the Supper after the Passover, availed himself of the expression invariably employed by his countrymen in speaking of the wine of the Passover. On other occasions, when employing the language of common life, he calls wine by its ordinary name. We have seen, that, according to Old Testament usage, the product of the vine which accompanies bread is not tirosh, but proper wine. The New-Testament corroboration of this usage is found in Luke vii. 33. Hence, when we have bread in the Communion, wine is its fitting scriptural accompaniment. What we read in 1 Cor. xi. 21, 27, testifies unmistakably to the nature of the wine of the Supper. Those in the Corinthian church who were "drunken" at the Communion partook of "the cup of the Lord," though "unworthily." It is right to state, that, during the Passover, Jews will not taste or touch fermented drinks into which grain has entered (cf. Mishna, Pesachoth, part ii.). But the fermented juice of the grape prepared by Jews, and kept carefully free from leaven, is the proper Paschal wine. The truth on this subject can be learned from any intelligent Jew. The wine of the Supper is not different from the wine made by our Lord at Cana. The character of the latter is clear from the remark of the governor of the feast recorded in John ii. 10. It is classed by him with the good wine, which was always served at the beginning of a feast, and which could so affect those who partook of it too freely as to blunt their taste, and render them incapable of distinguishing nicely between good wine and bad. It was to the governor, whose judgment is reported, that Christ instructed the servants to bear the wine.

Shekhar (Greek, shekera, Luke i. 15) is rightly translated "strong drink" in the English Version. The attempt to connect shekhar with Sanskrit sarkarâ, saccharum ("sugar"), is inadmissible, as sugar was unknown to the ancient Hebrews. Numerous as are the words of censure and warning uttered in connection with shekhar, the use of it is expressly sanctioned (Deut. xiv. 26; Prov. xxxi. 6). It could be poured out to the Lord as a drink-offering (Num. xxviii. 7). As yayin was the natural, shekhar was the artificial wine. It was prepared from grain, apples, honey, or dates (Jerome, Epist. ad Nepotianum), and included zuthos, or beer.

Chemer is in Hebrew a poetic term for wine, and is derived from a verb signifying both "to ferment" and to "be red." Whichever meaning is ascribed to its root, the import of chemer is the same, as the red color of natural wine supposes fermentation. Chemer in its Chaldeæ form denotes the wine drunk by Belshazzar (Dan. v. 1); yet it appears as a blessing (Isa. xxvii. 2; Deut. xxxii. 14). In the latter place it explains the expression, "the blood of the grape."

Shemârim (Isa. xxv. 6) is translated in the English Version "wines on the lees." It denotes strictly the lees of wine, and "is put for wine kept long on the lees, and therefore old, and of superior quality" (Alexander). It forms, along with "fat things," the provision of a feast (Heb., mishteh, literally "a drinking"). A feast without wine could not be called a mishteh. It is absurd, therefore, to make shemârim designate preserves or jellies.

Sobe, in Isa. i. 22, denotes the wine of Jerusalem in its best days, but in Nah. i. 10 the Ninevites appear drunken with their sobe.

Mezekh (Ps. lxxv. 9, Hebrew text), mimsakh (Prov. xxiii. 30), and mezeg (Cant. vii. 3, Hebrew text), all denote literally a mixture, then wine mixed with spices to increase its strength, and render it more agreeable. Some scholars dispute the acquaintance of the Hebrews with spiced wines; but see Cant. viii. 2, and the note on Isa. v. 21, in Lange's Commentary.

Mishrath anâbim (Num. vi. 3), rendered in the English Version "liquor of grapes," is defined by Gesenius "drink made of steeped grapes."

Ashishah, translated "flagon" in the English Version, is now commonly regarded by scholars as a cake of dried grapes pressed together.

That unfermented grape-juice is the approved wine of Scripture is maintained in Bacchus by R. B. GRINDROD, and in Anti-Bacchus by Rev. B. PARSONS; in the Temperance Bible Commentary, by LEES and BURNS; Dr. SAMSON'S Divine Law as to Wines, and a multitude of pamphlets and essays. WINEBRENNERIANS, the popular designation of a Baptist denomination officially called "The Church of God." The founder, the Rev. John Winebrenner, was a minister of the German Reformed Church; b. March 25, 1797, in Frederick County, Md.; d. Sept. 12, 1860, in Harrisburg, Penn. He was settled in 1820, in Harrisburg, over four congregations of the German Reformed Church, — one in town, and three in the country. Soon after his settlement a revival began in his churches, on account of which, as he wrote, he encountered much opposition from members and ministers of the synod. "This state of things," according to his own account, "lasted for the space of about five years, and then resulted in a separation from the German Reformed Church." This separation, which must have been in 1825, did not interrupt the revival. On the contrary, it spread, and there were "multitudes happily converted to God." These converts were organized into churches; and, as Mr. Winebrenner's views as to the nature of a scriptural ecclesiastical organization had meantime changed, these churches were formed as "spiritual, free, and independent churches." Ministers were raised up from among the converts; but until 1830 they co-operated with Mr. Winebrenner, without any definite practical system. The first congregation called "The Church of God" was organized in 1829; and in the following year the ministers met together, and agreed upon the principles upon which the new denomination should be based. Winebrenner was elected speaker (president) of the conference, and preached a sermon, in which he gave an outline of the faith and practice of New-Testament churches. Such churches should be formed, (1) of "believers only;" (2) "without sectarian or human name;" (3) "with no creed and discipline but the Bible;" (4) subject to no foreign jurisdiction; (5) "they should be governed by their own officers, chosen by a majority of the members of each individual church." Thus originated the Annual Eldership, or Conference. There are now, chiefly in Pennsylvania and the West, fifteen annual elderships, besides a General Eldership (triennial), which adopts general legislation for the church, and controls its denominational activities and benevolences. The ministers, of whom there are four hundred and fifty, are called elders, and occupy stations, or itinerate in given districts under the control of their respective elderships, or travel as missionaries at large. The number of members is estimated at forty-five thousand. The church was organized by Germans, and the German element enters largely into the membership. One eldership is wholly German. The church holds in biblical language to the general doctrines of evangelical Christianity, but emphasizes the ordinances of baptism, the Lord's Supper, and feet-washing. These are "positive ordinances of perpetual standing in the church." Without faith and immersion, baptism is not valid. Feet-washing is "obligatory upon all Christians." The Lord's Supper should be "administered to Christians only, in a sitting posture, and always in the evening." The Church of God claims, that, as distinguished from other Protestant churches, it has a "special, precious, and glorious plea: it is the restoration of primitive Christianity in letter and spirit, in faith and practice." At Harrisburg, the church has a publishing-house. The Church Advocate is the weekly organ of the body, which has no colleges. Its relations with the Free Baptists have been very cordial, and its students have patronized Free-Baptist institutions. It has an academy at Basheyville, Penn., and a college-building is in process of erection in Findlay, O.

There are few denominational publications. Elder Winebrenner wrote a sketch of the denomination for Rupp's Religious Denominations, Philadelphia, 1844; but no denominational history has been written. Elder Winebrenner's Doctrinal and Practical Sermons are published by the Board of Publication, in Harrisburg, in a volume of upwards of four hundred pages, together with his treatise on Regeneration, a Revival Hymn-Book, The Reference and Pronouncing Testament. He was several times speaker of the General Eldership, and was for some years editor of The Church Advocate.

WINER, Georg Benedikt, b. at Leipzig, April 13, 1789; d. there May 12, 1858. He studied at Leipzig, and in 1817 became privatdocent of theology; extraordinary professor, 1819; called to Erlangen as ordinary professor, 1823; recalled, in the same capacity, to Leipzig, 1832, and held the position till his death. His lectures were in each place most largely attended, and his scholars held in loving memory the remarks upon current topics in Church and State which prefaced or closed his formal teaching. The prolific pen always produced works of a predominantly scientific character. They were, for the most part, taken up with biblical matters; although two of his best known works are upon symbolics,—his famous Comparative Darstellung des Lehnbegriffs der verschiedenen Kirchenparteien, Leipzig, 1824 [4th ed. by Dr. Paul Ewald, 1882; Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1873]; and his edition, with notes, of the Augsburg Confession, 1825. And a third production, which has put scholars under heavy contribution, is his handbook of theological literature, Handbuch der theologischen Literatur, 1821: 3d ed., 1838–40, 2 vols.; with supplement, 1842.—one of the most useful and accurate compilations of its class, and greatly enriched, beyond its classifications of book-titles, by brief biographical notices of all authors mentioned, giving merely the most essential dates, which in many instances rescue the name from total oblivion. But with the exception of the books just mentioned, and two or three essays, Winer's publications, in the shape of volumes or articles, treat of the Bible, yet only in some of its departments of scientific study; for to biblical theology, as to textual and historic criticism, he gave little attention; and, although verbally he expounded in his classes all the books of the New Testament, he published a commentary upon only one,—the Epistle to the Galatians, 1821; 4th ed., 1859. Upon three great works his fame as a Bible student and grammarian rests: 1. A Bible Dictionary (Biblisches Realwörterbuch), 1820, 1 vol.; 3d ed., 1847, 2 vols.,—a work of immense industry, a thesaurus of learning upon all historical, geographical, archæological, and natural-historical matters contained in the Bible, and the whole characterized by thorough study, great truthfulness, and absence of speculation; 2. A Grammar of the Chaldee Language, as contained in the Bible and the Targums (Grammatik des biblischen und targumischen Chaldaismus), 1824 [3d ed. by Dr. B. Fischer, 1882; Eng. trans. by Professor H. B. Hackett, Andover, 1845], supplemented by a Chaldee chrestomathy, 1825; 3. A Grammar of New-Testament Greek regarded as a Sure Basis for New-Testament Exegesis (Grammatik des neutestamentlichen Sprachidioms, als sichere Grundlage der neutestamentlichen Exegese bearbeitet), 1822; 7th ed. by Lunemann, 1866; Eng. trans. by Moses Stuart and Edward Robinson, Andover, 1825 [from the 4th ed. by Agnew and Ebbecke, Philadelphia, 1839; from the 6th ed. by Masson, Edinburgh, 1859; from the 7th ed., on the basis of Masson, by J. Henry Thayer, Andover, 1869; and on the same basis, with equal freedom, independence, learning, and skill, by W. F. Moulton, Edinburgh, 1870; 2d ed., 1877]. It is Winer's imperishable service, that he put an end forever to the vague suppositions respecting the hebraistic language of the Greek New Testament, and to the unending arbitrariness of an exposition, which, through decades of use, had become a system, and claimed a scientific character. He brought this great victory about by proving the truly Greek usage in the New Testament, both in grammatical forms and in style. His work had apparently only a scientific end, but in reality Winer was influenced by moral and religious considerations. He had a great reverence for the Bible; and his labors accomplished their end, for they enabled the student to get at the truth. In consequence, it may be claimed for him, that he led the way to reform in biblical interpretation, making it less subjective and individual, and more in accordance with the real facts. It is greatly to be regretted, that Winer was not permitted to do for the lexicon of the New Testament a work corresponding to that he had done for the grammar. He did, it is true, prepare a Beitrag zur Verbesserung der neutestamentlichen Lexikographie, 1823, and collect rich materials for such a lexicon; but he did not live to put his work in shape. In 1826 he issued a Specimen lexicæ hebraicæ, and in 1828 a revision of the Simon-Eichhorn Dictionary of the Hebrew and Chaldean languages. G. LECHLER.

WINES, Enoch Cobb, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Hanover, N.J., Feb. 17, 1806; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 10, 1879. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1827; from 1829 till 1831 was chaplain and teacher in the navy, and subsequently taught and preached in various places, until in 1834 he was appointed professor of ancient languages in Washington College, Pennsylvania, and in 1859 president of the City University, St. Louis. In 1862 he entered publicly upon the great work of prison-reform, with which his name is indissolubly connected. In that year he became corresponding secretary of the New-York Prison Association, and in 1870 the secretary of the National Prison Association, which was formed through his exertions. In 1871 he went to Europe, as a representative of the United-States Government, to make arrangements for an international penitentiary congress, which met in London, July 4, 1872, and through his personal efforts embraced representatives of twenty-six governments. He was on this occasion chosen chairman of the permanent international commission, which met at Brussels, 1874, and at Brussels, 1875. He was also the leading spirit in the second congress, called by the commission at Stockholm, 1877. Besides his official reports, which contain much valuable information, and reveal his indefatigable energy and tireless enthusiasm, he was the author of Two Years and a Half in the Navy, Phila., 1832, 2 vols.; Commentaries on the Laws of the Ancient Hebrews, New York, 1852, 6th ed., Phila., 1869; Adam and Christ, or the Doctrine of Representation stated and explained, Phila., 1855; and The State of Prisons and Child-saving Institutions throughout the World, Cambridge, 1880 (he finished reading the proof only a few hours before his death). See In Memoriam, in 35th Annual Report of the Prison Association of New York.

WINSLOW, Miron (often spelled Myron), D.D., LL.D., Congregational missionary; b. at Williston, Vt., Dec. 11, 1789; d. at the Cape of Good Hope, on his way home, Oct. 22, 1864. He was graduated at Middlebury College, 1815, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1818. In June, 1819, he sailed as A. B. C. F. M. missionary to India, and for seventeen years labored at Jaffna and Oodoville in Ceylon, then, 1836, was transferred to Madras; which mission founded a mission, and in 1840 a college, of which he was president. He was the author of Sketch of the Missions, Andover, 1819; Memoir of Harriet Winslow of the Ceylon Mission, New York, 1835 (a very widely read memoir); Hints on Missions to India, New York, 1856; A Comprehensive Tamil and English Dictionary of High and Low Tamil, Madras, 1862 (based partly upon manuscript materials left by Rev. Joseph Knight: upon it he spent from three to four hours a day for thirty years. He was assisted by native scholars. It contains 67,000 Tamil words). Dr. Winslow also translated the Bible into Tamil (Madras, 1855). He was married five times.

WINTERTHUR, Johann of, or Vitoduranus, b. at Winterthur, in the canton of Zürich, towards the close of the thirteenth century; entered the order of the Minorites about 1320, and lived in the various convents of the order, at Basel, Schaffhausen, Lindau, and Zürich. The date and place of his death are unknown. He is the author of a chronicle, reaching from the death of Friedrich II. to 1348, which is of great interest, especially for the history of Switzerland, but also for history in general. The book was first published in Eccard's Corpus hist. mediævi, 1723: the latest edition is that by Jaffé, in Monumenta Germanicæ.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON. See APOCRYPHA, p. 105.

WISEMAN, Nicholas Patrick Stephen, S.T.D., Cardinal, and Archbishop of Westminster; b. in Seville, Spain, Aug. 2, 1802; d. in London, Feb. 15, 1865. He was educated in England, then in English College at Rome, where he was graduated S.T.D. in 1824. He was ordained priest, 1826, and made professor of Oriental languages of the Roman University, and vice-rector of the English College, 1827, rector, 1828. In 1835 he returned to England, and won fame as a preacher; in 1840 he was made bishop of Melipotamus, and president of St. Mary's College, Oscott; in 1849, vicar-apostolic of the London district; and on the restoration of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy in England, Sept. 29, 1850, archbishop of Westminster, and cardinal. He was the author of Horæ Syriacæ, Rome, 1828, vol. i. (all pub.); Twelve Lectures on the Connection between Science and Revealed Religion, delivered in Rome, London, 1836, 2 vols., 5th ed., 1853, reprinted Andover, 1837, St. Louis, 1876 (a masterly work, although now behind the times); Letters on the Principle, Doctrines, and Practices of the Catholic Church, London, 1836, 6th Amer. ed., Baltimore, 1862; Fabiola, a Tale of the Catacombs, London, 1855, 3d ed., 1870, New York, 1855; Recollections of the Last Four Popes, and of Rome in their Times, London and Boston, 1858; Daily Meditation, Dublin, 1868. His Works have been published in 14 vols. (New York), including his dramas, one of which, The Hidden Gem, was produced at Liverpool in 1859, and well received.

WISHART, George, a celebrated Scottish martyr; b. in the early part of the sixteenth century; d. at the stake, March 1, 1546. According to the date on a fine old portrait which is supposed to represent him, and purports to have been painted in 1543, when the subject is said to have been "ætat. 30," Wishart's birth must have taken place in the year 1513. Calderwood describes him as "a gentleman of the house of Pittarrow" (Hist. i., 185). He is believed to have been a younger son of James Wishart of Pittaro (Knox's Hist., ed. Laing, i. 534); but little or nothing is known with certainty as to his early history.

In 1538 we find him employed as master of the grammar-school, Montrose, — a school which appears to have taken an exceptionally high place in the educational institutions of Scotland at that period. In the year in question Wishart was summoned by John Hepburn, bishop of Brechin, for teaching his scholars the Greek New Testament (the Greek language being at this period, as appears from James Melville's Diary, and from other sources, practically unknown in Scotland, even in the universities), and to save his life was obliged to flee to England. In 1539 he was in Bristol, where he again got into trouble, — on this occasion for preaching against the worship and mediation of the Virgin Mary, — and where he submitted to the humiliation of making a public recantation by burning his fagot in the Church of St. Nicholas in that city. He seems to have lived abroad, and chiefly in Germany and Switzerland, from 1539 to 1542. In 1543 he is again found in England. He spent that year in Cambridge as a member of Corpus Christi College. The next year, or possibly not till the year 1545, he ventured back to his native country, and down to the period of his apprehension by the emissaries of Cardinal Beaton, followed by his martyrdom, occupied himself in preaching, in various parts of Scotland, what he regarded as the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. We find him thus engaged in Montrose, Dundee, Ayrshire, and elsewhere. East Lothian was the scene of his last labors as a preacher; and the crowning result of his evangelistic work was the conversion of John Knox, who (at the time, still a Roman priest, but already strongly prepossessed in favor of the new doctrines) was pedagogue or tutor to the families of two of the landed gentlemen of that county. It was here that Wishart was betrayed into the hands of the cardinal, and notwithstanding the manly but futile interposition of Knox, who defended him at great personal danger, was carried off to his doom.

The irresolution of his natural temperament, which betrayed him at Bristol into a denial of the faith, disappeared at this supreme crisis. He suffered martyrdom at St. Andrew's. He appears to have faced the cruel death by which he perished, without flinching; and, the cardinal showing himself at the castle-window when the martyr was at the stake and amidst the flames, he, with a courage unquenched by the agonies of dissolution, warned his persecutor of the fate which he foresaw approached Beaton himself: "He who in such state, from that high place, feedeth his eyes with my torments, within a few days shall be hanged out at the same window, to be seen with as much ignominy as he now leaneth there in pride."

The character of Wishart, as estimated by his contemporaries, appears to have been much higher than at the present day, in the deficiency of information, can easily be understood. He appears to have been one of the most learned and accomplished of the Scotsmen of a period which abounded in instances of the highest scholastic attainments among his countrymen. He had, perhaps, more daring than firmness in the faith which was in him. But he died with true courage. Judging of him on very imperfect data, he seems to have been, upon the whole, little suited for the rough life and the hard fate which became his actual lot in life. A very interesting account of his person and habits will be found in the account of him published in Fox's Book of Martyrs, given in a letter from one of his Cambridge pupils, Emery Tylney, written in 1543.

Tylney writes, about the year of our Lord 1543: —

"There was in the Universitie of Cambridge, one Maister George Wishart, commonly called Maister George of Bennets College, who was a man of tall stature, polde headed, and on the same a rounde French Cap of the best; judged of melancholy complexion by his physiognomie; black haired, long bearded, comely of personage, well spoken after his countrie of Scotland; courteous, lowly, lovely, glad to teach, desirous to learne, and was well travailed; having on him for his habit or clothing never but a Mantell frieze gowne to the shoes, a black Milan fustian doublet, and plain black bosen, coarse new canvasse for his shirtes, and white falling bands and cufes at his hands. All the which apparell he gave to the poore, some weckley, some monthly, some quarterlye, as hee liked, saving his French Cappe, which he kept the whole yeare of my being with him. He was a man modest, temperate, fearing God, hating coveteousness. His learning no lesse sufficient than his desire to do good."

Mr. Tytler (History of Scotland, v. 343) brings a charge against Wishart, of some concern with a scheme for the assassination of Cardinal Beaton, and appears to conclude that his execution was justifiable on this ground; but Mr. David Laing has given sufficient grounds for dismissing an imputation against his character which is at variance with all that we know of the martyr. See Laing's edition of Knox, vol. i. p. 536.

WISHART, or WISEHEART, George, one of the best known of the Scottish bishops of the Restoration period; was b. in 1609, and d. in 1671. He belonged to the ancient family of the Wisharts of Logie in Forfarshire. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh for the Scottish Church, at that time in a state of transition, or rather of oscillation between presbyterianism and episcopacy, to which last party Wishart, as well from family connection as personal predilection, most inclined. He was a minister of St. Andrew's (not as Keith says, erroneously, of North Leith: see Sir James Ballfour, Annals, iii. 261) down to the year 1639, when he was deposed for refusing to sign the covenant, and subjected himself otherwise to his own share of the troubles of the times. He tells us, that, for his attachment to Charles I. and episcopacy, he thrice suffered spoliation, imprisonment, and exile, before the year 1647. In 1645, having been sent to the Marquis of Montrose, then everywhere victorious, with other royalist prisoners, as a deputation from the terrified citizens of Edinburgh to plead for the royal clemency, he appears to have joined the family of Montrose as his chaplain. He continued with him till the close of the campaign, and afterwards, in the same capacity, accompanied him abroad. After the fall of Montrose he became chaplain to Elizabeth, queen of Bohemia, and sister of King Charles I. At the Restoration he returned to England; and having been, in partial recognition of his loyalty to the royal family and of his strict adherence to episcopacy, appointed to the rectory of Newcastle-on-Tyne, he was in the year 1662 promoted to the bishopric of Edinburgh. His character is very differently represented by the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians. Wodrow says of him, that he could not refrain from profane swearing, even upon the streets of Edinburgh; that he was a known drunkard; and that his poems, by their indelicacy, gave scandal to all the world (Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, i. 236). He is described by Keith as "a person of great religion." Keith mentions one incident very much in his favor. The time appears to have been that of the failure of the unfortunate rising at Pentland. On this occasion he is said to have interested himself to obtain mercy for the captive insurgents; and, "having been a prisoner himself," it is added, "he was always careful at each dinner to send away the first mess to the prisoners."

He was an elegant Latinist, and a man of general literary ability. He wrote in two parts a history of the great campaign in Scotland, and the other transactions of the life of his great patron, the Marquis of Montrose. The title of the first part is J. G. De Rebus auspiciis Serenissimi et Potentissimi Caroli, D. G., Mag. Brit. regis, etc., sub imperio illustrissimi Montisrosarum Marchionis, etc., Anno 1644, et duobus sequentibus, præclare gestis, Commentarius, A.S.; and of the second, Pars Secunda, De Ejusdem Marchionis, ab Anno 1647 ad 1650. This work was frequently translated and reprinted.

WITCHCRAFT means the production of an effect by means of spirit-powers, supernatural and yet subordinate, and presupposes belief in the existence of such powers and in the existence of a science (magic) by which they can be controlled. The Mosaic law condemned witchcraft (Deut. xviii. 10), but the very condemnation proves that it recognized its possibility. A similar attitude the Christian Church assumed with respect to the question; and when, in the thirteenth century, the Inquisition was instituted, witchcraft, as a kind of heresy, was laid under its dominion. In the middle of the fourteenth century the Dominican inquisitor, Nicolaus Eymericus, published his Directorium Inquisitorum, pointing out in detail how the matter should be treated. The subject was still further developed by the bull of Innocent VIII. (Summis desiderantes affectibus), 1484; and in 1487 the development reached its apex in the Malleus Maleficarum by Jakob Sprenger, Dominican inquisitor of Cologne. The first book of this work (the standard text-book of witchcraft) gives the evidences of its existence; the second, the rules for finding it out; and the third, the proceedings for punishing it. As the popes continued to confirm the bull of Innocent VIII., and Protestant princes also showed great zeal in hunting up witches, a perfect mania of witchcraft broke out in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and continued through the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, only slowly decreasing. In defence of the reigning view of the subject, wrote, among Roman Catholics, JEAN BODIN (Magorum Dæmonomania, 1579), PETER BINSFELD (De Confessionibus maleficarum et sagarum, 1559), and MARTIN DELRIO (Disquisitiones magicæ, 1599); among Protestants, THOMAS ERAST (De laniis seu strigibus, Basel, 1578), JAMES I. of England (Dæmonologia), and BENEDICT CARPZOV (Practica nova, 1635). The first who attacked it with any degree of effect were BALTHASAR BECKER (Bezauberte Welt, 1691; Ger. trans., edited by Semler, Leipzig, 1781, 3 vols.), and THOMASIVS (Theses de crimine magicæ, 1701); but Becker lost his office, and Thomasius also was actually persecuted. [The great witch process of Salem, Mass., took place in 1692. Nineteen persons were hanged for witchcraft. But a re-action set in; so that, although in 1693 three condemnations took place, there was no execution. Mr. Parris, the chief prosecutor, was dismissed by his church in 1696, although he confessed that he had done wrong. (For history of this event see Lit. below.) The English laws against witchcraft were repealed in 1736. The last witch was officially tried and executed in Prussia, 1796. In 1881 a peasant community in the interior of Russia tried and burnt a witch.]

WITHER, George, b. at Brentworth, Hampshire, June 11, 1588; d. in London, May 2, 1667; studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, 1604-07; went to London, 1608, and read law at Lincoln's Inn; was imprisoned 1613 for his Abuses Stript and Whipt: plunged into the controversies of the time; entered the military service of Charles I., 1639, and that of the Parliament, 1642; was made major-general for Surrey by Cromwell; was enriched under the Protectorate, but impoverished, and imprisoned for three years, at the Restoration. He wrote Shepherds Hunting and sundry other poems, but is now chiefly remembered and honored for his Hymns and Songs of the Church (1623), which bore the patent or privilege of James I., and Hallelujah, or Britain's Second Remembrancer (1641), a much larger and more interesting work. Neglected at the time, and despised by succeeding generations, these have been rescued from obscurity by comparatively recent compilers and editors, and shown to possess real poetry as well as piety. See Mr. Farr's reprint of them, London, 1856-57.

WITHERSPOON, John, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian divine, and signer of the Declaration of Independence; b. in the parish of Yester, Haddingtonshire, near Edinburgh, Scotland, Feb. 5, 1722; d. near Princeton, N.J., Nov. 15, 1794. He was graduated from the University of Edinburgh, licensed in the Church of Scotland, 1743, and settled at Beith (1744) and at Paisley (1757), whence he was called to the presidency of the College of New Jersey, 1768. In his new position he was eminently useful. He introduced a number of improvements, particularly the lecture-system, previously unknown in American colleges (lecturing himself upon rhetoric, moral philosophy, and divinity), the study of French and Hebrew, the latter of which he taught, philosophical instruments, among them the first orrery made by Rittenhouse, and additions to the library. He attracted, by his reputation and ability as a teacher, a large number of students. He was pastor of the church at Princeton during his presidency, a New-Jersey representative to the Continental Congress, 1776-82 (with the exception of 1780, when he declined the election), in which body he wrote several important state papers. During the war the college was suspended. In 1790 he became totally blind. He was a versatile man and a voluminous writer. His Works were edited by Rev. Dr. Green, Philadelphia, 1803, 3 vols., also Edinburgh, 1815, 9 vols. They include Ecclesiastical Characteristics, 1753 (a satire upon the moderate party in the Church of Scotland); Essay on Justification, 1756 (which has always been regarded as one of the ablest Calvinistic expositions of that doctrine in any language); A Serious Enquiry into the Nature and Effects of the Stage, 1757 (occasioned by the performance of the Rev. John Home's drama, Douglas); Treatise on Regeneration, 1764. For his Life, see the editions of his works; also SPRAGUE: Annals American Pulpit, iii. 288-300.

WITNESS-BEARING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In criminal cases, where life was involved, at least two witnesses were necessary to prove the crime (Deut. xvii. 6, xix. 15). Where there was only one witness, but he was one whose reputation for probity made his testimony weighty, the case must be tried before the priests and the judges (Deut. xix. 17). Witnesses were usually cited in civil cases, even when the matter was purely amicable (Ruth iv. 9 sqq.; Isa. viii. 2; Jer. xxxii. 10 sqq.). Bearing false witness is often mentioned with aversion in the Bible (1 Kings xxi. 10; Ps. xxvii. 12, xxxv. 11; Prov. vi. 19, xiv. 5; Matt. xxvi. 59; Acts vi. 13).

The rabbins laid down special enactments respecting witnesses. In criminal cases the testimony of only one witness amounted to nothing; indeed, such a person was even considered a slanderer, and one rabbi would have him corporally punished. In civil cases, where movable property was involved, if there was one witness to prove a levy on the same, then the person denying it would be obliged to clear himself by a solemn oath. In order to establish the fact of a murder which no one had seen done, and avoid the ceremonies prescribed in Deut. xxi. 1-9, the testimony of only one person was necessary; nor was more required to justify a suspicion of unfaithfulness which would bring the woman before the judges for trial by the waters of jealousy. In both these cases the otherwise inadmissible testimony of slaves, children, and women, was accepted. If any one, asked to testify in regard to a certain fact within his knowledge, denied under oath his knowledge of it, where his testimony would have possible weight, he was required to bring an offering according to his ability (Lev. v. 1 sqq.).

Each witness must give his testimony by himself, in a language intelligible to the judge (for interpreters were forbidden), and limit himself to what he actually saw or heard. If, upon any considerable point, two witnesses contradict one another, the testimony of both is worthless. The witness must not have any bias, and therefore near relatives could not testify; nor must he belong to any of ten criminal classes, such as robbers, thieves, and usurers; nor must he have any serious bodily defect, such as blindness or dumbness. In civil cases the testimony of otherwise incapable witnesses could be accepted if the party against whom the testimony was directed had no objection. The king, on account of his exalted rank, could not be cited as a witness; and the high priest was not bound to give evidence in any case, except one affecting the king. If, for any reason, a witness appeared suspicious to a judge, and yet he could not, on examination, find out any good grounds for his suspicion, he must give the case over to some other unprejudiced judge. Witnesses must testify without recompense: if paid, their testimony is inadmissible. Cf. SAAL-SCHÜTZ: Mos. Rechts, pp. 604 sqq.; (O. WITSIUS (WITS), Hermann, Dutch theologian of the Cocceian school; b. at Enkhuysen, Feb. 12, 1636; d. at Leyden, Oct. 22, 1708. He studied at the universities Groningen, Leyden, and Utrecht. In the latter university he applied himself to Hebrew, under Leusden's direction, so assiduously, that at the age of eighteen he delivered a learned lecture in Hebrew upon Messianic Prophecy. From 1656 to 1661 he was pastor at Westwoud; to 1666, at Wormeren; to 1668, at Goesen; to 1675, at Leeuwarden. In 1675 he was called to Franeker University, and in 1680 to Utrecht. In 1685 he visited England as chaplain of the Netherland embassy. In 1698 he left Utrecht for Leyden, induced to leave his beloved city by the release from preaching which he would have in his new professorships; and there he died, after a retirement of eighteen months on account of sickness. Witsius' great work is De aconomia Fœderum Dei cum hominibus, libri iv., Leeuwarden, 1685; 2d ed., Utrecht, 1693; later ed., Basel, 1739 (Eng. trans., The Economy of the Covenants between God and Man, London, 1763, 3 vols.; new trans., Edinburgh, 1771, 3 vols.; later ed., London, 1837, 2 vols.). It was an earnest effort to still the conflict between the orthodox and the federalists, but as usual pleased neither party, least of all the federalists (to whom he belonged), who accused him of having sinned against the Holy Ghost. As a matter of fact, the book is not strong.

Witsius was a biblical theologian, and not equal to the role of scholastic: in consequence he did not really mediate between the parties, but simply presented the federal scheme, simplified and modified, to give less offence to the orthodox. His work contains many good ideas, but is marred by blemishes, especially by its sometimes trifling exegesis. It is also badly arranged. The doctrine of the person and work of Christ comes in the second book; that of election and the application of salvation in the third; while the fourth is occupied with a condensed account of the history of revelation and the doctrine of the sacraments. Throughout, the author reveals his profound piety. But on the whole the personality counts for more than the theology. [His other writings are of less interest than his Economy. His Miscellaneorum sacrorum libri appeared in Utrecht, 1692-1700, 2 vols.; new ed., Leyden, 1736, 2 vols. Three of these essays have been translated, — Conciliatory Animadversions on the Controversies agitated in Britain under the Names of Antinomians and Neonomians, Glasgow, 1807; Sacred Dissertations on the Apostles' Creed, Edinburgh, 1823, 2 vols.; Sacred Dissertations on the Lord's Prayer, 1839. See Darling, s. v. For his life, see memoirs in the English translation of the Economy.] BERNARD.

WITTENBERG, The Concord of, signed May 29, 1536, denotes one of the most interesting, as also one of the most important, stages in that long series of negotiations, which, during the first period of the Reformation, was carried on in order to bring about an agreement between the Swiss and the Saxon Reformers. Politically, landgrave Philip of Hesse was the motive power of those negotiations; theologically, Butzer, and the personal meeting which the former brought about in 1534 between the latter and Melancthon at Cassel, formed the introduction to the larger assembly at Wittenberg one year and a half later. The hard words which Luther let drop in his letter to Albrecht of Brandenburg, immediately after the death of Zwingli, showed the aversion he nourished to him; and it was well known how anxiously he watched that no one who inclined to the Swiss doctrine of the Lord's Supper should be allowed to keep up community with the Saxon camp. With Melancthon, however, a change had taken place. He learned from Ecolampadius that many of those passages from the Fathers which he had quoted in his Sententia veterum aliquot scriptorum de Cena Domini, were mere interpolations; and, under the influence of Butzer's expositions, he gradually lost all interest in Luther's peculiar conception of the Lord's Supper, and became more and more anxious for the elimination of all elements of discord between the two evangelical churches. The Swiss had also become more susceptible to the idea of a concord. Butzer had succeeded in gaining over to the side of reconciliation Myconius in Basel, Bullinger in Zürich, his colleague Capito, etc.; and in the summer of 1534 an attempt at practical union was made, and proved successful, in Wittenberg. Under such circumstances, Butzer and Melancthon met at Cassel in December, 1534; and, in spite of the very stringent instructions which Luther had given Melancthon, they succeeded in drawing up a formula of concord which satisfied Luther. He sent it to Urbanus

Rhegius, Brenz, Amsdorf, Agricola, etc.; and in October, 1535, he wrote to Strassburg, Augsburg, Ulm, Esslingen, to Gerion Seiler, Huberinus, etc., inviting them to a general discussion of it.

Eisenach was decided upon as the place of rendezvous. In April Butzer left Constance, accompanied by nine preachers. As they progressed, they were joined by Capito, Musculus, and many others. Meanwhile Luther had fallen sick, and requested the visitors to come as far as Grimma: they determined to go directly to Wittenberg. May 22, at seven o'clock in the morning, they met in Luther's study, but not under the best auspices, as it would seem. Luther was suffering, irritable, harsh: Butzer became confused. The subject of the debate was the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. Luther demanded that the Swiss should make a formal recantation of what they had hitherto believed and taught, and their refusal made him excited. The next day, however, every thing was changed. Butzer was clear and adroit: Luther was mild and kind. After some debate, the Saxon theologians retired to another room to deliberate in private; and the result was, that the formula proposed by the Swiss was substantially accepted. May 24 the assembly met in the house of Melancthon. The subjects of the discussion were baptism, absolution, the school, etc.; and the agreement which was arrived at was chiefly due to the tact and resolution of Bugenhagen. On Sunday Butzer preached in the morning, Luther in the afternoon: and all the members of the assembly took the Lord's Supper together. The stubborn Lutherans, such as Amsdorf, Osiander, etc., were, of course, not satisfied with the result: they continued to demand that Butzer and the other Reformed preachers should recant before they confessed. But Luther himself spoke for a long time with great contentment and confidence of the affair. In Switzerland there were also some difficulties in getting the formulas of the concord accepted; but Butzer succeeded in overcoming them, and hoped that he had really achieved the great work of his life. WODROW, Robert, a well-known Scottish ecclesiastical historian; b. in Glasgow, some time in the year 1679; d. at Eastwood, March 21, 1734. He was the son of James Wodrow, professor of divinity in Glasgow University, and the great-grandson of Patrick Wodrow, vicar of Eaglesham, a convert from the Roman-Catholic Church.

R. Wodrow was educated in the University of Glasgow; and on the completion of his course — having acted for a time, first as tutor in the family of his relative, Sir J. Maxwell of Pollock, one of the senators of the College of Justice, and afterwards as librarian of the University of Glasgow — was, in October, 1703, ordained to the pastoral charge of the parish of Eastwood, in the vicinity of the same city, a parish in which he continued to exercise the ministerial office till his death.

He early gave all his leisure hours to the collection of materials for Scottish church history. But he did not confine his labors exclusively to his favorite study. According to Mr. David Laing, who has prefixed a brief biography of Mr. Wodrow to the fourth volume of his Analecta, — one of the publications of the Maitland Club, Wodrow's correspondence shows the high estimation in which he was held by many of the most distinguished men of his day. It likewise furnishes abundant proof of the extraordinary activity of his mind, of the interest which he took in every subject connected with science or general literature, and of the zeal and fidelity with which he devoted himself to the discharge of the more immediate duties of his sacred profession.

As a historian, he was, if not free from prejudice and credulity, trustworthy, upon the whole.

Charles James Fox, in his History of James II., refers to Wodrow as a writer "whose veracity is above suspicion;" and speaking especially of the troubles in Scotland, after the restoration of Charles II., and during the reign of James II., says that "no historical facts are better ascertained than the accounts to be found in Wodrow." His writings, most of them unpublished, are very numerous, and have earned for him the name of "the indefatigable Wodrow." The larger portion of his manuscripts are deposited in the library of the faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh. A number of others, chiefly biographical, form part of the manuscript collections of the library of the University of Glasgow. Wodrow's most important published works are his History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution (4 vols., Glasgow, 1829), his Analecta (printed for the Maitland Club, 1843, in 4 vols.), and his Collections upon the Lives of the Reformers and most Eminent Ministers of the Church of Scotland (Glasgow, 1834).

WILLIAM LEE.

WOLF, Johann Christoph, eminent Lutheran bibliographer of Judaism; b. at Wernigerode, Germany, Feb. 21, 1683; d. at Hamburg, July 25, 1739. He was made doctor of theology at Wittenberg, 1704; in 1712 professor of Oriental languages at the Hamburg gymnasium; in 1716 pastor of St. Catharine's. His great work is Bibliotheca hebraea (Hamburg, 1715-33, 4 vols.), which is an inexhaustible mine of bibliographical information. The first volume contains notices of Jewish authors and their works; the second volume is the bibliography proper; the third and fourth supplement and correct the first two.

WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS is the name of a work written from the deistic point of view, to contest the truth of the gospel history, of which Lessing began to publish fragments in 1774. As early as 1771, during a visit to Berlin, he tried to find a publisher for the work, in spite of the advice of Nicolai and Mendelssohn to the contrary; but, as the royal censor (though he promised not to interfere with the publication) refused to authorize it, he gave up the plan for the time. In 1773, however, he began to issue a kind of periodical publication, Zur Geschichte und Litteratur, aus den Schätzen der herzoglichen Bibliothek zu Wolfenbüttel, which was exempted from the control of the ducal censor; and in the third number of that publication appeared in 1774 the first instalment of the work, Von Duldung der Disten, Fragment eines Ungenannten, accompanied with a few cautious remarks by the editor, but very adroitly introduced by the preceding article. The fragment attracted no particular attention; but when, in 1777, the whole fourth number was occupied by "fragments," of which some, Durchgang der Israeliten durch das rothe Meer, Ueber die Auferstehungsgeschichte, etc., were of a rather pronounced character, quite a sensation was produced; and Lessing did not fail to deepen the impression by publishing in 1778, in the form of an independent book, a new fragment, — Von dem Zwecke Jesu und seiner Jünger. He immediately lost his privilege of publishing any thing without the permit of the censor, and a violent controversy with the orthodox party began (see the article on GOEZE). After the death of Lessing, the seven fragments which he had published appeared in Berlin, 1784, in a collected edition, which was several times reprinted, the last time in 1835. Some more fragments which Lessing had had in his possession, but not published, appeared in Berlin, 1787, edited by C. A. E. Schmidt, a pseudonyme. The anonymous author of the work, which forms one of the most remarkable productions of German deism, was Reimarus; which article see. Lessing tried to lead public curiosity on a wrong track by hinting that the author probably was Johann Lorenz Schmidt of the Wertheim Bible fame. But already Hamann mentions Reimarus as author in a letter to Herder, of Oct. 13, 1777; and the authorship was afterwards established beyond any doubt by the declaration of the son of Reimarus, published in the Leipzig Litteratur Zeitschrift, 1827, No. 55, and by numerous passages in the correspondence of Lessing and Reimarus.

CARL BERTHEAU.

WOLFF, Bernard C., D.D., German Reformed theologian; b. at Martinsburg, Va., Dec. 11, 1794; d. at Lancaster, Penn., Nov. 1, 1870. He was graduated from the theological seminary at York, Penn., 1832; was associate (English) pastor in Easton, Penn., 1832-44; pastor in Baltimore, Md., 1844-51; professor of didactic and practical theology in the theological seminary at Mercersburg, 1854-61, when he resigned, and removed to Lancaster, Penn. He was a pure man, a model pastor, and a wise counsellor. He played a prominent part in the development of the Mercersburg Theology (which art. see). "He was," says the late Dr. J. T. Berg, his friend and opponent in the Mercersburg controversy, "a man of rare tact, of winning manners, and great kindness of heart; and few men exerted a more marked influence on the policy of the German Reformed Church than himself, before years and growing infirmities had weakened his strength."

WOLFF, Christian, b. at Breslau, Jan. 24, 1679; d. at Halle, April 9, 1754. He studied theology and mathematics at Jena, and was appointed professor at Halle, the chief seat of pietism, in 1706. He lectured on metaphysics, logic, and ethics; and his lectures attracted most extraordinary attention. Not only the audiences of the theological professors began to grow thinner, but the students took the liberty to speak slightly of their unscientific method. In 1719 appeared Wolff's great theological work, Vernünfftige Gedanken von Gott, der Welt, und der Seele. In 1720 his ethics, Vernünfftige Gedanken von dem Menschen Thun und Lassen, in 1721, his politics, Vernünfftige Gedanken von dem gesellschaftlichen Leben der Menschen. The pietists now became thoroughly alarmed. They felt that a great danger was upon them. Franke prayed; Lange harangued; finally the faculty made a formal complaint of Wolff to the king, stating, that, among other vicious doctrines, he also taught a kind of modern fatalism under the name of pre-established harmony. "What does that mean?" asked the king in his tobacco-congress. "It means," explained the court-fool, Paul Gundling, "that, if your tallest grenadier runs away, he can, properly speaking, not be justly punished, because his running away is, indeed, merely a piece of the pre-established harmony." By a cabinet decree of Nov. 8, 1723, Wolff was ordered to leave the Prussian dominion within forty-eight hours, under penalty of the gibbet; by another, the Prussian people were forbidden to read his books, under a penalty of a hundred ducats for each transgression. In the same year, however, Wolff was appointed professor at Marburg, and his fame rose rapidly. Acquaintance with his philosophy became an indispensable element of intellectual culture: dictionaries were gotten up to familiarize the public with the technical terms of his system. His method and principles were applied, not only to philosophy and theology, but also to æsthetics, jurisprudence, grammar, etc. His style was introduced in the translation of the Bible, the so-called Wertheim Bible, 1735-37; and before 1739 no less than a hundred and seven German writers of more or less note had declared in his favor, and were working in the same line. Under such circumstances we cannot wonder that it was one of the first acts of Friedrich II., after his accession to the throne, to recall Wolff; and Dec. 6, 1740, he made his triumphal entrance into the city, preceded by trumpet-blasts and a procession of students on horseback, received at the gates by the town-council, waited on by the whole body of professors, etc. The university elected him its perpetual rector, the king made him a baron, etc.

Though a philosopher rather than a theologian, it is Wolff who has given to the rationalistic school of theology its fundamental principle and a great number of its watchwords. The Cartesian dualism between the res cogitans and the res extensa was happily overcome by Spinoza; but the pantheism of Spinoza, in which the two substances of Cartesius were reduced into mere attributes of the one single substance, had no room for true individuality. Spinoza knew only accidental and transitory modifications of the substance; and it was Leibnitz, who, by splitting up the one compact substance of Spinoza into a harmonious world of monads, made possible a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon of individuality. But Leibnitz was somewhat desultory and unsystematic, and the flights of his mind were too high for the general public. In Wolff, however, he found a perfect exponent of his ideas; for in philosophy he is a systematizer only, not a creative genius. He drew his materials from Leibnitz, and his method he derived from mathematics. To make philosophical truth, by means of its peculiar exposition, as binding to reason as mathematical truth, was the great object of his life; and the toil he bestowed on that task—often ridiculous on account of its pedantry when applied to futile trivialities, often amazing on account of its superficiality when applied to things of great moment—was rewarded with complete success: even Kant considered him the greatest among dogmatic philosophers. Of course, he could not forbear to try his method also on theology; and though the attempt at first encountered much opposition, it finally came out victorious. To give a mathematical demonstration of the mysteries of Christianity—the miracles, the Holy Trinity, etc.—was the problem. But why should such a problem be considered unsolvable? A divine revelation could not possibly contain any thing which was against the principium contradictionis, or the principium rationis sufficientis: and how could a more effective barrier be raised against the influx of English deism and French atheism than by fortifying the Christian doctrines themselves, according to the latest and most approved logic? By many of Wolff's followers the application of his method to theology was, no doubt, considered an excellent safeguard against the irreligious agencies of the time; and the danger was wholly overlooked, that reason, when once admitted into the field, might some day undertake to clear it of any thing for which no "sufficient reason" could be found. People went to work with great enthusiasm and perfect confidence. None of the Christian doctrines caused any anxiety: one by one they were taken forth from the armory, treated with the new polish, and exhibited to admiring spectators on the new pedestals.

Natural theology was the department most zealously cultivated by Wolff's disciples. Tired of pondering the symbolical books, and hunting up heresies in each other's sermons, the Protestant ministers threw themselves upon nature, and began to study the Creator in the creation. The pulpit and the lecture-room resounded with devotional meditations on rain and storm, mountains and rocks, snails and mice; and a ichthyo-, testaceo-, insecto-, a litho-, hydro-, pyro-theology arose. But as high as natural religion rose, as low sunk revealed religion. Some of the most prominent among Wolff's theological disciples were: Jacob Carov (d. 1768), who recognized reason as the judge only of the falsitas mysteriorum, but not of their veritas: Joachim Georg Darjes (d. 1791), who demonstrated that the doctrine of the Holy Trinity contained no mystery, but only a psychological problem; Johann Peter Reusch (d. 1758), who proved that revealed religion was necessary to human happiness, and that, of all revealed religions, Christianity was the only sufficient one; Israel Gottlieb Canz (d. 1753), who made the suggestive remark, that natural religion stood in the same relation to revealed religion as well-water dug up from the ground, cool and clear, by means of philosophy, to rain-water falling lukewarm down from the sky, and gathered up in dirty cisterns; Johann Gustav Reinbeck (d. 1711), whose Betrachtungen über die in der augsbургischen Confession enthaltenen göttlichen Wahrheiten, 9 vols., were bought, at the expense of the royal treasury, for every church in Prussia; Hermann Samuel Reimarus, the author of the Wolfenbüttele Fragments, etc. All these men were Lutherans. To the Reformed Church belonged: Johann Friedrich Stapfer (d. 1775), who gave an algebraic demonstration of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and protested that there was no essential divergence between Lutheranism and Calvinism; Daniel Wyttenbach (d. 1779), who used the mathematical method, not only against scepticism, but also against the doctrine of predestination; Jacob Christoph Beck (d. 1785), who emphatically gave natural religion the precedence of revealed religion, etc.

LIT.—Wolff's books are tremendously bulky; and he wrote a book every year, except 1714, the year in which he married. His autobiography was published by Wuttke, Leipzig, 1840. See LUDOVICI: Historie der W. Philosophie, Leipzig, 1737, 3 vols.; Neueste Merkwürdigkeiten d. Leib. W. Philosophie, 1738; Streitschriften wegen d. W. Phil., 2 vols.; HARTMANN: *Historie d. WOLFF, Joseph, D.D., LL.D., a famous missionary and traveller; b. of Jewish parentage, at Weilersbach, near Bamberg, Germany, 1795; d. at Isle Brewers, Somersetshire, Eng., May 2, 1862. His father was a rabbi. In 1812 he was baptized at Prague by a Benedictine monk; in 1815 he went to Rome; but falling under the suspicion of the Inquisition, because of his "heretical" views, he had to leave the city, 1818. He went to England, 1819; joined the Church of England; studied for two years Oriental languages at Cambridge; was sent out as missionary to the Jews, April, 1821, and for the next five years travelled extensively in the East, and again, from 1827 to 1834, and 1836 to 1838, ending up his last journey with a trip through the United States, upon which he was ordained deacon in the Episcopal Church, by Bishop Doane of New Jersey. On his return he was ordained priest, and settled at Linthwaite, and later at High Hoyland, both in Yorkshire. In 1843 he made a daring journey to Bokhara, to learn the fate of two British officers, and, if possible, rescue them, and barely escaped beheading, but returned safely in 1845, and lived the rest of his days as vicar in Isle Brewers. He has been justly styled "a comet in the missionary heaven." His journeys were essentially missionary in their character. He had a marvellous facility in the acquisition of language, and great coolness and self-possession in the presence of danger. He had abundant need to summon every resource to his aid, for his journeys were full of difficulties and alarms. He has left recitals of them in his Missionary Journal and Memoir, London, 1824-29, 3 vols.; Researches and Missionary Labours among Jews, Mohammedans, and Other Sects, Malta, 1835; Journal of his Missionary Labours, 1827-38, 1839; Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara in the Years 1843-45, 1845, 2 vols., 5th ed., 1848; Travels and Adventures of J. W., 1860, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1861.

WOLLASTON, William, b. at Coton Clanford, Staffordshire, March 26, 1659; d. in London, Oct. 22, 1721. He took the degree of M.A. at Cambridge, 1681; entered into orders, and from 1681 to 1688 taught school. In the latter year he fell heir to a large estate, moved to London, and passed the rest of his days in learned leisure. He was the author of a famous work, The Religion of Nature Delineated, London, privately printed 1722, anonymously published 1724, 8th ed., 1759. His fundamental principle was, that every action is good which expresses in act a true proposition. He maintained that truth is the supreme good, and the source of all pure morality. In the 6th ed. (1735), and subsequently, will be found a general account of his life and writings by Dean Clarke. In the 7th ed. (1750), for the first time is the author's name given.

WOLLEB, Johannes, b. at Basel, Nov. 30, 1586; d. there Nov. 24, 1629. He was educated in his native city; studied theology, and was appointed pastor of the Church of St. Elizabeth in 1611, and professor of theology in 1618. Besides some sermons, he published only one book (Compendium Theologicæ Christianæ, 1626); but it procured to him a conspicuous place in the history of Reformed theology, not only on account of its clearness and precision and the perfect order of its arrangement, but also on account of the broad and healthy judgment by which every thing of merely scholastic, formal interest, is left out, and only that is retained which has a living, intrinsic importance.

A. EBRARD.

WOLSEY, Thomas, English prelate and statesman; b. in Ipswich, 1471; d. in Leicester, Nov. 29, 1530. He was graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow, and where he met Erasmus; entered holy orders, and was successively rector of Lymington, Somersetshire, 1500; chaplain of Henry VII., 1505; rector of Redgrave, 1506; ambassador to the court of Maximilian, 1507; dean of Lincoln, 1508; almoner of Henry VIII., 1509; rector of Torrington, canon of Windsor, and registrar of the Garter, 1510; prebendary, 1511; and, 1512, dean of York, abbot of St. Albans, dean of Hereford, precentor of St. Paul's, London; bishop of Tournay, 1513; bishop of Lincoln, 1514; eight months afterwards, archbishop of York, 1514; cardinal on the nomination of Leo X., and lord-chancellor on the nomination of Henry VIII., 1515; legatus à latere, 1516; bishop of Bath, 1518; ambassador to Charles V., 1521; bishop of Durham, 1523; ambassador to Francis I., 1527; bishop of Winchester, 1529. In his day of glory he lived in great splendor, having once as many as five hundred persons in his train, among them nine or ten lords, fifteen knights, and forty squires. [But in 1529 he was accused of having transgressed, while legate, the statute premunire, which forbade the introduction of papal influence into England. He pleaded guilty, resigned his chancellorship transferred all his property to the king, and retired to Esher, in the bishopric of Winchester. The king allowed him to retain his archbishopric gave him a general pardon, and an annuity of thousand marks. On Nov. 4, 1530, he was arrested on a charge of high treason, and died in the monastery of Leicester while on his way to London to answer the charge. He is reported to have said during his fatal sickness, "If I had served God as diligently as I have done the king, he would not have given me over in my gray hairs. But this is the just reward that I must receive for my diligent pains and studies that I have had to do him service, not regarding my service to God, but only to satisfy his pleasure."]

Wolsey is one of the most misjudged characters in history. The key to his conduct is his unique position upon the border between the middle and the modern age. He was essentially a mediævalist; yet he felt the pulses of the new day, although he did not welcome it; indeed, he would fain have turned it back. He was very proud and ambitious, skilful in diplomacy, a friend and patron of learning, as is attested by his endowment of Christ College, Oxford. He was a theologian of the scholastic pattern, a student of Aquinas, and at the same time a jurist of ability. His idea of church reformation extended no farther than external matters of discipline; but even these he was in no condition to carry out, being, unhappily, guilty of too many breaches of the moral and statute law.

WOLTERSdorFF, Ernst Gottlieb, b. at Friedrichsfelde, near Berlin, May 31, 1725; d. at Bunzlau, near Breslau, Dec. 17, 1761. He studied at Halle, and was appointed pastor of Bunzlau in 1748, and, later on, also director of the Orphan Asylum, an institution modelled after the Francke institution in Halle. Though not without merit as a preacher and pedagogue, it was principally as hymn-writer Woltersdorff acquired his reputation. The first collected edition of his hymns appeared in 1750; the last, in 1849. Many of his hymns have been translated by Miss Catharine Winkworth and others, and will be found in the Lyra Germanica and elsewhere.

WOMAN. There is no more striking contrast between the nations which are under the influence of Christianity, and the nations which are not, than the difference in the position of woman.

This article will give a brief statement of the status assigned to her among Pagan nations and Mohammedans, in the Old Testament and under the Christian system.

1. Pagan Nations. In the great ancient monarchies of the Orient the condition of woman was a debased one. She was the servant of man, not his equal. Polygamy prevailed, and divorce was easy. The penal code of Ashur brings out the inferiority of woman in its statement of the rule of divorce: "If a husband say unto his wife, 'Thou art not my wife,' he shall pay half a mina, and be free. But, if a woman repudiate her husband, she shall be drowned in the river" (George Smith: Assyrian Discoveries). In Europe, among the Greeks and the Romans, woman was held in higher respect. Homer casts a halo around the early Greek woman; but, at the period when art and literature were achieving their highest triumphs, the type of woman was the courtesan Aspasia, whom Socrates invited "to talk on the question, how she might ply her occupation with most profit." Later Roman historians and poets give an attractive picture of the Roman matron of the days of the republic. From the earliest period, however, the wife was regarded as a piece of property, destitute of legal rights, and absolutely under the control of the father of the household (Mommson: History of Rome, i. 90). In the later periods of Roman history, the immorality of Roman women, and the utter laxness of the marriage-relation, was the butt of satirists and the grief of moralists. Ovid, Horace, and Propertius agree that female virtue was not to be found at Rome. Seneca, in a famous sentence, says, "The ladies count their years, not by the consuls, but by the number of their husbands." Tertullian, a Christian writer of the latter part of the second century, said, "The women marry in order to be divorced, and are divorced in order to marry." The Teutonic tribes from the beginning seem to have respected womanhood. Tacitus speaks especially of this fact. But, even among the Teutonic tribes, wives were articles of purchase and sale. Amongst the heathen nations which have been opened up to commerce during this century, the condition of woman is a degraded one. From the Indian tribes of America, who make their wives do all the slavish work, and the Fiji-Islanders, whose princes were accustomed to lay the four corners of their residences upon the bodies of four women buried alive, to the East Indies, where the practice of the suttee (burning the wives on the funeral-pyre of their husbands) prevailed till English law abolished it, women are still relegated to the languor and inanity of the zenana, and widows (of whom there is estimated to be twenty millions), at however tender an age they are left in that condition, are condemned to perpetual widowhood. Mohammedanism is no better than Paganism in its treatment of woman, practises polygamy, treats woman as an inferior creature, and erects the harem.

2. In the Old Testament. — The account of the creation of woman (Gen. ii. 21-24) accords, at the very opening of the Hebrew Scriptures, the position of a helpmeet to man, which she did not occupy in the practice of other Oriental nations. Polygamy was to some extent practised among the early Hebrews, and attained to alarming proportions at the palace under David, especially Solomon and his successors. But monogamy was the rule; and the laws of the Pentateuch, while they do not prohibit polygamy, at least mitigate and discourage it (Exod. xxi. 8; Lev. xv. 18). The laws designed to alleviate the evil of the practice of forcing female prisoners of war into a state of concubinage witness to the Hebrew regard for the rights of woman (Deut. xxi. 11-14). Divorce was regulated, and the only ground upon which it is granted is indicated in Deut. xxiv. 1. Marriage evidently came to be regarded as a sacred relation, as is evident from the fact that some of the prophets depict God as occupying the marriage-relation to the theocratic people, as well as from single passages (e.g., Mal. ii. 16). The esteem of the Hebrew people for women is further shown in the important part accorded to some of them in their history, and the prominence with which they are mentioned in the patriarchal and Mosaic periods. Sarah's history is not only given at some length, but at her death Abraham, so it is reported, "came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her" (Gen. xxiii. 2). The account of the meeting of Isaac and Rebekah still affords language suitable to the marriage-service. Miriam, Deborah, Hannah, Huldah, and others, are illustrations of the freedom which was accorded to women, and the esteem in which they were held. The picture which is given in Prov. xxxi. of a faithful housewife was only possible where the ideal of womanhood was a high one. There seems to have been comparative freedom of intercourse between the sexes in the early periods of Jewish history (comp. the account of the women meeting Saul and David after victory, 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7, etc.); but in the later periods it was restricted (2 Macc. iii. 19; 3 Macc. i. 18 sqq.). The apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus implies a waning esteem for woman in such statements as "the badness of men is better than the goodness of women."

3. In the New Testament.—It has been under Christianity alone that woman has been able to occupy the position assigned to her at the creation,—of social equality with man. Our Lord, in the question of divorce, referred the petitioners back to the institution of monogamic marriage in Genesis. The spirit of the New Testament is unfavorable to woman's degradation or inferiority, as it is to the cruelties of slavery. The gospel offers to woman an equal right with man to its promises and rewards, and declares that in Christ there is no distinction of male and female (Gal. iii. 28). The Lord found some of his intimate friends among women (Mary, Martha, etc.), overcame the barriers of prejudice in holding with a woman of Samaria one of the most refreshing conversations ever recorded (John iv.), allowed mothers to bring their children to him, performed works of mercy upon them (Matt. xv. 21-28, etc.), and pronounced upon the act of one woman the most splendid encomium that ever passed human lips (Mark xiv. 9). Women stood over against the cross (Luke xxiii. 49), were the first to visit the sepulchre, and the first to receive the revelation of the risen Lord (John xx. 1 sqq.). In the history of the early church they took an active part. Women were present at the first meeting of the disciples after the ascension (Acts i. 14).

They were among the early converts of the apostles' preaching (v. 14), received baptism (viii. 12), and were steadfast under persecution (viii. 3). Paul's first convert in Europe was a woman; and her name (Lydia) is given, while that of the jailer of Philippi is withheld (xvi.). She is a model of womanly reserve and hospitality (xvi. 15, 40). Dorcas is a representative of woman's work of charity among the sick and poor (ix. 36-39); and Priscilla, who expounded the way of God more perfectly to Apollos (xviii. 26), is a representative of another kind of labor, recognized in the New Testament as proper to woman,—that of instruction, at least in private; for Paul seems to refuse to woman the right of speaking in the public meetings of the congregation (1 Cor. xiv. 31 sq.; 1 Tim. ii. 9 sqq.). Paul distinctly refers in Rom. xvi. to Phoebe, Persis, and other women as efficient fellow-helpers in the spread of the gospel. The annals of the first several centuries include the names of women (Blandina, Perpetua, etc.) among the Christian martyrs, and depict their history and influence (Monica, Paula, etc.). Pagan society was startled at the freedom with which Christian women went about on errands of charity. "What heathen will suffer his wife to go about from one street to another, to the houses of strangers, to the meanest hovels indeed, to visit the heathen? What heathen will allow her to steal away to the dungeon to kiss the chain of the martyr?" (Tertullian.) Councils like that of Arles, 314 A. D., emphasized the sacredness of the marriage-tie. The influence of Christianity in producing the conception of the dignity of womanhood in the human mind is attested at a later period by the Madonnas of art and the false honor put upon Mary in the Roman-Catholic system. The Mormon revival of the institution of polygamy is a return (under the cover of the practices of some Old-Testament characters) to Paganism.

WOODD, Basil, b. at Richmond, Surrey, Aug. 5, 1760; d. in London, April 12, 1831; was graduated at Trinity College, Oxford; and ordained, 1783. He was lecturer at St. Peter's, Cornhill, 1781-1808; morning preacher at Bentinck Chapel, Marylebone, 1785-1831; chaplain to the Earl of Leicester, and rector of Drayton Beauchamp in Buckinghamshire, once held by Hooker. A short memoir of him appeared 1831. He published sundry tracts, etc., and a Collection of Psalms and Hymns, 1794, containing some originals. In subsequent editions this was expanded, till it embraced a complete original version of the Psalms. Some of these renderings, and of his hymns, have been more or less used. F. M. BIRD.

WOODS, Leonard, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Princeton, Mass., June 19, 1774; d. at Andover, Aug. 21, 1854. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1796, and from 1798 to 1808 was pastor of the church in Newbury, Mass.; and on the formation of Andover Seminary he became professor of theology, and held this position until his retirement in 1846, after which he devoted himself to a history of Andover Seminary, which he never finished, and to preparing his lectures for the press. He was one of the founders of the American Tract Society, the American Education Society, American Temperance Society, American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (of whose prudential committee he was a member for twenty-five years). He was a champion of orthodox Calvinism against the assaults of Drs. Ware, Buckminster, and Channing. Dr. H. B. Smith said he was "emphatically the 'judicious' divine of later New-England theology." His writings embrace Letters to Unitarians, Andover, 1820; Reply to Dr. Ware's Letters to Trinitarians and Calvinists, 1821; Remarks on Dr. Ware's Answer, 1822; Lectures on The Inspiration of the Scriptures (1829, Glasgow, 1838), on Church Government (New York, 1843), on Swedenborgianism (1846); Memoirs of American Missionaries, Andover, 1833; Doctrine of Perfection, 1841; Reply to Mr. Mahan (upon this subject), 1841; Theological Lectures, Andover, 1849, 1850, 5 vols.; Theology of the Puritans, 1851. WOODS, Leonard, jun., D.D., LL.D., son of the preceding; b. in Newbury, Mass., Nov. 24, 1807; d. in Boston, Tuesday, Dec. 24, 1878. He was graduated at Union College, 1827, and at Andover Seminary, 1830; taught in the latter institution for a year; was ordained by the Third Presbytery of New York, 1833; editor of the New-York Literary and Theological Review, 1834-38; professor of sacred literature in Bangor (Me.) Theological Seminary, 1836-39; and president of Bowdoin College (Me.), 1839-66. In 1867 he visited Europe, under a commission to secure materials for a documentary history of Maine. He secured a work by Dr. J. G. Kohl of Bremen, On the Discovery of North America, and a copy of an important unpublished work by Richard Hakluyt, A Discourse on Western Planting, written in 1584. These were published in the second series of the Maine Historical Collections (1869 and 1877). The first he edited; and for the second he had collected much valuable illustrative material, when, in January, 1874, a fire destroyed it all. His only independent theological publication was his translation of George C. Knapp's Lectures on Christian Theology (New York and Andover, 1831-33, 2 vols.), which has been widely used, and is still in print. Dr. Woods received the degree of D.D. from Harvard, 1846, and of LL.D. from Bowdoin, 1866. He never married. He was famous for oratory, and exerted by his peculiar social gifts a wide and elevating influence. See the Memorial Discourse of Rev. Dr. C. C. EVERETT, on July 9, 1879, in Collections Maine Historical Society, vol. viii., Portland, 1881; also

WOOLSTON, Thomas, English deistic writer; b. at Northampton, 1669; d. in London, Jan. 27, 1732-33. He was elected fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and took degree of B.D. He wrote several theological works before his six Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour, London, 1727-29, in which he very coarsely and offensively assailed the historicity of the miracles, declaring that their records are purely allegorical. For this bold theory he was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and a hundred pounds' fine; and, because he could not pay, he died in prison. There is reason to believe that Woolston was insane. His study of Origen doubtless infected him with a love of allegorizing, and may have disordered his mind. WORCESTER, the seat of an English bishopric since 680, a city on the left bank of the Severn, 102 miles west-north-west of London, with a population of 33,221. Its cathedral is in the form of a double cross. It was originally built by Bishop Oswald, 983, but since twice burnt and rebuilt. It has since 1859 been restored. It has a central tower 193 feet high. See the diocesan history of Worcester by Rev. I. GREGORY SMITH and Rev. PHILIPS ONSLOW, London, 1883.

WORCESTER, Samuel, D.D., b. in Hollis, N.H., Nov. 1, 1770; d. at Brainerd, a mission station in East Tennessee, June 7, 1821, in the fifty-first year of his age. Several of his ancestors were eminent for their piety: two of them were clergymen. Three of his brothers also were clergymen: one of them was the celebrated Noah Worcester, D.D. Dr. Samuel was graduated at Dartmouth College in the year 1795. He pursued his theological studies mainly with his lifelong friend, Rev. Samuel Austin, D.D., a noted Hopkinsian divine, then pastor at Worcester, Mass., afterwards president of the Vermont University. He was ordained at Fitchburg, Mass., Sept. 27, 1797. Here his sermons bore the impress of high Calvinism or Hopkinsianism. They were pungent in their appeals to the conscience, were delivered with great solemnity, and at length excited an opposition of uncommon violence. He was dismissed Sept. 8, 1802, after a ministry of four years and eleven months. On the 20th of April, 1803, he was installed pastor of the Tabernacle Church in Salem, Mass. Here he was honored as a man of clear mind, positive convictions, firmness of will, steadfastness of Christian principle. In 1804 he received and declined an appointment to the professorship of theology in Dartmouth College. In 1810 he was elected the first corresponding secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The severe labors of this secretaryship combined with his pastorate shattered his health. In July, 1819, he received the aid of a colleague pastor, Rev. Elias Cornelius. In January, 1821, the state of his health compelled him to seek a southern climate, and he made a visit to the missionary stations among the Cherokee and Choctaw Indians. In a mission family among the Choctaws he died. The eulogies written or spoken in regard to him by Jeremiah Evarts, Esq., Dr. Leonard Woods, and Dr. Elias Cornelius, were admirable specimens of biography. In 1852 his Memoir was published, in two duodecimo volumes, by his son, Rev. Samuel M. Worcester, D.D.

Dr. Worcester was distinguished by the vast amount of labor which he performed in connection with the foreign missionary enterprise. Either he or Dr. Samuel Spring, or both together, originated the idea of forming the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The detailed plan of the board was doubtless formed mainly by Dr. Worcester. He wrote the first ten, which are in some respects the most important, Annual Reports of this society.

As an author he was noted for his logical acumen, and vigorous, pointed style. Twenty-seven of his sermons were published during his life, and a volume of additional sermons after his death. Besides his sermons, he published nine pamphlets, some of them controversial; three of them being his remarkable Letters to Rev. Dr. William E. Channing. He edited two Hymn-Books,—one in 1814, entitled Christian Psalmody; another in 1818, entitled Watts's Entire and Select Hymns. The latter has been much celebrated. He published many articles in the periodicals of his day. For five years he was editor-in-chief of the Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, which was afterward united with the Pamphlet, and still later with the Missionary Herald, the present organ of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. WORDSWORTH, Christopher, D.D., youngest brother of the poet; b. at Cockermouth, Cumberland, June 9, 1774; d. at Buxted, Sussex, Feb. 2, 1846. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected fellow, 1798; entered into holy orders, and, after holding various preferments, was master of Trinity College from 1820 till 1841. He then retired to his rectory of Buxted-with-Uckfield, which he had held since 1820. He is best remembered for his Ecclesiastical Biography, or, lives of eminent men connected with the history of religion in England from the commencement of the Reformation to the Revolution (London, 1810, 6 vols.; 4th ed., 1853, 4 vols.), and for his writings in defence of King Charles's claim to be the author of Ekim Basilike.

WORKS, GOOD. The sharp distinction which Paul made between law and gospel, between justification by faith and justification by good works, naturally lost its prominence in Christian teaching with the overthrow of Paganism. From her own experience, and that a dearly-paid-for experience too, the ancient church had gained the double conviction, that nothing but faith is able to keep man in true communion with Christ, and that a faith which does so necessarily must produce a thorough regeneration of practical life. The relation, however, between faith and good works, and between them and salvation, had not yet been made the subject of critical reflection; and was theologically so loosely fixed, that the older Fathers could content themselves with placing faith and works mechanically beside each other as equally necessary to salvation; sometimes emphasizing the former, but sometimes also emphasizing the latter.

Meanwhile, Gnosticism arose, with its dispar-agement of the Old Testament, and its inclination towards an antinomistic libertinism. It became necessary for the church to place the inherent connection between the Old and the New Testament in the right light; but in so doing she happened to adopt a little more of the Old Testament type than was good, and in course of time the gospel itself became a nova lex. The more perfectly Christianity was developed as a social and political institution, the more frequently an external legality took the place of that faith which regenerates man from within: the more firmly the church established herself as the representative of God and Christ on earth, the more easily observance of merely ecclesiastical ordinances, rites, and penances, was mistaken for works of true moral worth. At last faith itself became, in the form of obedience to the church, a meritorious and obligatory work. But a faith, which, according to the definition of the schoolmen, simply consisted in assent to the dogmas of the church (fides informis) could not be vindicated as the alone sufficient power of salvation. On the contrary, it became necessary to define the faith which proves itself in works (fides caritate formata) as the true condition of salvation; and the distinction which was made between præceptis and consiliis evangelicis finally brought forth the delusion of a surplus of good works, — opera supererogationis.

The doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church concerning the insufficiency of faith to salvation, and the necessity of good works, was the point at which the Reformers aimed their arrows; and they hit. The strength of the truth, the clear words of Scripture, and the irrefragable testimony of thousands of people,—to whom their faith was their sole hope, but also their sure confidence,—finally gained the victory; and the words of Paul, "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," became the banner around which the evangelical churches rallied their forces. Afterwards Leibnitz and after him several recent theologians have characterized the controversy between the Roman-Catholic and the evangelical churches, concerning the relation between faith and works, as a mere play of words. But that is certainly a mistake. It is true that both parties agree in the necessity of good works; and the meaningless exaggeration of the principle of the Reformation which appeared in the Majoristic controversy, that good works are detrimental to salvation, found its due rebuke in the Formula Concordiæ. But they differ widely in their conceptions of justification and good works. As above mentioned, Roman-Catholic theology transforms the practical realization of an inner, ethical ideal into a mere submission to the ordinances of the church; and it is led to do so by confounding justification and sanctification, between which Protestant theology makes a definite distinction. In Protestant theology, justification means the forgiveness of sin by the grace of God for the sake of Christ; but in Roman-Catholic theology it means something more,—a justitia infusa; that is, sanctification. J. H. FRANZ BEYER.

WORLD. In itself the idea of the world has no religious character. Nevertheless, as the world is the object of the divine will and the theatre of human activity, the idea which man forms of it exercises a powerful influence on all his fundamental religious ideas, — those of God and man, of revelation and salvation, etc. We give below a few remarks illustrative of this idea as it occurs in the Bible.

The Old Testament has no particular word corresponding to our universe. When the Hebrews wanted to express that idea, they used the phrase "heaven and earth." Heaven again they considered from a double point of view, — as connected with the earth, and forming part of a grand totality, and as the abode of God in contradistinction to the earth as the abode of man. Considered from the first point of view, heaven appears to be very closely connected with the earth. It is, indeed, a geogony, and not a cosmogony, which is given in the first chapter of Genesis; and every thing which is said of the firmament serves simply to image forth and explain its immediate apparition. It must be firmly secured on pillars in order not to fall down (Job xxvii. 11; 2 Sam. xx. 8); gates lead into it (Gen. xxviii. 17); the stars are fixed to its vault (Gen. i. 14); light and rain and lightning break through it (Job xxxviii. 24 sqq.). From this view of heaven to that as the abode of God, the transition is made through the observation that the great stars rule the earth (Gen. i. 16). The recognition of fixed seasons, of an established order, etc., shows that the Hebrews had a feeling of the existence of natural laws; but neither they nor any other Semites ever firmly grasped that idea. Natural laws are to them the "ordinances of heaven" (Job xxxviii. 33; Ps. civ. 19); and the ordinances of heaven shall forever be a secret to man, because the exact knowledge of them is a privilege of the Divine Wisdom. Between the action of the forces of nature and the highest Cause the Hebrews established a direct connection, in which the heavenly bodies played only a subordinate part as mediators; and this conception prevented them from developing a natural science, in the strict sense of the word. They never reached the Greek idea of a κοσμος, — a world with an inherent, informing order, which man can learn to know, though only gradually and approximately. On the other hand, they escaped the idea of a fate which might prove a barrier even to the will of God; and they were never entangled in that dread intellectual conflict between the order of nature and Divine Providence, which, from the ancient philosophy, crept into modern thought, and found expression in the deism of the last and the pantheism of the present century.

In accordance with its immediate appearance, the Hebrews generally describe the earth as a circle (Isa. xl. 22; Job xxii. 11) resting on the mighty floods of the ocean (Ps. xxiv. 2, lxxv. 3). Often, however, they also speak of the four corners, or ends, or wings, of the earth, taking the image from a square mantle (Isa. xi. 12; Job xxxviii. 13). In determining the four sides of the earth, they, like the Greeks, and, indeed, like most other people, began by facing east, and placing north to the left, south to the right. Towards the north was the sombre region: the highest mountains were there, especially the holy mountain, the mount of the congregations (Isa. xiv. 13); the cherub, indicating the divine presence, stood there (Ezek. xxviii. 14). As a rule Jehovah came from the north (Ps. xlviii. 3; Ezek. i. 4); and there were the beginnings of the human race, the first time at Eden, the second time at Ararat. Below the earth was Sheol, the abode of the dead (see art. Hades). This must not be understood, however, as if in the above passages, and in others of similar import, the sacred writers ever proposed to give a lesson in geography, or geology, or any other department of science. On the contrary, the freedom and manifoldness of the similes employed give irrefragable evidence that this whole group of ideas were never treated as articles of faith. They can even not be considered as fixed popular opinions. They were simply poetical objects, with which the imagination was at liberty to play, in order to produce a more striking and impressive representation of the grandeur, wisdom, and goodness of God. To the Hebrew, man was the only being on earth of absolute interest: the dead and dumb sphere lay far below him, and was simply his dominion (Gen. i. 28). To the Hebrew, the human world was the real world; and the unity of that world, that is, the unity of the human race and of its relation to God, the Creator and the Judge, was an idea which arose with the religion of Jehovah, culminated in the great prophet, and never died completely out, though it was reduced into a mere caricature of itself by the particularism and pride of the Pharisees. See, concerning the Old-Testament view of the world in general, C. VON LINGERKE: Kanaan, 1824; H. KÖNIG: Die Theologie der Psalmen, 1857.

In the New Testament the idea of the world as the human world received a powerful development by being placed in opposition to the idea of a divine world, — the kingdom of heaven. It then came to mean the history of the human race so far as that history lies outside of the influence of Christ, and grows up the mere product of the forces and spirit of nature. Darkness, that is, blindness, is the chief characteristic of the world in this sense of the word; for by its own strength the world is utterly unable to grasp the truth, and see God (John iii. 27, 31; xvii. 25). But by itself the darkness is not sin or guilt; for it is simply the inherent nature of the world, and not an effect of the fall of the human race and of original sin. It becomes sin, however, and leads to guilt, when it rises into a denial of the light; and, just as the mere love of light develops the faculty of acquiring it, so the hatred of light destroys that very faculty, etc. A comparison between the various ideas of the world which have been developed in the course of Christian civilization, and the typical idea as it is contained in the New Testament, would be a most instructive task, but is beyond the compass of this article. One of the principal points of such an investigation would be the idea of Augustine. It exercised great influence on the Reformers, more especially on those of the Calvinist type; and the preponderance of this influence explains why, during the whole course of its history, Calvinism has preferred to form congregations in the midst of the world, instead of attempting completely to overcome the world. In the Lutheran Church the idea of the world had for a long time only theoretical interest: confidence in the power of their baptism and the purity of their doctrine made out of the world something vague to the eyes of the Lutherans, — something entirely outside of the pale of their own church. It was Spener and the Pietists who first, by applying regeneration and sanctification as the true tests of any realization of Christianity in individual life, made the idea of the world of practical importance also in the Lutheran Church. [T. FORSTER: Ueber ethische u. ästhetische Weltanschauung, Halle, 1882.]

WORMS, one of the oldest towns of Germany, situated on the Rhine, with about fifteen thousand inhabitants; played on four different occasions a very prominent part in the history of the Reformation, as once previously in the religious history of Germany.

1. The first of these occasions was on Sept. 23, 1122, when the terms of the CONCORDAT were read before a vast multitude assembled in a meadow near the city. This Concordat ended the contest between emperor and pope, which had been going on for fifty years. According to it, the emperor, on his part, gave up all investiture by ring and staff; allowed free election and consecration to all churches, according to ecclesiastical law. The pope, on his part, conceded that the election of German bishops and abbots should take place in the presence of the emperor, but without simony or violence; that, in case an election was disputed, the emperor, on the advice of the archbishop and bishops, should take the side of the right party. The bishop elect should receive the temporalities of his see by the imperial sceptre, and obliged himself to perform the accompanying duties. In other parts of the empire, the bishop, six months after consecration, should receive his temporalities in like manner, on the same conditions, but without any payment. The Concordat was ratified by the first Lateran Council, March, 1123. For a further account of it, see HASE: Kirchengeschichte, 10th ed., Leipzig, 1877, pp. 221-225; ROBERTSON: *History Ch. 2. The DIET of Worms, 1521, before which Luther was summoned to appear, closed the first period of the Reformation, showing to the world that the movement started by Luther was something greater, and likely to take quite another turn, than that started by Hus. Luther arrived Tuesday, April 16, in the forenoon, and was lodged in the house of the Knights of St. John. Great excitement prevailed in the city: thousands of people thronged the streets through which he passed. The next day (Wednesday, April 17), at six o'clock in the afternoon, he appeared before the diet, assembled in the episcopal palace, where the emperor and King Ferdinand staid. Johann Eck, a brother of the disputant of Leipzig fame, and official to the Bishop of Worms, addressed him in the name of the emperor, and demanded that he should recant. Luther answered by asking time to consider, and a respite of twenty-four hours was granted him. The impression he made was not so very favorable. The emperor wondered that "that man should have written those books;" and, with a fling at the uncourtly manners of the monk, he added, "He shall never make me a heretic." Thursday, April 18, at six o'clock in the afternoon, he again appeared before the diet; and, the demand of recantation having been repeated, he answered with a Latin speech, which has been preserved in his own draught. It is short, and clothed throughout in respectful terms; but every sentence is stamped with that decision which characterizes the action of natural forces, and which, when met with in human life, almost inspires with horror. And it was well delivered: in every corner of the hall it was heard that not one word would be retracted. A short dispute followed between Luther and Eck, ending with the famous words by Luther, "Here I stand. I can do no otherwise. So help me God! Amen!" The emperor left in a rage. It had become quite dark in the hall; and the Spaniards filled the room with their hisses and yells, while outside in the streets the crowd growled and threatened. When Luther passed by the seat of Duke Erick of Brunswick, an inveterate Romanist, the duke saw that the man was exhausted almost to fainting, and handed him his big silver mug with Einbecker beer. When he came home to his lodgings, he threw up his arms, and cried out with joy, "Now I am through." Some further negotiations with a committee took place, though without any result. April 28, Luther left Worms. See J. KÖSTLIN: Martin Luther, Elberfeld, 1875. On June 25, 1868, a colossal monument of Luther, with figures of the principal Reformers and of the cities of Spire, Magdeburg, and Augsburg, was unveiled in Worms.

3, 4. Later on, two COLLOQUIES took place in Worms, between Protestant and Roman-Catholic theologians, for the purpose of bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties without having recourse to armed force. The first, January, 1541, was presided over by Cardinal Granvella. On the Protestant side were present Melancthon, Calvin, Cruciger, Grynaeus, Menius, etc.; on the Roman-Catholic, Cochlaeus, Eck, Nausea, etc. Though, no doubt, both parties met with the sincere intention of doing their utmost in order to avoid war, it soon became evident that no compromise was possible unless some very strong influence from without could be brought to bear on the negotiations; and by an imperial decree of Jan. 18, 1541, the assembly was transferred to Ratisbon, where the diet was about to meet. The second colloquy, the so-called "Consultation of Worms," took place in 1557 under the presidency of Julius von Pflug, Bishop of Naumburg; but, beside Melancthon, the president was probably the only one present who took a real interest in the union. The Protestants were represented by Melancthon, Prenz, Murlin, Schnepf, etc.; the Roman Catholics, by Sidonius, Bishop of Merseburg, Canisius, Staphylus, Wigelius, etc. It seems to have been the object of the Roman Catholics to break up the compact unity of the Protestant party; and, if so, they succeeded. In the sixth sitting, Sidonius demanded a formal declaration, whether the whole Protestant Church accepted the Calvinist doctrine of the Lord's Supper, the Osian doctrine of justification, the Flacian doctrine de servo arbitrio, etc.; and immediately the internal discord of the Protestant party broke out in full blaze. The assembly finally dispersed without having arrived at any definite result. The acts of these two colloquies are found in Corpus Reformatorum, vols. iii., iv., and ix. See also SALIG: Historie der augsburgischen Confession, vol. iii.

WORSHIP. The earliest account we have of Christian worship after the close of the canon is from a Pagan source. When Pliny the Younger entered upon his proconsulship of Bithynia in Asia Minor, about A.D. 110, he found the number of Christians already so great, and the heathen worship so seriously undermined, that he was obliged by the popular clamor to exert himself against the new religion. Even under the cruel application of the torture, he could find out nothing worse than that the Christians were accustomed to meet together on a set day, before dawn, and sing responsive hymns to Christ as their God, and to pledge themselves in a sacrament to abstain from every form of evil, to commit no theft, rapine, or adultery, to falsify no word, and betray no trust. At a later period in the day they met together again, and joined in a harmless supper (Pliny to Trajan, Let. 95). No higher testimony could be desired to the purity of the Christian life and worship. The next account is from a Christian source, and, as might be expected, somewhat more particular. Justin Martyr, in his first Apology, says, that on the day called Sunday, all the Christians of a neighborhood meet together in one place, and listen to the reading of the Gospels and the Prophets. The presiding bishop preaches a sermon, exhorting them to holy living. All stand up, and pray. Bread is then brought in, with wine and water, the sacramental wine being invariably diluted. After further prayers, to which the people respond with audible "Amens," the body and blood of Christ are distributed. Portions are sent to the sick, and a collection is taken for the poor. Justin adds, "Sunday is the day on which we all meet together; because it is the first creative day, on which God called forth the light out of darkness, and on which also Jesus Christ our Saviour rose from the dead." The first important change in public worship to be noticed after this is the division of the service into two parts, — the service (missa) of the catechumens, which was open to all, and consisted of prayer, reading, and preaching; and the service for church-members (missa fidelium). The central part of this was the Lord's Supper, which was celebrated as a Christian mystery. More and more the "Eucharist" came to be the grand feature in Christian worship, about which all the other parts were grouped. A regular order was formed for its administration, which eventually grew into the liturgies of Basil and Chrysostom, and the Latin Sacramentaries of Gelasius, Leo, and Gregory. It was not till the period of long tranquillity that both preceded and followed the Decian persecution, that the Christian house of worship ventured to confront the heathen temple. During the last half of the century many churches were reared in Egypt, Syria, Asia Minor, Italy, Gaul, and Britain. The signal for the last great storm that was to break on the Christian party was given by tearing down what Eusebius calls a "great and splendid church" that had boldly reared itself in full view of the imperial palace at Nicomedia.

The preaching of the gospel continued to be an essential part of all Christian worship; often brief, simple, and expository, sometimes elaborate and rhetorical. The great bishops both of the East and the West have left us illustrious proofs of their homiletical eloquence. These have been preserved to us, partly through the care with which they were written out by their authors, and partly by the labors of shorthand writers who took them down as they fell from the lips of the speakers. As compared with the best modern sermons, they are defective in the critical analysis of the text, in sobriety of interpretation, breadth of discussion, and cogency of practical application. By the side of the efforts of Bourdaloue, Saurin, Krummacker, Robert Hall, Spurgeon, or the best preachers of America, they are signally inferior.

In accordance with apostolic precept, the disciples spake to each other in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. A body of devout lyrical poetry began to be formed, — the work of Clement, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Hilary, and others, — which, during the middle and Reformation ages, was swelled to an immense volume by the contributions of many Christian poets. The church-singing was at first only a sort of monotonous (hypophonic) cantillation, in which all took part. This was improved into elaborate choral singing, which, like that of Milan, became, in the judgment of Augustine at least, too artificial and dramatic. The effect of this change was to exclude the people from taking part in the service. Congregational singing perished. Church music in all Roman and in many Protestant churches exhibits the furthest possible departure from the apostolic and primitive conception of that office.

During the darker part of the middle ages, or from the eighth to the twelfth centuries, there was little if any thing that can be regarded as the preaching of the gospel. The great cathedrals that were built after the end of the Crusades were unadapted to that purpose. They were suited only to a dramatic show of worship, with altars, pictures, processions, and other features appealing to the spirit of ignorant, popular devotion. The liturgies, however, were greatly improved; and noble hymns were composed, which still serve to express the deepest sentiments of the Christian heart. With the opening of the Reformation the function of preaching, which had begun, indeed, during the preceding century, to recover from its long neglect, re-asserted its divine right, and again made a prominent part of public worship. Luther, Calvin, Knox, all the great Reformers and their disciples, preached indefatigably. The devotional element gradually dropped into the background, and the sermon came to fill nearly the entire scheme of divine worship. The use of prescribed forms of prayer became characteristic of episcopally constituted churches. Instead of a Liturgy, the English dissenters and the entire body of non-Episcopal churches in America conducted prayer by means of the extemporaneous effusions of the preacher. The defects to which this method is liable are pointed out in the Presbyterian Directory for Worship, in which the minister is charged to "prepare himself carefully for the right conduct of public prayer, that it may be performed with propriety and dignity, as well as to the profit of those who join in it, and that he may not disgrace that important service by mean, irregular, or extravagant effusions." Notwithstanding this admonition, the Presbyterian clergy continued to give so little attention to this part of their duty, that, about the close of the first quarter of the century, the venerable Dr. Miller of Princeton, one of the recognized leaders of that church, pointed out no less than eighteen separate faults into which they were accustomed to fall. This invariable tendency has led, from about the time of the publication of Dr. Miller's treatise, to a re-action in favor of the primitive mode of worship, by means of a partial Liturgy; and various works designed to encourage and assist that movement have been laid before the church. No marked change, however, in the forms of worship has yet been effected. Among the Scottish Presbyterians, a large and active society, embracing many distinguished members, lay and clerical, has devoted itself to the improvement of public worship, and has published several excellent liturgical works for that purpose. Their Euchologion, or Book of Common Order, has passed through four editions, and an improved fifth edition is about being issued (1883).

In the Roman-Catholic Church in America a marked change for the better in respect to public worship is to be noticed. Brought into immediate competition with a powerful and vigorous Protestantism, the Roman Church has been obliged to borrow something of its methods in self-defence. Its churches are mostly large, but not too large for the purposes of preaching; and the pews are often upholstered, and rented permanently by the same families. A sermon always makes a part of the service. The children are gathered into Sunday schools, in which the Catechism is taught, and hymns are sung to the popular tunes familiar to Protestant children.

In the department of hymnology a great development of activity has taken place, both in Europe and America, during the last half-century. Many new hymn and tune books have appeared, mostly worthy of high commendation, including from one thousand to fifteen hundred hymns each. A serious fault with some of them is the unauthorized "tinkering" of old and familiar hymns, at the discretion of the individual editor. The intrusion of modern "sentimental" hymns is another fault. The conference of Eisenach (1853) went to the opposite extreme, and adopted the principle of accepting no hymn of a later date than 1750. Many hymns are also objectionable as being too exclusively didactic. A hymn may properly include doctrine, reproof, or warning; but the great function of sacred song is the utterance of the devout emotions in praise to God: preaching hymns, in which the whole object, apparently, is to rouse and terrify the sinner, are illegitimate. The German collections are generally free from these faults. On the whole, the modern church worship must be regarded as more ornate and didactic, appealing more both to the intellect and the taste, than that of the earlier ages, and as having something the same relation to it that modern confessions have to the Apostles' Creed, or a finely constructed and furnished modern church to the bare basilica of the Nicene period. See HOMILETICS, HYMNOL-OGY, LITURGY, PRAYER-BOOK, and the literature there given.

SAMUEL MILES HOPKINS.

WOTTON, Sir Henry, a traveller, diplomatist, scholar; and poet: b. at Boughton, Malherbe, Kent, March 30, 1568; d. at Eton, December, 1639; was educated at Winchester and Oxford; lived mostly abroad: was for a time secretary to the Earl of Essex; knighted by James I. soon after his accession; three times minister to Venice, and in the intervals to Germany, the Netherlands, etc.; provost of Eton, 1625. His tracts, letters, etc., were collected, 1651-72, by Izaak Walton, as Reliquie Wottonianæ, with a memoir. Of his few poems, several, especially How happy is he born or taught, have a place among our sacred classics.

WOTTON, William, D.D., English divine; b. at Wrentham, Suffolk, Aug. 13, 1606; d. at Buxted, Essex, Feb. 13, 1726. In childhood he showed remarkable precocity; and when he was twelve years and a half old he was skilled in Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Greek, and Latin, besides in logic, philosophy, geography, and the arts and sciences. He entered Catherine Hall, Cambridge, in 1676; was passed B.A., January, 1679; M.A., 1683; and was elected fellow of St. John's College, 1685. He entered holy orders; in 1693 was rector of Middleton Keynes, Buckinghamshire; in 1705 prebendary of Salisbury. Among his learned works may be mentioned, Reflections upon Ancient and Modern Learning, London, 1694, 3d ed., 1705 (a reply to Sir William Temple's extravagant eulogy of the ancients); Miscellaneous Discourses relating to the Traditions and Usages of the Scribes and Pharisees in our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ's Time, 1718, 2 vols. (in vol. 2 are translations of the Mishna's Shabbath and Eruvin, two books on the sabbath).

WRITING AMONG THE HEBREWS. The Hebrew word Kattab denotes originally, to "engrave" in stone (Exod. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 15), metal (Exod. xxxix. 30; Job xix. 24; Isa. viii. 1; Hab. ii. 2), wood (Num. xvii. 3); then to "write." The discovery and first use of the art of writing is certainly at least as old as the times of Abraham, yet in the patriarchal age we meet with no absolutely certain traces of its employment by the Hebrews. But undoubtedly they made this art their own during their stay in Egypt; for here already we find Israelite officers who derived their name, shotrim, from "writing." All the more we may assume that Moses, brought up as he was in the Egyptian court, and instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts vii. 22), not only was acquainted with it, but was so practised in it that he could set down in writing the laws which were given to his people, and so insure them against that disfiguration which is the case of mere oral tradition. Nay, in the time of Moses, the art of writing is presupposed, and mentioned as being already known and in common use among the people (Exod. xvii. 14, xxiv. 4, xxxiv. 27, 28; Lev. xix. 28; Num. v. 23, xi. 26, xxxiii. 2; Deut. xvii. 17, 18, xxxi. 9, 19, 22, 24). The Shemitic alphabet, of which the Hebrew is merely a branch, was not invented by the Hebrews, neither was it invented by the Phœnicians. It was certainly invented and used by a Shemitic race, because it is adapted to the peculiarities of the Shemitic languages, and was developed out of the primitive type independently of Egypt in Babylonia, whence the Phœnicians got it, and were the instruments of communicating it to other nations.

The Shemitic primitive alphabet presents itself in a threefold stage of development, while it was contributing to the formation of the present Hebrew character. In its oldest (iconographical) state it exists in Phœnician monuments, both stones and coins. The letters, characterized generally by stiff, straight down-strokes, without regularity and beauty, were used among the Samaritans, and on coins struck under the Maccabæan princes. While the old character thus continued without much change among the Phœnicians and Samaritans, it had gradually altered among the Aramæans, and assumed somewhat of a cursive, or tachygraphical form, by opening the heads or tops of the letters, which were closed before, so that they presented themselves as two projecting points or ears, and by breaking the stiff down-strokes, which were either upright, or but slightly bent into horizontally inclined ones, to serve for union in writing. This character appears in a twofold form on Aramæan monuments. It is seen as an older and more simple one on the Carpentras stone, where it still inclines to the old writing, and is just beginning to deviate from it by opening the heads of the letters. It is also seen as a younger character, in inscriptions found among the ruins of Palmyra, departing very considerably from the primitive alphabet, by the open heads of the letters and by the horizontal strokes of union. The ancient character also underwent a similar process among the Jews. It is probable that the influence of the later Aramæan character (Palmyrene) contributed most to this effect, until the present Hebrew writing, the כָּתָב קִרְבֵּן [or square writing (so called on account of its angular form)] more commonly, called כָּתָב אֲשִׁירִי [the Assyrian writing], was formed. To give the characters more uniformity and symmetry, the calligraphic principle, or effort to write beautifully and ornamentally, came in use. Letters which had been joined together it divides, and attaches various ornamental flourishes to them, agreeably to current taste.

At what time the Hebrew writing thus altered passed from the Aramæans, or Syrians, to the Jews, it is very difficult to discover. In the Talmud, Origen, and Jerome, the change of the characters is ascribed to Ezra, who, after the captivity, is said to have introduced the square character for the old. [Hence it is called the Assyrian, meaning the Chaldæan writing, כָּתָב אֲשִׁירִי]. According to a tradition (Eusell., Chron. ad ann. 4720), Ezra is said to have invented the square writing, that the Jews might not become mixed with the Samaritans. This square writing was also called the "holy," in opposition to the more ancient, the כָּתָב רֵצֵן, i.e., the broken, irregular one, or כָּתָב עִבְרִי [Hebrew writing], which was now regarded as the "profane," and only in use among the Samaritans. But the fact that this character was still retained for a considerable time, and on account of its antiquity was used in the Maccabæan coinage, and that the Samaritans may have accepted it along with the Pentateuch, while, out of hatred to the Samaritans, the Jews may then have preferred the running hand, and may have perfected it calligraphically into the square character, shows that the square writing must have been introduced later. The name כָּתָב אֲשִׁירִי cannot, indeed, be held absolutely to determine the origin and home of the square character, since the meaning of the word אֲשִׁירִי is greatly disputed. Thus rabbi Jehudah [surnamed the Holy] explains it, "beatified," "sanctified." The same is to be said of the explanations "rectilinear writing" (Michaelis, Orient. Bibl. xxii. p. 133) and "straight, strong, firm writing" (Hupfeld). Although we cannot determine with precision the time at which the square character was perfected, still there is complete evidence that it cannot have taken place so late as the fourth century of the Christian era (as Kopp, Bilder-Schriften der Vorzeit, ii. 97 sq.). In the New Testament (Matt. v. 18) we find that the god is referred to as the smallest letter, which suits better the square character. The Talmud and Jerome designate those letters as similar, and exposed to change by mistake, which can only refer to the square character. [Comp. Pick, art. "The Old Testament in the Time of the Talmud," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia, vol. x. p. 187.] During the middle ages we find another kind of cursive writing, the rabinic, which is also a kind of square writing.

The question whether the Hebrew system of writing was merely a writing of consonants, or not, is still pending. According to Hupfeld, there were from the beginning three vowel-signs for the vowels a, i, and u. Of these, however, the first, the aleph, was used only with a commencing sound, and in a concluding sound it was not written; but every consonant was sounded with the a. Moreover, in the beginning, the a sound was very greatly predominant; and only as the language became developed, the other vowels became more frequent, — i and u, also e, o, ai, and au. Yet the writing was developed less rapidly than the pronunciation; and thus the vowel-marks · and ˆ were not applied everywhere, but only in ambiguous forms. In the later books of the Old Testament we find a manifest progress in the written symbols for the vowels, as the so-called scriptio plena comes much more frequently into use. At the time of the Alexandrian version the vocalization had not attained to its later perfection, and therefore in many cases it deviates from that which is now adopted. In the Targums it meets us in a much firmer and less variable form; and by the time of the Talmud it is thoroughly fixed, and it agrees essentially with the later vocalization; though it exhibits no traces of vowel-points (Hupfeld: Studien u. Kritiken, 1830, p. 549; Exercitatt. Æthiop. §§ 3-5; Hebrew Grammar, § 11). The first traces of diacritical signs we find in the marheton, the Samaritan diacritical line, and which is also found on Phœnician inscriptions.

The ancient Hebrews, like the ancients generally, had neither complete separation of words, nor complete scriptio continua; but they divided the sentences, and, for the most part, the words also, by little spaces, whilst closely connected words were frequently written without any break. But, when the regular square character was introduced, the separation of the individual words by little spaces also became universal. The Shemitic, with the exception of the Ethiopic, is written from right to left. The Hebrew has twenty-two letters, which, after the exile, were also used as numbers. In the old Hebrew writing, abbreviations were also used, as in the Phœnician.

The Writing-Material. — The earliest was either wood, metal, or stone. According to Herodotus, the skins of animals were the most ancient materials for writing books in Western Asia. Only at a later period the Egyptian paper, made from the coats of the papyrus, came widely into use among the Jews (comp. Hengstenberg: Beiträge ii. 186); and so did parchment afterwards, on which, no doubt, the original form of the Pentateuch was written in the antique form of a roll, with ink (Num. v. 23). According to Josephus (Antt. xii. 2, 10), parchment was used for the law; and this is customary up to this day. In the form of a roll the parchment seems to have been used in David's time. (Comp. Ps. xl. 7; Jer. xxxvi. 14 sq.; Ezek. ii. 9, 10; Zech. v. 1-4.) Writing utensils for hard materials were iron instruments, pencils, and chisel (Job xix. 24; Ps. xlv. 1; Jer. viii. 8, xvii. 1; Isa. viii. 1); for parchment or papyrus, a pen of reed, and ink, was used (3 John 13; 3 Macc. iv. 20). A penknife is mentioned, Jer. xxxvi. 23; and the inkhorn, in Ezek. ix. 2.

WULFRAM, St., b. at Milly in 650; d. in the monastery of Fontenelle, according to some in 695, according to others in 729 or 740. He was a monk in Fontenelle, and afterwards bishop of Sens, and made (685-689) a missionary tour among the Frisians, of which a fanciful report, highly ornamented with legendary fictions, is found in *Act. WÜRTEMBERG, The Kingdom of, has, according to the census of 1880, a population of 1,971,255 souls, of whom 1,361,412 are Protestants, 590,105 Roman Catholics, 13,326 Jews, etc. The constitution of the Protestant Church is consistorial. The highest legislative and administrative authority is, so far as regards purely ecclesiastical matters, vested in the consistory, composed of a president, a legal councillor, and seven ordinary councillors (five laymen and two ecclesiastics), who are all appointed by the king. Since 1818, however, there has been established alongside the consistory, and acting in unison with it, a series of parish councils, diocesan synods, and annual synod-general to which the membership is elective. The territory of the church is divided into six superintendencies, each with a "prelate" at its head, 49 deaneries, and 906 parishes with 1,021 pastors. The university of Tübingen has a faculty of Protestant theology, consisting of five ordinary professors, besides professors extraordinary and Privatdozenten. The Roman Catholics in Würtemberg form the episcopal diocese of Rottenburg, with 672 parishes and 946 priests, paid by the state. The university of Tübingen has also a faculty of Roman-Catholic theology consisting of six professors. The diocese of Rottenburg belongs to the ecclesiastical province of Freiburg, to which its relations have been arranged by the papal bull, Provida solersque, of Aug. 11, 1821. See O. SCHMID-SOHNKE: Die evangelische Diaspora Württembergs nach Entstehung u. gegenwärtigem Bestand, Stuttgart, 1879; K. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor at Berlin in 1851, and at Halle in 1861. His principal work is his Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre, Leipzig, 1860-62; 3d ed., 1874-75; Eng. trans. by Professor John P. Lacroix, New York, 1873, 2 vols. He also wrote Die Geschichte des Hidenthums, 1851-53, and Der Deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart, 1865; 2d ed., 1869. As a journalist and politician his motto was, "A Christian cannot be a democrat, nor can a democrat be a Christian."

He was graduated at the university of Glasgow, 1797; emigrated to America the same year; was tutor in the University of Pennsylvania; was ordained 1800; and from 1801 to 1852 he was pastor of the First Reformed Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia. During this time he was likewise professor in the Philadelphia theological seminary of his denomination (1809-51), of ancient languages in the University of Pennsylvania (1828-45), emeritus-professor (1845-52), and vice-provost of the university (1836-45). He wrote The Faithful Witness for Magistracy and Ministry upon a Scriptural Basis, Philadelphia, 1801, later eds.; Life of Rev. Alexander McLeod, D.D., New York, 1855. at Basel, where he had Leo Judae and Zwingli among his hearers; and was in 1507 made pastor in his native city. He preached openly against indulgences, the mass, the celibacy of priests, etc., and was in reality the first of the Swiss Reformers.

But when, in 1524, he married, he was deposed; and, though a large portion of the inhabitants sided with him, he did not succeed in establishing the Reformation in Biel. See HALLER: Geschichte d. prot. Ref. d. Kantons Bern, Luzern, 1836.

XAVIER. See FRANCIS XAVIER.

XIMENES DE CISNEROS, Francisco, b. at Torrelaguna in Castile, in 1436; d. at Roa, Nov. 8, 1517. He belonged to a family of old nobility, but without wealth or any other distinction. He was educated at Alcalá; studied at Salamanca; took holy orders; visited Rome, and returned in 1473 with an expective letter from the Pope on the archpriestship of Uzeda. The archbishop of Toledo felt provoked at the Pope's arrogance in giving away benefices in his diocese; and, as Ximenes would not yield his claim, he locked him up in a convent prison, and held him there for six years. Having been released, Ximenes was in 1480 appointed vicar-general to the bishop of Sigüenza, and in that position he gave evidences of an administrative talent of the highest order. But he suddenly broke off the brilliant career which opened before him, and entered the Franciscan monastery of San Juan de los Reyes in Toledo. The austerity of his ascetic practices, and the fervor of his preachings, soon made him a great name in this new field; but again he astonished the world, and retired to the lonely monastery of Our Lady of Castañar, where he built a hut with his own hands, and lived for several years as a hermit. In 1492 he was summoned back into the world by being appointed confessor to Queen Isabella. The position was of great political importance, as the queen used to confer with her confessor, not only on her private affairs, but also on public business; and Ximenes so completely gained the confidence of the queen, that in 1495 she made him archbishop of Toledo, and shortly after, also grand-inquisitor of Spain. The archbishopric of Toledo was probably, next to the papacy, the richest and most influential position in the church. Ximenes, however, continued to live like a monk; and, even when a bull from Rome ordered him to keep up a certain style answering to the dignity of his position, he continued in secret his ascetic practices, wearing the hair-shirt under his gorgeous robe, and sleeping on a wooden board. Though the relation between him and King Ferdinand had been very cool while Isabella lived, he did not lose his influence after her death: on the contrary, by his will the king made him regent of Spain during the minority of his heir, Charles V.; and Ximenes had the good fortune to die just as Charles landed in Asturia, probably without learning that his deposition was the first act of the king.

Ximenes was an ultramontanist and a fanatic. He opposed with all his might the translation of the Bible into the vernacular tongue, as a profa-nation and a dangerous measure; since common people (vulgar) respect only what they do not understand, while they despise any thing which becomes easily accessible to them. He also opposed the introduction of publicity in the transactions of the Inquisition. And when the newly converted Jews and Moors offered King Ferdinand, who was always in need of money, a considerable sum for the introduction of such a measure, Ximenes paid the king a still larger sum out of his own pocket in order to prevent the establishment of the reform. Against the conquered Moors he advocated the harshest measures, and it was he who persuaded the king and queen to give them the choice between conversion and banishment. On the other hand, he was perfectly sincere. He carried out the necessary reform of the Franciscan order in Spain, in spite of the interference of the general of the order and the Pope himself, and though more than one thousand monks emigrated in order to escape the severe discipline which he established. For the promotion of education and learning he did very much, though he was not himself a scholar. He founded the university of Alcalá. There had for more than two centuries been a flourishing school in the place, which he extended into a complete university, with forty-two professors,—six in theology proper, six in canon law, four in medicine, one in anatomy, one in surgery, eight in philosophy, one in moral philosophy, one in mathematics, four in Greek and Hebrew languages, four in rhetoric, and six in grammar. The erection of the many new and splendid buildings began in 1498, and was completed in 1508. Another magnificent undertaking of his was the publication of the Complutensian Polyglot (see POLYGLOT). But it was chiefly as a statesman that he earned his great fame. He even won the laurels of a general. In 1509, in his seventy-second year, he equipped at his own expense a brilliant armament, consisting of ten thousand foot, four thousand horse, and a fleet; crossed in person the Mediterranean; conquered Oran; and made forever an end of the Moorish piracy on the southern and south-eastern coasts of Spain.

YALE UNIVERSITY, in New Haven, Conn., owes its origin to the action of a few Congregational ministers, principally of the old New-Haven Colony, who met by agreement in 1700, and gave books in a formal way "for founding a college." The action of these ministers, however, at this time, was only the carrying into execution of a plan which had been conceived by the first settlers of New Haven more than sixty years before, — probably before they had left England, their native land. A charter was obtained from the General Court of Connecticut, Oct. 9, 1701; and the location of the college was fixed temporarily at Saybrook. The Rev. Abraham Pierson was elected rector; and in March, 1702, instruction was begun. The first Commencement was held at Saybrook, Sept. 13, 1702. As the college grew in importance, it began to be apparent that it would be worth something as a prize; and an attempt was made to capture it, and remove it to Wethersfield. A great struggle ensued, in which New Haven was at last successful. In 1716 the college was permanently established in the town which was its natural home, and where it had been the object of the hopes and efforts of successive generations. Just at this time, a considerable gift having been received from Elihu Yale of London, governor of the East India Company, a son of one of the original colonists, the trustees were enabled to erect a college building, to which, in 1718, at the first public commencement held in New Haven, they gave the name of their benefactor, — a name which was soon transferred to the institution itself.

According to the original charter of 1701, the government of the college was placed in the hands of a rector and ten fellows, all of whom were ministers. A new charter, more ample in its provisions, was obtained in 1745, in which the providing officer was styled the president. In 1792, in consideration of pecuniary assistance received from the State, the trustees voted that the governor, lieutenant-governor, and the six senior assistants (in 1818 called senators), should be added to their number. In 1866 the Legislature relinquished the privilege of being represented in the corporation by the six senators in favor of as many graduates, to be elected by their fellow-graduates. The arrangement for the terms of office of these members was so made, that there is every year an election of one graduate, who is to serve six years. All the departments of the college are under the control of this corporation, whose legal title is the "President and Fellows of Yale College in New Haven." The president is ex officio the head of each department, but each is practically independent of the others in the management of its internal affairs. The corporation alone has the power to give degrees, which are conferred on candidates, only after passing a satisfactory examination.

The college is thought to have been remarkably fortunate in its presidents, whose terms of office have been as follows: Abraham Pierson, 1701-07;

Samuel Andrew, 1707-19; Timothy Cutler, 1719-22; Elisha Williams, 1725-39; Thomas Clap, 1739-66; Naphtali Daggett, 1766-77; Ezra Stiles, 1777-95; Timothy Dwight, 1795-1817; Jeremiah Day, 1817-46; Theodore Dwight Woolsey, 1846-71; Noah Porter, 1871-

At first there was no permanent instructor besides the rector, who was assisted by tutors temporarily employed. In 1755 (public worship having been shortly before commenced on the college ground, and a church established) a professor of divinity was appointed, who was to be college pastor; and not long after, in 1771, a professor of mathematics, physics, and astronomy, was added to the corps of instructors. At the end of the first hundred years of the history of the college, its progress had been all that its founders could have anticipated. There had been a steady increase in the number of students and a marked enlargement in the range of studies required. But after 1800, under the presidency of the Rev. Timothy Dwight, a rapid development of the college began. Through the influence of Dr. Dwight, three recent graduates of the college — Jeremiah Day, Benjamin Silliman, and James L. Kingsley — were appointed professors. These three men, for half a century, — first as his co-adjutors, and after his death as colleagues, — labored together with great zeal and unbroken harmony to advance the interests of learning in the institution. As the prosperity of the country advanced, not only was the number of professors enlarged, but new departments were organized, as follows; medicine in 1812, theology in 1822, law in 1824, philosophy and the arts in 1847, the fine arts in 1864, and a department of original research in astronomy in 1871. At last, in 1871, the corporation, recognizing that the college already comprised all the courses of instruction which are usually found in an institution of the highest rank, organized the university with the departments of theology, medicine, law, and philosophy, and the arts; which last was made to consist of four sections, viz., (1) for graduates, (2) for academical undergraduates, (3) for undergraduates of the Sheffield Scientific School, (4) for students of the fine arts; each section having a separate organization.

In the section for graduates, or those who have already taken a bachelor's degree, there are forty-two instructors, and the course of instruction occupies two years. In the section for academical undergraduates there are thirty-one instructors, and the instruction occupies four years. The Sheffield Scientific School is devoted especially to instruction in the mathematical, physical, and natural sciences. The school was established in 1817; but in 1860, through the liberality of Mr. Joseph E. Sheffield, it was re-organized, and received his name. There are twenty-seven instructors, and the course occupies three years. The Street School of the Fine Arts has for its end the cultivation and promotion of the arts of design: viz., painting, sculpture, and architecture, thorough practice, and criticism. The course occupies three years, and is open to persons of both sexes.

The Theological School, as a distinct department, was founded in 1822; though, from the origin of the college, the instruction had been specially arranged to favor the education of ministers. But from the establishment of the chair of divinity in 1755, and probably from a much earlier period, classes of graduates had been in the habit of continuing their residence for the purpose of pursuing theological studies; so that, out of the large number of the alumni who had entered the ministry during the hundred years before 1822, a considerable portion had been trained for their duties at the college. Among these may be mentioned Jonathan Edwards of Northampton, Samuel Hopkins of Newport, Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, Joseph Bellamy of Bethlem, Timothy Dwight of New Haven, Joseph Buckminster of Portsmouth, John Smalley, Stephen West, Azel Backus, Moses Stuart, Nathaniel W. Taylor, Lyman Beecher, Eleazer T. Fitch, Bennet Tyler, Edward Dorr Griffin, and Edward Robinson. The faculty consisted at first of Nathaniel W. Taylor, Eleazer T. Fitch, and Josiah W. Gibbs. Chauncey A. Goodrich was subsequently added to their number. The faculty at present consists of the president of the university, a professor of Hebrew literature and biblical theology, a professor of systematic theology, a professor of homiletics and the pastoral charge, a professor of ecclesiastical history, and a professor of sacred literature and New-Testament Greek. There are, besides, eight special lecturers and instructors. Students of every Christian denomination, in case they are possessed of the required qualifications, are admitted. The course of instruction occupies three years; but, at the close of the studies of the second year, students may be licensed to preach. In one of the theological buildings is a library of three thousand volumes in various languages, open several hours each day, which takes the place of a well-selected private library for the students. The valuable library of church-music, which was collected by Dr. Lowell Mason, was, after his death, presented to the seminary. There is in this department no charge for instruction, room-rent, or the use of the library. Students whose circumstances require it receive a hundred dollars a year from the income of scholarships, and other funds. In special cases there is additional aid. The Hooker Graduate scholarship, with an annual income of seven hundred dollars for two years after graduation, was established in 1876; and there is another graduate scholarship, yielding five hundred dollars for one year. The term begins in September, and the session continues for eight months, without vacation, to near the close of May. The degree of bachelor of divinity is conferred at the end of the course upon those who pass the required examination. Students in this department have the special advantage of being allowed to attend the lectures in the other departments of the university. The alumni of the seminary number about fourteen hundred. Of the alumni of the academical and theological departments, about a hundred have been foreign missionaries. A course of instruction for two years is also arranged for graduates, or those who have already completed a three-years' course in this or any other theological school.

The faculty of the department of medicine consists of eight professors and ten special lecturers. The system of instruction is arranged in a graded course for three full years. The faculty of the department of law consists of six professors and eight special lecturers and instructors. The course occupies two years. There is also a graduate course of two additional years, for those who have already taken the degree of bachelor of laws. The Peabody Museum of Natural History was endowed in 1866 by Mr. George Peabody of London, for the preservation of the valuable collection already owned by the college, and of those which may be made hereafter, in the departments of zoology, geology, mineralogy, paleontology, and ethnology. In 1871 the department of astronomy was enlarged in its organization, when, to the former facilities for instruction in this science, were added ample means of original investigation and research. At present there is a corps of eight astronomers connected with the observatory.

According to the report of the treasurer in 1882, the invested funds of the university were $1,533,983.47. The annual income from tuition was $138,815.43. The number of the volumes in the several libraries which are open to students is about 135,000.

Over 13,000 degrees have been conferred by the corporation, of which about 1,000 have been pro honoris causa. There have been, besides, several thousand students in the academical department of the university who received no degree. The students of the law department before 1843, and of the theological department before 1867, are not included in the catalogue of the alumni, as, till those years, degrees were not conferred in law or theology. About 2,200 of the graduates of the academical department have been ordained as ministers.

The number of students in attendance in 1882-83 was as follows; department of theology, 106; department of medicine, 30; department of law, 85; department of philosophy and the arts (graduate instruction, 41; undergraduate academical department, 611; Sheffield Scientific School, 206; School of the Fine Arts, 40), 898; deduct for names inserted twice, 23. Total, 1,096.

YEAR, The Church, does not rest upon a commandment of the New Testament, but was the gradual product of the needs of the church. The periods of its development can be readily traced. In the apostolic age, the Jewish Christians seem to have strictly followed the Jewish cycle of feasts; while the Gentile Christians at first seem to have observed no yearly church festivals. In the middle of the second century, two such festivals meet us, — the Paschal and Pentecost festivals. The former at first commemorated the passion of our Lord (see PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES, EASTER), and was prolonged to a period of six days, marked by solemnity and fasting. Pentecost commemorated the resurrection and ascension of Christ and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, comprehended fifty days, and was a period of joyousness, in which there was no fasting, or kneeling in prayer. The second period in the formation of the church year is marked by the elevation of Ascension Day to the rank of a distinct festival, the closer association of the day of resurrection, Easter, with the Christian Passover, Good Friday, and the addition of the festival of Christ's birth, — Christmas, — and Epiphany. There were then three festive cycles, — Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost; the former two being preceded by preparatory periods, — Quadragesima (forty days) and Advent.

The ancient church celebrated the anniversaries of the deaths of martyrs as local festivals. The veneration of martyrs was accompanied by the feeling that their intercession made prayer effective. History, however, in this direction, is vitiated by myths. The oldest festivals of Mary, Annunciation, and Purification, were at first festivals of Christ, and were transferred to Mary at a later period, when her worship became prevalent. The Roman-Catholic Church assigns a saint to every day of the year. The culmination and conclusion of its system of festivals is marked by Corpus Christi, the feast of transubstantiation.

Although the church year would properly begin with the first Sunday in Advent, it was a long time before the church came to this conclusion. The most confusing differences occur late in the middle ages. The older church teachers, following the Jewish mode of reckoning, regarded the Easter month as the first month of the year; and in the West it was made to begin with March. Dionysius Exiguus began the year with January; but, in the middle ages, Germany, Italy, and other lands dated it from Dec. 25; or, as in Florence and Pisa down to 1749, from March 25. The Greek Church begins its year with Sept. 1. The custom of dating the church year from the first Sunday in Advent was first in vogue among the Nestorians. All the Reformers, Luther included, at first questioned whether it was not best to return to the simplicity of the apostolic age in regard to church festivals. The Reformed churches never had any sympathy for the church year. In Calvin's time Sunday only was observed at Geneva. Good Friday was not introduced there till 1820. In other lands Christmas was the only church festival observed on a week day. [The Puritans gave up even Christmas; and until very recently it was not observed at all in any of the Congregational churches of New England, or the Presbyterian churches of Scotland and the United States, as a religious festival. The Puritans, however, appointed and observed, from time to time, special fast and thanksgiving days.] The Lutheran Church preserved not only Christmas and Easter, but the days for each of the twelve apostles, Annunciation Day, Purification Day, and the festival of the Archangel Michael. The latter class is now either not observed, or is gradually going out of vogue. [The Church of England has retained the church year of the Catholic Church, and preserves the names of many of the saints in her Prayer-Book. The Episcopal Church of the United States, however, has discarded the most of these.] Compare the art. YEAR, Hebrew. I. THE YEARS. — The Hebrew word for year, שָׁנָה, means "repetition," — that which runs a circuit. The word countenances the idea that the Hebrews were acquainted with the solar year, which was the year of the Egyptians, who divided it into twelve months of thirty days each, with five and a quarter supplementary days. But, whatever may have been their knowledge, in practice the Hebrews used the lunar year, with months of twenty-nine or thirty days each. The exact fixing of the months, and therefore of the year, was post-exilic. According to the Talmud, the moon's circuit was made in 29d. 12h. 44' 3" 12". As soon as the first glimpse of the new moon was announced by two persons appointed for the purpose, the sanhedrin, with the cry, "The new moon is hallowed," officially declared a new month begun. Of course there was no astronomical observation possible, and much depended upon the weather. If, on account of overcasting, the moon could not be seen, then there was no proclamation; but, if there was an observation, the news was despatched through the land, at first by signal-fires from height to height, later by messengers. Those months which had thirty days in them (of which there was to be no less than four or more than eight in the year) had two days called ראש החדש, of which one was the thirtieth of the old, and the other the first of the new, month. The present Jews use an astronomical table of moons, which dates from a century after the destruction of the second temple.

The ancient Hebrews corrected the discrepancy between the lunar year and the solar by the insertion every two or three years of a month before the last month of the year, except in the sabbatical year. It is true that there is no mention in the pre-exilian Scriptures of a year with thirteen months; but since, in this period, there was such a year among the Babylonians, Assyrians, and the Greeks, the omission may be merely accidental. In later times the sanhedrin determined in the month Adar, according to the state of vegetation, whether a month should be intercalated or not. In the fourth Christian century the Jews adopted the Greek astronomer Menon's 19-year cycle, according to which, in every nineteen years there were seven leap-years, — the 3d, 6th, 8th, 11th, 14th, 17th, 19th. There were two important legal enactments to be allowed for: the Feast of Tabernacles must not end before the autumnal equinox, and the full moon of Passover must not precede the spring equinox.

II. THE MONTHS. — These were, giving them their pre- and post-exilian names, as follows. 1. Abib (Exod. xii. 2, cf. xl. 2, 17; Lev. xxiii. 5; Num. ix. 1, xxviii. 16, xxxiii. 3), the "plough" month, or Nisan, the month of the "breaking-forth." (The year was thus dated from spring, because then the exodus took place; but the Feast of the New Moon was in the seventh month.) 2. Zif (1 Kings vi. 1), the "bloom" month, or Iyyar. 3. Sivan (Esth. viii. 9; Bar. i. 8). 4. Tammuz, the beginning of the summer solstice, the month of mourning for "Tammuz," — Adonis. 5. Ab. (The names of 4 and 5 do not occur in the Scriptures.) 6. Elul (Neh. vi. 15). 7. Ethanim (1 Kings viii. 2), the "month of the overflowing waters," or Tishri. 8. Bul (1 Kings vi. 38), the "rain" or "fruit" month, and Marheshvan, abridged to Heshvan. 9. Kisleu (Neh. i. 1; Zech. vii. 1), the "Orion" (?) month. 10. Tebeth (Esth. ii. 16). 11. Shebat (Zech. i. 7). 12. Adar (Ez. vi. 15; Esth. iii. 7, 13, viii. 12). There are no known pre-exilian names for the last four months, and the origin of this post-exilian nomenclature is in dispute; but probably it is derived from Babylonia. The names are found upon Syrian, Arabic, and Palmyran inscriptions, and names closely similar upon the Nineveh tablet. Before, as well as after the exile, it was customary to give the number rather than the name of the month (e.g., Ez. iii. 1, 6, 8; Hag. i. 1, 15), although sometimes both are given (Zech. i. 7; Esth. ii. 16).

III. THE CIVIL AND ECCLESIASTICAL YEARS. — Besides the ecclesiastical, there was apparently, from the earliest times, a civil year, which began in the autumn. The reasons for believing the existence and antiquity of this state of things are, (1) In Exod. xxiii. 16 and xxxiv. 22 the Feast of Ingathering is said to have been "in the end of the year." (2) The sabbath- and jubilee-year began upon the tenth day of the seventh month, according to Lev. xxv. 4, 9 sq. This puts the Feast of Tabernacles in the actual beginning of the civil year. (3) The flood began in Bul, the second month, which was in autumn, according to tradition. (4) By the later Jews the years, reckoned from the creation of the world, began in autumn. (5) The day of the new moon in the seventh month was by the later Jews celebrated as New-Year's Day. (6) The Talmud expressly recognizes two beginnings to the year (Rosh hash., i.). (7) Josephus (Antiq., I. iii. 3) says, "Moses appointed Nisan (i.e., Xanthikos) as the first month of their religious festivals, because upon it he had led the Hebrews out of Egypt . . . but he preserved the original order of the months as to . . . ordinary affairs." (8) The Targum to 1 Kings viii. 2 says that the ancients called Tishri the first month.

IV. THE SEASONS. — Properly speaking, there are only two seasons in the Holy Land, — summer and winter. The former is characterized by cloudless heavens, heavy dews at night (Sirach xviii. 16, xliii. 22), great heat by day, and cool evenings and nights (Gen. xxxi. 40; Jer. xxxvi. 30). The winter begins with the sowing-time, and lasts until the later rains of March. It is a period of rain and snow. Reference is made in the Bible to various seasons, — barley-harvest, wine-making, etc., — as was to be expected in the records of an agricultural people.

YEOMANS, Edward Dorr, D.D., Presbyterian divine; b. at North Adams, Mass., Sept. 27, 1829; d. at Orange, N.J., Aug. 26, 1868. He entered Lafayette College, Pennsylvania, under the presidency of his father, and passed through the junior year, then continued academic and theological studies under his father's direction until his licensure by the presbytery of Northumberland, Penn., April 21, 1847. He was stated supply at New Columbia, Penn., from 1848 to 1851; pastor at Warrior Run, Penn., Nov. 29, 1854 (the date of his ordination), until November, 1858; at Trenton, N.J., until May, 1863; at Rochester, N.Y., until July 2, 1867, when he was installed over the Central Church, Orange, N.J., and was pastor there at his death. In 1864 he received the degree of D.D. from the College of New Jersey. Dr. Yeomans received high praise for his thoroughly idiomatic and elegant translation of Dr. Schaff's History of the Apostolic Church (New York, 1853) and the first two volumes of his History of the Christian Church, 1858 and 1867. He prepared a book of worship, and collection of hymns, and began the translation of Lange's

Commentary on John, but was obliged by failing health to desist in the summer of 1868. See Lange on John, p. xii.

YORK (Eboracum), the capital of Yorkshire, Eng., the seat of an archbishopric, situated on both sides of the Ouse, a hundred and seventy-two miles north-north-west of London. It was the capital of the old kingdom of Northumbria, and the seat of its bishops, 625. Its first minster was built of wood by Edwin of Northumbria, 627, who also began one in stone before 633. The building was completed in 642, repaired in 669, burnt April 23, 741, and rebuilt 767-780. Since then, it has been burnt several times, — wholly in 1069, partly in Feb. 2, 1829, and May 30, 1810. The present building dates its beginning from the twelfth century, but was not consecrated until July 3, 1472.

"It is in the form of a cross, with a central square tower two hundred and thirteen feet high, and two other towers, each a hundred and ninety-six feet high, flanking the west front, which is highly ornamented. The extreme length is five hundred and twenty-four feet; and the extreme breadth across the transepts, two hundred and forty-nine feet. The east window is seventy-eight feet high, and thirty-two feet wide, and filled with stained glass representing about two hundred historical events. An elaborate screen contains statues of all the kings of England from William I. to Henry VI.; and upon this screen is the organ, one of the finest in the kingdom. The cathedral has a peel of twelve bells, one of which weighs eleven tons and a half, and is the largest in Great Britain."

The archbishop's palace, now the library of the dean and chapter, dates from the twelfth century, and is on the north side of the cathedral. The archbishop now lives at Bishopthorpe, near the city. He is styled primate of England, but ranks second to the archbishop of Canterbury, who is primate of all England. Under him are the sees of Carlisle, Chester, Durham, Liverpool, Manchester, Newcastle, Ripon, Sodor and Man, and York. See the Diocesan History of York by Canon GEORGE ORNSBY, London, [1883].

YOUNG, Edward, b. at Upham, Hampshire, 1684; d. at Welwyn, Hertfordshire, April 12, 1765; was educated at Winchester and at Corpus Christi, Oxford; fellow of All Souls'; LL.D. there 1719; defeated as a candidate for Parliament; ordained, 1727; rector of Welwyn, 1730. He wrote three tragedies, which were acted at Drury Lane, 1719, etc.; The Centaur not Fabulous, A Vindication of Providence, and letters, essays, etc.; a poem on Resignation, with others; and the Night Thoughts, 1742-46, once extremely popular, and still famous. YOUNG, Patrick (Patricius Junius), Scotch scholar; b. at Seaton, East Lothian, Aug. 29, 1584; d. at Bromfield, Essex, Eng., Sept. 7, 1652. He was educated at the university of St. Andrews, 1603; M.A. at Oxford, 1605; entered holy orders; became librarian to James I. of England, 1620; and afterwards rector of Hayes and of Llanine, but retired to Bromfield, 1649. His reputation rests upon his edition of Clemens Romanus, Oxford, 1633; 2d ed., 1637. Walton published, in sixth volume of his Polyglot, Young's Annotations on the Codex Alexandrinus.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS.

These are undenominational societies of young men, organized upon an evangelical basis, for the promotion of the mental, moral, social, and physical welfare of young men. Their active, voting membership is confined to Christian young men; but large numbers of unconverted young men, without regard to denominational affiliations, become associate members for the sake of social and educational privileges. The work of the associations is carried on through the personal efforts of Christian young men themselves, laboring individually in the sphere of their daily calling, and collectively in connection with committees having charge of the reading-rooms, libraries, gymnasiums, evening educational classes, lecture-courses, prayer-meetings, and Bible-classes for young men exclusively, boarding-house and employment bureaus, visitation of sick young men, etc. The associations also, as opportunity offers, hold undenominational religious services in neglected neighborhoods, in public institutions, and in the open air.

The parent English-speaking association was organized at London, by George Williams, June 6, 1844. Societies formed in Germany earlier than this date have since come into affiliation with the English-speaking associations and those of other lands. The society now bearing the name of the Young Men's Christian Association in Glasgow, Scotland, claims an origin, under a different name, prior to that of London. But the brotherhood bearing the distinctive title of the Young Men's Christian Association, which has developed into provincial, state, national, and international organization, can be traced in its origin and name distinctly to the London association, and cannot be traced behind it. And the societies claiming priority under different names belonged, rather, to the multitude of societies of Christian young men which have been formed in every period of the Christian Church, but which have not developed into the permanent and varied organization just referred to. The Montreal Association was organized Dec. 9, 1851; and that of Boston, Dec. 29, 1851. The first International Convention of the associations of the United States and British Provinces met in Buffalo, June 7, 1854. The first World's Conference convened in Paris, Aug. 19, 1855. Here the following test of membership, since known as the "Paris Basis," was adopted:—

"The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men, who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour, according to the Holy Scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their doctrine and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men."

In April, 1860, the associations of North America had about twenty-five thousand members. At the breaking-out of the civil war, many members of the associations entered the armies on both sides, and the associations naturally followed them with efforts for their welfare and that of their comrades. At the instance of the New-York Association, a special convention was called, Nov. 14, 1861, to consider Christian work in the army. This resulted in the organization of the United-States Christian Commission (q.v.); and during the civil war the energies of the associations were largely absorbed in army-work. With the close of the war, a new season of growth and activity began. In 1866 the executive committee of the convention, which had been located from year to year in different cities, was located for a term of years at New-York City (where the working quorum has been continued ever since), and has become known and incorporated as the "International Committee." The convention which met in Detroit, June 24, 1868, adopted the following test of active membership, since known as the "Evangelical Test:"—

Resolved. That as these organizations bear the name of Christian, and profess to be engaged directly in the Saviour's service, so it is clearly their duty to maintain the control and management of all their affairs in the hands of those who profess to love, and publicly avow their faith in Jesus, the Redeemer, as divine; and who testify their faith by becoming and remaining members of churches held to be evangelical; and that such persons, and none others, should be allowed to vote, or hold office."

At the Portland convention, July 14, 1869, the word "evangelical" was thus defined:—

"We hold those churches to be evangelical, which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only-begotten of the Father, King of kings, and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment."

All associations organized since the passage of the above resolution, in order to be entitled to representation in the International Convention, must limit their active, voting membership to members of evangelical churches. The formal adoption of this test by the American associations has secured for them the active sympathy of churches and Christian communities. It is only since this time, that the associations have received the real estate and buildings which are now valued at over $3,000,000, and which give the societies a permanent foothold in the communities where they are located. At the World's Conference of 1875, held in Geneva, Switzerland, forty-one American delegates were present; and, under their influence and leadership, a central international committee, on the plan of the American committee, was appointed, with a working quorum resident in Geneva. The number of associations in the world is now 2,671, with a total membership of about 200,000. They are grouped as follows: United States, 824; Dominion of Canada, 56; Bermuda, 1; South America, 1; England, 198; Scotland, 188; Ireland, 18; France, 65; Germany, 422; Holland, 450; Switzerland, 209; Sweden and Norway, 85; Belgium, 24; Denmark, 3; Spain and Portugal, 19; Italy, 20; Turkey, 25; Austria, 4; Russia, 7; Syria, 5; India, 2; China, 2; Japan, 2; Africa, 15; Australasia, 25; Hawaiian Kingdom, 1.

The affiliated associations of North America have organized an admirable system of intercommunication and mutual help. At the suggestion of the International Convention, and with the co-operation of its committee, about thirty State and Provincial conventions are now held annually. Each of these appoints an executive committee on the plan of the International Committee, whose territory is again subdivided into districts, with a district committee looking after the interests and work of each district. Twelve State and Provincial committees now employ visiting secretaries, whose efforts are essential in the development of this work; and the International Committee is seeking to extend it to the entire sisterhood of States. The expenditure of the international and State committees in 1882 was over $15,000; and 350 associations reported their annual current expenses as $406,270; 659 associations reported an aggregate membership of 82,375; 69 reported the ownership of buildings valued at $2,700,173; and 255 persons were employed as general secretaries or agents of the local associations and of the international and State committees. The number of these officers is increasing rapidly, having, in March, 1883, grown to over 300. The chief aim of the general secretary is to enlist and train volunteer workers, using his tact to discover the post of duty for which each member is specially fitted, and his personal influence to induce him to enter upon it. A gratifying result of the increase in the number of these officers is seen in the development of a larger and more efficient force of helpers on the various committees of the associations. Appropriate methods have been wrought out to meet with timely aid the stranger, the unemployed, the destitute, the sick, and the intemperate. The social and literary appliances have been made more effective for good, and the various religious meetings have been largely increased in number and usefulness.

The International Committee has nine secretaries. Some of these are occupied with the work of correspondence and supervision at the office of the committee, which is also a central bureau for securing and testing young men for the office of secretary in the local associations. Others are engaged in the extension and care of the work in the sections of the continent destitute of associations, or where they are yet feeble. One secretary of the committee works among railroad-men, organizing railroad branches of the associations, and enlisting the railroad companies in their support. The contributions of the companies for this purpose now amount to $65,000 annually. Sixty railroad branches are in operation, and preliminary work is done at over twenty other points. Another secretary labors among college students. One hundred and eighty college institutions have been organized. Other secretaries are busy among German-speaking young men, commercial travellers, and colored young men in the Southern States. The magnitude of these several fields is shown by the fact, that there are, in the United States and Dominion of Canada, 1,600,000 railroad-men, 60,000 college students, 700,000 German-speaking young men, 100,000 commercial travellers, and 500,000 colored young men.

The association cause abroad is strongest in Great Britain, where a national organization has recently been effected. The associations of Germany are grouped together in several Bunds. Like organizations exist in Holland and Sweden. The associations are few and feeble in Belgium, France, Russia, Spain, and Italy. Several vigorous organizations have been formed in the cities of Australasia.

The principal publications of the American associations are The Watchman, published in Chicago; the Year-Book and other publications, about fifty in number, of the International Committee, whose office is at 23d Street and Fourth Avenue, New York; and the annual reports of the State and Provincial conventions, and of the local associations.

YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS. Upon the general plan of the Young Men's Christian Associations, Women's Christian Associations have been organized in various European and American cities. In America this movement dates from the year 1857, when the first association for distinctive work among young women was organized in New-York City. Ten years later a general interest in this subject resulted in the formation of associations in many of the large cities of the United States. There are now fifty-six associations in the United States and British Provinces, with an aggregate membership of about fifteen thousand. A great variety of work in behalf of young women has been undertaken. Many of the associations use their buildings as lodging or boarding houses for women, and a few have restaurants; but there is a growing tendency to emphasize such methods of educational, social, and religious work for women, as the reading-room, library, educational classes, social receptions, Bible-classes, and prayer-meetings. Employment offices are also a very general feature in this work. An effort to organize associations among young women in schools and colleges is meeting with considerable success.

The American associations hold a Biennial International Conference, which has convened six times. The last conference met in St. Louis, Mo., in October, 1881. Eighteen associations were represented by thirty-four delegates: written reports were received from many others. In twenty-two cities buildings have been secured for the purposes of the associations, amounting in value to $549,000. Monthly newspapers devoted to the interests of this specific work are issued by the associations of Cleveland, O., Philadelphia, Penn., Utica, N.Y., and Memphis, Tenn. Other publications of the society are the Conference Journal and reports of the associations. J. P. CATTELL.

YULE, the old name for Christmas. Skeat connects the word with the Middle English youlen, yollen ("to cry out"), because it was a time of revelry. December was called the "former yule," and January the "latter yule."

YVONETUS, the supposed Dominican author of Tractatus de hæresi pauperum de Lugduno (printed in Thesaurus novus anecdotorum, edited by Martène and Durand, vol. v. pp. 1777 sqq.). Franz Pfeiffer has, however, conclusively demonstrated, that the author was the Franciscan David of Augsburg, who lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century. Manuscripts of this work are found in Stuttgart and Strassburg. It is one of the authorities in Waldensian history. C. SCHMIDT.

ZABARELLA, or DE ZABARELLIS, b. at Padua, 1339; d. at Constance, Sept. 26, 1417. He studied canon law at Bologna; lectured in his native city; was employed in various diplomatic missions; and was by Boniface IX. called to Rome to take part in the negotiations concerning the schism; but when his De schismatibus was printed at Basel, in 1565, it was put on the Index. Having returned to Padua as arch-priest at the cathedral, he was again summoned to Rome by John XXIII.; made a cardinal, and archbishop of Florence, and sent as a legate to the Council of Constance, on whose transactions he exercised considerable influence. He was a prolific writer, but many of his works have never been printed. It is doubtful whether he is the author of Capita agendorum in concilio generali Constantiensi de reformatione ecclesiæ.

ZACCHÆUS, Roman chief tax-gatherer in Jericho, and a convert of Christ (Luke xix. 2). He was a Jew, and his name is Hebrew זַכַּי, "righteous" (Ez. ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14). In the Talmud there is mention made of a well-known Zachæus of Jericho, whose son was the celebrated rabbi Yochanan ben Zachai. According to tradition, Zachæus of the Gospels became bishop of Caesarea in Palestine by the ordination of Peter (Apost. Const., vii. 46; cf. Clement: Homilies, iii. 63, 71, 72; Recognitions, iii. 65 sqq.). A half-ruined tower in Jericho, now used by a Turkish garrison, is pointed out as the house of Zachæus. See the Bible dictionaries, s.v., and the commentaries upon Luke xix. 2-10.

ZACHARIA, Gotthilf Traugott, b. at Taubhardt, Thuringia, Nov. 17, 1729; d. at Kiel, Feb. 8, 1777. He studied theology at Königsberg and Halle; and was appointed professor in 1760 at Butzow in Mecklenburg, in 1765 at Göttingen, and in 1775 at Kiel. His Biblische Theologie (1771-75, 4 vols.) opened a new line of research. His paraphrases of the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, etc., were a great success. His standpoint was the supernaturalism of S. J. Baumgarten, though singularly modified by the rising rationalism.

ZACHARIAS, Pope 741-752; carried forward the aspirations of the Roman see with great adroitness and dignity in his relations with the Lombards, the Greeks, Boniface, and Pepin, whom he raised to the throne of the Merovingians. He translated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Greek. His letters to Boniface are found in Migne (Patrologia Latina, vol. 89) and in Giles's edition of Bonifatii Opera, London, 1845, vol. i. See D. BARTOLINI: Di S. Zaccaria papa e degli anni del suo pontificato, Regensburg, 1879; H. CRAMON: Le pape Zacharie et la consultation de Pepin le Bref, Amiens, 1879; J. COZZA-LUZI: Historia S. P. Z. Benedicti a SS. pontificibus Romanis: Gregorio I. descripta et Zacharia græce reddita, Rome, 1880.

ZACHARIUS SCHOLASTICUS, Bishop of Mytilene in the Island of Lesbos; was present at the synod of Constantinople (536) which deposed Anthimus, the patriarch of Constantinople, as Eutychian. He had studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and for some time practised as an advocate at Berytas. His dialogue, Ammonius sive de mundi opificio, is a defence of the Christian view of the creation and government of the world against objections to it raised from the point of view of the Greek philosophy. It was first published in Paris, 1619. The best edition is that by Boissonade, Paris, 1836, where it stands, together with Æneas' De immortalitate animæ, a work of similar kind. He also wrote a Disputatio against the Manicheans; but it exists only in a Latin translation, in Bib. Pat. Mss., IX. GASS.

ZAMZUM'MIM (Deut. ii. 20), or ZU'ZIM (Gen. xiv. 5), a tribe of giants in the East Jordan country, who were part of the original settlers of Palestine. They were attacked and routed by Chedorlaomer, and finally expelled by the Amorites.

ZANCHI, Hieronymus, b. at Alzano, near Bergamo, 1516; d. at Heidelberg, Nov. 19, 1590. He entered the order of the regular canons of St. Augustine in 1531, but studied the writings of Luther, Melancthon, Calvin, etc., under the guidance of Vermigli, and began to preach the Reformation in Lucca. Compelled to flee, he visited Geneva, England, and Strassburg, and was in 1553 appointed professor of the Old Testament in the last-mentioned place. His relations with the Lutheran theologians of Marbach were, in the beginning, very peaceable; but his open advocacy of the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and his attack on the Lutheran doctrine of ubiquity, finally caused a breach; and in 1563 he removed to Chiavenna as pastor of the Reformed Church, where in 1566 he published an account of his controversies with the Marbach theologians, — Miscellanea. In 1568 he was appointed professor at Heidelberg, where he lectured on the Summa, and gradually acquired a great reputation as one of the most learned theologians of his time. He took part with great energy in the controversy with the Antitrinitarians, and wrote De tribus Elohim (1572), De natura Dei, De operibus Dei, etc. When the Palatinate became Lutheran, he retired to Neustadt-an-der-Hardt, where he spent the rest of his life. A collected edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 1619, 3 vols. [Eng. trans. of his Spiritual Marriage between Christ and the Church (Cambridge, 1592), and of his Confession of the Christian Religion, C. SCHMIDT, 1599].

ZEALOT, the epithet given in Luke vi. 15 and Acts i. 13 to Simon called the Cananean (not Canaanite, as in Authorized Version, Matt. x. 4, Mark iii. 18), to distinguish him from Simon Peter. The Greek Kananaeos is a mere transliteration of the Aramaean זֵאֵל (zeal). The Zealots were one of the parties or factions in Palestine noted for their advocacy of the Mosaic law. Their founder was Judas the Galilean, also called the "Gaulonite" (Acts v. 37); but they degenerated into the Sicarii (from the Latin sica, "a dagger"), and were then guilty of many a dark deed. They were a prominent cause of the Jewish war, and increased its horrors (Joseph. iv. 3-7).

ZEBULUN. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

ZECHARIAH (Jehovah remembers), the eleventh of the Minor Prophets. He describes himself as son of Berechiah, and grandson of Iddo, but in Ezra (v. 1, vi. 14) is mentioned as son of Iddo, whence it has been inferred that his father died young, and that he was brought up as Iddo's son and successor (see Neh. xii. 1, 4, 16). In that case Zechariah, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, was a priest as well as a prophet. He appears to have been born in Babylon, and to have come up, while yet young, with the first company of exiles who returned to Palestine.

I. DATE.—In 536 B.C. Cyrus issued a decree permitting the captive Jews to return to their own country. More than forty thousand men with their families and slaves availed themselves of this permission, and re-occupied the land of their forefathers. Barely a year elapsed before preparations were made for rebuilding the temple; and in the second month of the second year of the return, the foundation was laid with mingled joy and grief (Ez. iii. 11-13). Speedily, however, the work was interrupted by the jealousy of the Samaritans, who continued during the reigns of Cyrus and Cambyses to misrepresent the Jews at the court of Persia. In the reign of Gomates, the pseudo-Smerdis, they obtained a decree absolutely prohibiting the further prosecution of the work. The tide turned, however, when Darius Hystaspes came to the throne. In the second year of his reign he renewed and confirmed the original decree of Cyrus, and thenceforth there was no longer any outward difficulty in the way. But by this time (520 B.C.) a great change had occurred in the views and feelings of the people. Their zeal in divine things declined; they were engrossed in the care of their private affairs; and it needed very energetic appeals to rouse them to the toils and sacrifices required for the completion of the temple. These were furnished by the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Ez. vi. 14), and were successful; so that the building was finished in the sixth year of Darius, B.C. 515. But it is not necessary to suppose that all Zechariah's earlier prophecies were mainly directed to this end. Undoubtedly they had more or less reference to it; but they also looked farther, even to the whole character and condition of the covenant people, their dangers and discouragements, and their influence upon the future prospects of the world. So that the prophet's historical position was simply a background for his delineation of the present and coming fortunes of the kingdom of God.

II. FORM AND STYLE.—From the earliest ages, interpreters have complained of the book as obscure and difficult,—a feature which results from the predominance of symbolical and figurative language, and occasionally from the brevity and conciseness of the expressions. But in general the style is easy and flowing. Zechariah leans much upon his predecessors prior to the captivity, and yet not unfrequently shows a marked individuality in thought and utterance. Sometimes his oracles are given in direct speech, at others in the relation of visions, and again in the descriptions of symbolical acts. The two latter forms are not to be ascribed to his Chaldaic education, for both are found in the older prophets; e.g., Isa. vi.; Amos vii.-ix.; Hab. iii. There are some orthographic peculiarities; but in the main the Hebrew is pure, and remarkably free from Chaldaisms.

III. CONTENTS.—The first part (chaps. i.-viii.) consists of three portions, the dates of which are distinctly given. 1. (i. 1-6) A general introduction in the shape of a warning not to imitate the sins of their fathers. 2. (i. 7-vi. 15) Three months afterward, a series of visions, all given in one night, closely connected together, and exhibiting an orderly progress of thought in respect to God's dealings with his people. These are appropriately closed by the recital of a symbolical action,—the crowning of the high priest, that is, the glory of the man whose name is Branch. 3. (vii., viii.) Two years later, a long answer to inquiries about the need of continuing to observe fasts commemorating former calamities. The prophet rebukes the formalism of the people, and then promises such blessings as will change fasts into festivals, and even attract the heathen to their fellowship. The second part of the book, which bears no dates, is divided into two oracles by the title prefixed to chapters nine and twelve. The general theme is the future destiny of the covenant people. (a) The First Burden (ix.-xi.) outlines God's providence toward Israel up to the appearance of the Saviour. The ninth chapter begins by recounting Alexander's conquests, and ends with the triumph of the Maccabees, interposing in the middle a dramatic sketch of Zion's King of peace (9, 10). The tenth chapter describes the increase of the people in means and numbers under native rulers. The eleventh, under the figure of the rejection of a good shepherd by his flock, offers a striking delineation of our Lord's treatment by his own people. (b) The Second Burden (xii.-xiv.) carries forward the outlook upon the future, even to the time of the end. (1) The twelfth chapter, in the first nine verses, tells of Israel's victory over trials, meaning, doubtless, the triumph of the early church over persecuting foes. (2) The remaining verses, with the first one of the following chapter, show the power of Christ's death to awaken and renew. (3) Chap. xiii. 2-6 illustrates the fruits of penitence in the abolition of false worship and false prophecy, which stand for all forms of sin. (4) Verses 7-9 show the sword drawn against the Shepherd and his flock, or Christ smitten by his Father, and his people suffering also. (5) The last chapter seems to be a general survey of the checkered course of God's kingdom in this world from beginning to end, concluding with a vivid picture of the universal reign of holiness.

IV. MESSIANIC PREDICTIONS.—These are six in number, and represent a gradual development. (1) In iii. 8 the lowly servant, as in Isaiah and Jeremiah, is called "Branch." (2) In vi. 12, 13, as priest and king he builds the Lord's spiritual temple. (3) In ix. 9, 10, he reigns as a meek and peaceful but universal monarch. (4) In xi. he appears as a shepherd, scorned, rejected, betrayed, and (by implication) slain. The expressions are obscure, but the New Testament leaves no doubt of the application. (5) In xii. 10 his pierced form, seen by the eye of faith, becomes a means of deep and general repentance, attended by pardon and conversion. (6) Finally (xiii. 7) the fellow of Jehovah, smitten by Jehovah himself, becomes the redeemer and the pattern of the flock. These predictions are more numerous and emphatic than in any of Zechariah's predecessors, save Isaiah. Their Messianic character is established both by the intrinsic evidence of the utterances themselves, and by citation or reference in the words of our Lord or his apostles.

V. THE GENUINENESS OF THE SECOND PART.

—The question on this point was first raised by the learned Joseph Mede, 1653, who was followed by Hammond, Kidder, Whiston, and Newcombe, but opposed by Blayney. Mede's objection was based upon Matthew's quotation (xxvii. 9, 10) of a passage in Zechariah, which he ascribes to Jeremiah, and upon the internal evidence of the chapters (ix.-xiv.) themselves. The former of these is now not much pressed; but the latter has been adopted and enforced by Gesenius, Ewald, Bleek, and many other eminent scholars. There is obviously a difference between the two parts. One has continual references to the author's own time, the half-built temple, the growing city, the struggling population: the other has scarcely a single direct allusion to contemporary circumstances, but points to a distant future. One is full of visions, and speaks much of angels, and also of Satan, of all of which there is scarcely a trace in the other. But these differences are not enough to require us to assume that the last chapters were an anonymous production of older date, accidentally, or for some unknown reason, attached by the compilers of the canon to the Book of Zechariah. The prophet, it is agreed, was a young man when he entered upon his office, and uttered his first prophecies; and it is not all unlikely that many years afterward, when circumstances had greatly or entirely changed, he added the subsequent portion of the book. On the other hand, it is very unlikely that the formers of the Old-Testament canon should have committed the gross error attributed to them.

The objections to the genuineness seem plausible at first sight, but disappear when carefully weighed; for example, Ephraim and Judah are spoken of together, as if they still existed as distinct kingdoms, which they never did after the exile. True, they are so mentioned, but only in the same way as Malachi (ii. 11) uses the name Israel, i.e., merely as designating a part of the existing population. Again: Assyria and Egypt are mentioned as formidable powers, which they were not; Persia having absorbed one, and subdued the other. The answer is, that the prophet uses these names as natural and convenient representatives of the foes existing in his day. Similar is the reply to the objection that false prophecy and idolatry did not exist in the restoration, and therefore could not be rebuked by Zechariah; viz., that in accordance with prophetic usage he represents the present under the forms of the past. It is also urged that Phœnicia, Damascus, and Philistia, are set forth as foes of importance, when their power had long been broken. Here the reference is to the ninth chapter and the tenth. But a critic of the liberal school has expressly said that this whole section does not admit of any explanation but that which is gained from the history of Alexander the Great. It describes his victorious march, the subjugation of the whole of Syria, and the singular exemption of the covenant people from harm; all of which was actually accomplished. True, it was two hundred years after Zechariah's time, which is an insuperable difficulty to those who hold that prophecy confines itself to what immediately concerns the existing generation. But, even admitting this very doubtful postulate, what was to hinder Zechariah, or the Spirit which guided him, from upholding the small and weak restored people amid their fears of the rapacity of their neighbors, by the assurance of a very marked and specific deliverance in the distant future. Jehovah says the heavy stroke shall fall upon Damascus and all along the sea-coast; but "I will encamp about mine house." The safety of the temple amid a wide-spread overthrow in every other direction was well suited to the post-exilian period, but in no sense, and in no degree, to the earlier history. And, if any earthly event merited a place on the prophetic page, it was that rapid conquest by which Alexander changed the face of the world, and paved the way for the triumph of the gospel.

Another objection cites the threatened disruption of the nation (xi. 14), "I cut asunder the staff" that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel," as a gross anachronism. But, if this is to be taken literally, it will put the composition of the book back to a period prior to the secession of Jeroboam; which is simply absurd. The obvious sense of the passage is the disintegration of the nation, which could not be better expressed than by the use of the old, well-understood rupture in the days of Solomon's successor, which was the first and most serious step in the decline of the monarchy. That calamitous event was a natural figure of the bursting of the bond which united the Jews as a nation.

It is certain that there are numerous references in both parts of the book to the earlier prophets, and several distinct references to the later prophets in the second part. A full and minute conspectus of these may be seen in Wright (Zechariah and his Prophecies, p. xxxv.), an examination of which will confirm the opinion of Stahelin, that it is far more likely that one prophet quoted from many than that many quoted from one. This was so conclusive to such a critic as De Wette, that, after having declared for two authors of Zechariah in three editions of his Einleitung, he returned to the traditionary view in the fourth. Upon the whole, then, there seems to be no good reason for departing from the old view, that the entire book came from the same hand. The contrary view yields no aid toward an orderly and reasonable explanation of the successive prophetic utterances, but rather embarrasses the interpretation.

ZEDEKIAH (to whom Jehovah will be just), the last king of Judah, third son of Josiah, and uncle of Jehoiachin. His proper name was Mattaniah (gift of Jehovah). Nebuchadnezzar raised him to the throne (597 B.C.) in the room of Jehoichin, and altered his name. The new name may have been Zedekiah's own choice, and intended to express his hope of release from the Babylonish yoke. He was twenty-one at this time, and reigned eleven years; but he did not govern, for anarchy prevailed. Instances of his weakness are his bearing towards his princes, and failure to protect Jeremiah (Jer. xxxviii. 5, 24 sq.); his belief in false prophets (Jer. xxviii., xxxvii. 19); and the very striking incident, which sets the king in a very bad light, — that the princes and the people, after obeying the command of Jehovah to free their fellow country men and women from bondage, compelled these persons to return to slavery. Jeremiah announced the speedy downfall of the nation as punishment of this disobedience (Jer. xxxiv. 8-22). In the fourth year of his reign, Zedekiah made a journey to Babylon to pay his respects to his lord, to procure the release of the captives, a loosening of the vassal yoke, and very probably to clear himself of suspected infidelity toward the Babylonian king. By his own conduct in his ninth year, he proved how faithless he was. He rebelled, on the strength of promises from Egypt (Jer. xxxvii. 5 sqq.; Ezek. xvii. 15 sqq.). His punishment came on apace. Nebuchadnezzar fell upon the land, took one walled city after another, and at last besieged Jerusalem from the tenth month of Zedekiah's ninth year to the fourth month of his eleventh. Zedekiah attempted flight, was easily overtaken at Jericho. His sons were killed before his eyes at Riblah, and his eyes were put out, and, heavily chained, he was carried prisoner to Babylon, where, according to tradition, he ground in a mill until he died (Jer. xxxix.). His fate was a literal fulfilment of Ezekiel's prophecy (xii. 13, xvii. 19).

ZEISBERGER, David, a missionary, who deserves to be called the apostle of the Western Indians of North America; b. at Zauchtenthal in Moravia, April 11, 1721; d. at Goshen, O., Nov. 17, 1808. His parents, David and Rosina Zeisberger, were descended from the Bohemian Brethren, and in 1726 fled to Herrnhut in Saxony, leaving all for the gospel's sake. Nine years later they joined a body of Moravians that emigrated to Georgia. Meanwhile young David remained at school at Herrnhut, and when he had finished his studies was sent to Herrendyk, a settlement of the Brethren, in Holland. There he was subjected to so harsh a discipline that he ran away. He reached England in safety, and through the kind offices of Gen. Oglethorpe succeeded in joining his parents in Georgia. In 1740 the Moravians left this colony, and settled in Pennsylvania, where young Zeisberger helped to build their towns of Nazareth and Bethlehem. He took great delight in the hardy life which he was leading, and rejoiced at the thought that America was to be his home. Great, therefore, was his disappointment, when, in the beginning of 1743, he was designated as one of the escort that was to accompany Count Zinzendorf on his return to Europe. But he did not venture to protest against this decision. It was not until he was aboard the ship, which was on the point of sailing, that his real sentiments became known, and that he received permission to remain in the country which he loved. He hastened back to Bethlehem, and soon after was deeply convicted of sin by a hymn which treated of the love of Christ. In answer to his fervent prayers, he found peace in believing. No sooner had this change taken place than he determined to devote his life to the evangelization of the Indians. His work among them began in 1745, and was continued for sixty-two years with unflagging courage and apostolic zeal. He labored in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, and Canada, among the Iroquois, or the Six Nations, the Delawares, the Mohicans and Waunpanoags, the Nanticokes, Shawnees, Chippewas, Ottawas, and Wyandots. He established in different parts of the country thirteen Christian Indian towns, which filled both the savages and the settlers with the utmost wonder. He brought many aborigines into the church of Christ and to a consistent practice of Christianity, and was instrumental in the conversion of characters most notorious, fierce, and bloodthirsty. No other Protestant missionary exercised more real influence, and was more sincerely honored among the Indians; and no one, except the Jesuit fathers, excelled him in the frequency and hardships of his journeys through the wilderness. He spoke with great fluency the Delaware, Mohawk, and Onandaga languages, and was familiar with other native tongues. The Six Nations adopted him as a sachem of their confederacy, gave him the name of Ganousseracheri, and, during his stay at Onandaga, made him the keeper of their archives. He was naturalized among the Monseys by a formal act of their tribe; and for a number of years he swayed the Grand Council of the Delawares in Ohio, and prevented them from joining the British Indians in the Revolutionary War. In 1781 these Indians broke up the mission in Ohio. Zeisberger and his fellow-missionaries were captured, tried at Detroit as American spies, but acquitted. The massacre of the Christian Indians at Gnadenhütten in the following year nearly broke his heart. He led the survivors from place to place, until they found a refuge in Canada. In 1798 he brought a part of them back to the Tuscarawas Valley of Ohio, where Congress had granted the Moravian Indians a large tract of land, and established a station, which he called Goshen. There he died, a patriarch of eighty-seven years. Zeisberger wrote numerous works. The following were published: A Delaware Indian and English Spelling-Book, Philadelphia, 1776, reprinted 1816; A Delaware Indian Hymn-Book, Philadelphia, 1803; Delaware Indian Sermons to Children, Philadelphia, 1803; Lieberkühn's Harmony of the Four Gospels translated into Delaware Indian, Philadelphia, 1821; and a Collection of Delaware Indian Conjugations, published in Faber's Analecten der Sprachkunde, Leipzig, 1821. Some of his most important works remain in manuscript; for instance, A German and Onondaga Lexicon, in 7 vols.; An Onondaga Grammar; A Delaware Grammar; A German and Delaware

Lecicon, etc. These manuscripts are preserved, partly in the library of the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia, and partly in the library of Harvard University at Cambridge. ZELL, Matthäus, the first Protestant pastor in Strassburg; b. at Kaysersberg, Upper Elsass, Sept. 21, 1477; d. at Strassburg, Jan. 10, 1548. He studied successively at Mainz and Erfurt; made a journey into Italy, and served a while as soldier in the imperial army; took the degree of M.A. at Freiburg in Breisgau, 1505; taught theology in that university; was chosen rector, Oct. 31, 1517; and finally was nominated, in 1518, preacher in the Cathedral of Strassburg, and pastor of the parish of St. Lawrence. Under the influence of his own study of the Bible, and the writings of Geiler and Luther, he embraced the Reformation, and commenced in 1521 his evangelistic labors by the exposition of the Epistle to the Romans. He was the first in the city to celebrate mass in the vulgar tongue, and to dispense the Eucharist under both forms. He broke with the ecclesiastical authorities in 1523, and replied to the charge of heresy by his Christliche Verantwortung, in which he eloquently pleaded for the religious renovation of Strassburg. In the same year he married Katharina Schütz (b. 1497; d. Sept. 5, 1562), a carpenter's daughter, who made him a faithful and intelligent companion and fellow-laborer. Along with six other married priests, he was summoned by the bishop before the synod at Saverne, and was excommunicated. Zell then issued Appellatio sacerdotum maritorum, April, 1524. The magistrates continued him in his functions, and he actively engaged in the work of reconstructing the church. His house was a refuge for his persecuted brethren from other cities. With singular large-heartedness and Christian love he extended his protection to the Anabaptists. In his view of the sacraments he held firmly to Zwingli, but he took little part in theological contests. Besides the writings mentioned, he issued Ein Collation auf die Einführung M. Anthonii, 1523; Auslegung des Vatter Unfers: Kurze schriftliche Erklärung für die Kinder, 1534 (designed, however, apparently rather for teachers than for children). His wife wrote Entschuldigung K. Schatzin für Matthes Zellen, iren Eegemahl (a defence of her husband, now in manuscript at Zürich); Den leyden den chrisglaubigen Wegbern, 1524 (a consolatory letter to disconsolate women in Kentzingen); Klagred und Ermahnung Kath. Zellen zum Volk bey dem Grab M. Matheus Zellen, 1518 (a discourse pronounced at the funeral of her husband, now in manuscript in the University Library at Strassburg); Ein Brief an die ganze Bürgerschaft der Stadt Strassburg, 1557 (a letter in which she defends the memory of her husband against Lutheran attacks, printed in Fussli's Beiträge, vol. v.).

ZENO, Bishop of Verona. Down to the year 1508 nothing was known of Bishop Zeno of Verona but some extremely fanciful legends. But in that year Albertus Castellanus and Jacobus de Lencio startled the theological world with an edition of Sancti Zenonis episcopi sermones, after an old manuscript recently discovered in the library of Verona. Two questions now arose,—about the identity of the author of the sermon and the legendary bishop, and about the time of the authorship of the sermons. The former have very little interest. Concerning the latter, opinions differ. Baronius, in his edition of the Maximologium Romanum, first fixed the date at 400 but then, in the second edition, at 200. The brothers Ballerini, in their edition of the sermons 1739, endeavor to decide the question in favor of the latter part of the fourth century. But Dörner in his Entwicklungsgeschichte der Lehre von der Person Christi, places the Zenonian treatises as transition from Tertullian and Hippolytus to Dionysius of Rome. See JAZDZEWSKI: Zeno Veron Episcopus, Ratisbon, 1862; [C. ZEPHANIAH (he whom Jehovah protects, in LXX Σοφορίας), one of the so-called Minor Prophets. He was a descendant of a certain "Hezekiah" (i. 1), who may have been, but probably was not the king of that name, since Zephaniah would in all likelihood have indicated "Hezekiah's" rank had it been royal.

I. OUTLINE OF THE BOOK.—1. The announcement of the near approach of judgment upon Judah (i. 2-13), with a description of the terror of that day (i. 14-18). In this section is the suggestion of the famous hymn, Das irce. 2. The call of the people to repentance, and the pious constancy (ii. 1-3); for the Philistines and other nations are to be destroyed, while the remnant of Judah will return, and spoil their foes (ii. 4-15). 3. Woe over Jerusalem for its obstinacy (iii. 1-7) upon it comes judgment; then follows the conversion of the heathen, and the restoration of Israel (iii. 8-10). After the removal of the courtiers, the believing remnant will rejoice in the presence of Jehovah, and the day of suffering will be over (iii. 11-20).

II. DATE.—Zephaniah himself tells us he wrote in the days of Josiah, king of Judah. Confirmation of this fact is afforded (a) by comparison of this book with Jeremiah's. It will be found that precisely the same state of things is described in both, and the expressions used as in many cases the same. Thus, both speak of idolatry alongside of Jehovah-worship (Zeph. i. 5; cf. Jer. v. 2, 7, 9, 12, 16, vii. 17, 18), of wickedness permeating all classes (Zeph. i. 4, 8, 9, 11, iii. 3-5; cf. Jer. ii. 8, 26, iii. 3, vi. 15, viii. 12

Both announce the approach of punishment (Zeph. i. 2, 3, 18; cf. Jer. iv. 4, 25, vii. 7, ix. 9, xii. 4): both prophesy that the called executioners of this punishment will come from the north (Zeph. i. 10; cf. Jer. i. 15), and that Jerusalem, Judah, and the surrounding peoples, will fall under the avenging strokes of Jehovah (Zeph. i. 10, ii., iii. 8; cf. Jer. v. 2, 7, 9, vi. 12, x. 10, 25). (b) By the position of Zephaniah in the arrangement of the Minor Prophets. This arrangement was chronological (Batra 14 b.), and, in the case of the pre-exilic Minor Prophets, also according to subject-matter. The fact that Zephaniah is put with other prophets of Josiah's time is therefore proof that he prophesied in that reign. But there remains the settlement of the question, In what portion of this long reign of thirty-one years did he prophesy? or, what is the same thing, When were the words, "I will cut off the remnant of Baal" (i. 4) spoken? Manifestly, when Josiah's reformation had been long enough in progress to uproot the Baal-worship, all but a "remnant," and that would not be until the closing period of his reign, when the Jehovah-worship was the only one tolerated in the kingdom, i.e., after his eighteenth year. Additional proof of this is the fact, that, according to 2 Kings xxiii. 26, 27, the prophetic voices announced the oncoming of the day of wrath in spite of the reforms. Zephaniah was probably one of those who foretold the dire event. Another expression of Zephaniah yields the same answer to the question concerning the date of his prophecy. Jehovah says through him, "I will punish the king's sons" (children) (i. 8). This prophecy was fulfilled in the subsequent history. Jehoahaz died a prisoner in Egypt (Jer. xxii. 11, 12); Jehoiakim was carried in chains to Babylon, and finally was murdered (Jer. xxii. 19); and Zedekiah died in blindness at Babylon. But since Jehoiakim was born in the sixth year of Josiah's reign, Jehoahaz in the eighth, and Zedekiah in the twentieth, it will be seen that Zephaniah's prophecy more properly dates from the close of Josiah's reign than from any earlier period.

III. CHARACTERISTICS.—Dividing the prophets into the Isaiah and the Jeremiah kind, Zephaniah is the first of the latter. But his chief peculiarity is his employment of the words of other prophets in the expression of his own prophetic ideas. To quote a striking example (i. 7), "Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord (Hab. ii. 20); for the day of the Lord is at hand (Joel i. 15); for the Lord hath prepared a sacrifice (Isa. xxxiv. 6), he hath bid his guests" (Isa. xlii. 3). This does not detract from his independence. It only shows, that, when the prophetic spirit impelled him, it brought to mind the former words; and this mingling of old phrases and new became the vehicle of new thoughts, a new body of living words. He was in a sense an epitomizer of his forerunners, even as Martin Butzer says, "If any one desires a compendium of the prophets, let him read through Zephaniah."

ZEPHYRINUS, Bishop of Rome, 199–218; the successor of Victor; occupied the chair during a dangerous period, when the Church was at once imperilled by Montanism and Monarchianism, but was himself an insignificant person, who exercised very little influence on the course of affairs. The sources of his life are EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., v., vi.; and the ninth book of HIPPOLYTUS: Adv. Hær. See CALIXTUS, HIPPOLYTUS, MONTANISM, and MONARCHIANISM.

ZERUB'BABEL (begotten in Babylon), the leader of the first band of returning exiles from Babylon (Ez. ii. 2); the custodian of the sacred vessels (Ez. i. 11); the governor of Judæa (Hag. i. 1). He held these high positions in consequence not only of his personal ability, but of his royal rank; for he was a lineal descendant of David, and the recognized prince of Judah (Ez. i. 8). On assuming the leadership of his people, he laid aside his Babylonish name Sheshbazzar (Ez. i. 8), and took the other. On arriving at Jerusalem, he and Jeshua (Joshua), the high priest, headed the revival of daily public worship and of the religious festivals, and also began, in the second month of the second year of their return, to rebuild the temple. The adversaries of the Jews stopped the latter work; and it was not for sixteen years, that under the stirring rebukes, counsels, and prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, the work was resumed, and completed by the joint efforts of Zerubbabel and Jeshua. Zerubbabel was one of our Lord's ancestors (Matt. i. 12; Luke iii. 27).

ZI'DON, or SI'DON, the present Saida, was situated on the Mediterranean, in lat. 33° 34' N., about twenty miles north of Tyre, and built on a low promontory, which juts out into the sea from the narrow plain at the foot of Lebanon. In ancient times it was the largest, richest, and most powerful city of the Phœnicians; hence it was called "the first-born of Canaan" (Gen. x. 5; 1 Chron. i. 13), "the mother of Tyre;" and the Phœnicians were often simply called "Zidonians" by the Hebrews, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans. It continued a prosperous and important place, having its own kings, even after the rise of Tyre. But after its conquest by Alexander, and the foundation of Alexandria, it lost its mercantile prominence, and gradually, also, its national character. It became a Greek city; and only a few of its manufactures, its glass and its perfumes, were known in the world's market. Christianity early gained a foothold there (Luke vi. 17; Acts xxvii. 3), and in the second century it became the seat of a bishop. During the crusades it was several times taken and fortified by the Christians, and retaken and burnt down by the Moslems. From its ruins, however, many relics, both Christian and Phœnician, of great antiquarian interest, have been dug up; the most remarkable being the marble sarcophagus of Eshmunazar, which in 1855 was brought to Paris. See SCHLOTTMANN: Die Inschrift Eshmunazars, Halle, 1868; PRUTZ: Aus Phœnicien, Leipzig, 1876.

ZIEGENBALG, Bartholomew. See MISSIONS.
ZILLERTHAL, a valley of Tyrol, stretching for about twenty miles along the Ziller, between Salzburg and Innsbruck, and inhabited by about fifteen thousand souls; has become memorable in church history on account of the infamous manner in which the Roman-Catholic clergy succeeded in overcoming an evangelical rising which took place there in the fourth decade of the present century. In the diocese of Salzburg it was suppressed by force in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and its last oscillations were thought to have vanished completely before the cruel persecutions of Archbishop Firmian in 1730. Nevertheless, it re-appeared in the Zillertal, in the beginning of the present century. As soon as the Roman clergy became aware of the danger, the number of priests was doubled in the villages, and the strictest watch was kept. As admonitions and petty chicaneries proved ineffective to stop the movement, violent measures were resorted to. The Protestants were excluded from baptism, communion, marriage-consecration, burial in consecrated ground, etc. Their neighbors were warned against holding any kind of intercourse with them. Their servants were allured to desert them. Their children were forced to frequent the Roman-Catholic schools, where they were placed on separate seats as "children of the Devil," apart from the "Christian children," etc. The toleration edict of Joseph II., and the stipulations of the congress of Vienna, were thrown aside; and, instigated by the fanatical clergy, the provincial estates of Tyrol decreed that no split in the church of the country should be allowed, that those who would not conform to the Church of Rome should leave the country, etc. In this emergency the Protestants of Zillertal addressed themselves to Friedrich Wilhelm III. of Prussia, in 1837; and by his humane intercession they were allowed to sell their estates, and remove to his dominions, where they were settled, four hundred and forty-eight souls, in Hohen-Mittel- and Nieder-Zillertal in Silesia. See RHEINWALD: Die Evangelisanten im Zillertal, Berlin, 1837. KLOSE.

ZIMRI [the fifth sovereign of the separate kingdom of Israel, of which he occupied the throne for the brief period of seven days in the year] 928 B.C. according to Winer, 931 according to Thénius and Bunsen, 935 according to Ewald; was originally in command of half the chariots in the royal army, and gained the crown by the murder of King Elah, who was indulging in a drunken revel in the house of his steward Arza, at Tirzah, then the capital. In the midst of the festivity, Zimri killed him, and immediately afterwards all the rest of Baasha's family. But the army, which at that time was besieging the Philistine town of Gibeon, when they heard of Elah's murder, proclaimed their general Omri king. He immediately marched against Tirzah, and took the city. Zimri retreated into the innermost part of the late king's palace, set it on fire, and perished in the ruins (1 Kings xvi. 9-20). Ewald's inference from Jezebel's speech to Jehu (2 Kings ix. 31), that on Elah's death the queen-mother welcomed his murderer, is far fetched, and rather arbitrary (Gesch. des Volkes Israel, first edition, ii. pp. 166 sq.), and is connected with the erroneous interpretation of armon, which he translates with "harem." The same may be said of his assertion that Zimri was a voluptuous slave of women.

Zimri is also the name of that Simeonist chieftain who was slain by Phinehas with the Midianitish prince of Cozbi (Num. xxv. 11). Phinehas was afterwards regarded as the canonical type of the zealots (Ps. cvi. 30; Eccles. xlv. 28 sq.; 1 Macc. ii. 26, 51). In 1 Chron. ii. 6 a certain Zimri is mentioned as grandson of Judah but in Josh. vii. 1 it is written Zabdi; also a descendant of Jonathan is called Zimri (1 Chron. viii. 36, ix. 12).

"Kings of Zimri" are mentioned (Jer. xxv. 25) between the kings of Arabia and those of Elam and Media. They are generally identified with Zimran, a son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), according to which an Arabic tribe is meant, which, according to Jer. xxv., lived towards Persia. Grotius finds a trace in the Zamereni, a tribe of the interior of Arabia (Pliny, vi. 32). Hitzig and Leugkerke propose to connect the name Zimran with Zimiris in Ethiopia (Pliny, xxxvi. 15). Winer (Real-Wörterbuch, ii. p. 465, 3d edition) suggests the Zimara of Asia Minor or Armenia.

RÜETSCHL.

ZINZENDORF, Nicholas Lewis, Count von, the resuscitator of the Moravian Church, and for many years its leader; b. at Dresden, May 26, 1700; d. at Herrnhut, May 9, 1760. Six weeks after his birth, his father, one of the ministers of the Saxon cabinet, died. His mother took him to her home at Gross Hennersdorf, in Upper Lusatia. When he was four years old, she married the Prussian field-marshal, Von Natzmer, and removed to Berlin. Young Zinzendorf remained with his grandmother, the Baroness von Gersdorf. She was a distinguished representative of pietism, and a personal friend of Spener. Her unmarried daughter, the Baroness Henrietta, belonged to the same school of thought and practice. These two godly women, with the assistance of a private tutor, educated Zinzendorf until his tenth year, and shaped his religious character. He was an extraordinary child, and manifested a precocious piety which has rarely been equalled. Christ was the end and aim of his daily life. He loved him with his whole heart, abode in a childlike fellowship with him, wrote letters to him in which he poured out his religious feelings, and threw these letters out of the window, confident that the Lord would receive and read them. What he said of himself in after-years holds good of his childhood also: "I have but one passion; and it is He, only He." Hence, throughout his whole career, his theology remained a theology of the heart, and he never allowed his understanding to interfere with his faith. When he was ten years old, he entered Francke's grammar-school at Halle. There he met with other pious lads, and took the lead in organizing among them the Order of the Grain of Mustard-Seed, — a juvenile association having in view personal godliness and the spread of the gospel. Baron Frederick de Watteville was his most intimate friend; and with him he made an additional compact, whose aim was the conversion of the heathen, and especially of those for whom no one else would care. In his sixteenth year he entered the university of Wittenberg. His inclinations prompted him to take up theology; but his guardian, Count Otto Christian Zinzendorf, and his other relatives, including even his pious grandmother, were shocked at the thought that a German count should become a preacher. In obedience to their express commands, he studied law, with a view to entering the service of the State; privately, however, he devoted himself to theology. After having finished his course at the university, in 1719 he began his travels, as was the custom of young noblemen in that day. He first visited various parts of Germany. In the picture-gallery at Dusseldorf an Ecce Homo, with this inscription, "Hoc feci pro te; quid facis pro me?" made a deep impression upon him, and induced him to consecrate himself anew to Christ. Continuing his journey to Holland, he spent some time at the university of Utrecht, and then proceeded to Paris. In this city he became intimate with the devout Cardinal Noailles, and formed the acquaintance of other distinguished men. He was introduced at court, where he won the special regard of the regent's mother; but in all places he boldly confessed Christ, and kept himself unspotted from the world. Having returned to Saxony in 1721, he again yielded to the wishes of his family, declined with deep regret the position which Francke offered him at Halle, as the successor of Baron von Canstein in the Bible House, and accepted a judicial councillorship under the Saxon Government at Dresden. In the following year he purchased of his grandmother the estate of Berthelsdorf, in Upper Lusatia, and married the Countess Erdmuth Dorothy Reuss, sister of Henry XXIX., the reigning count of Reuss-Ebersdorf. When bringing his bride to his newly acquired domain, he met for the first time with the refugees from Moravia to whom he had afforded an asylum. (Vide art. MORAVIAN CHURCH.) He gave them a cordial welcome, but otherwise took little notice of them. Of the ancient church which they represented, he knew nothing; that he was to be God's instrument in bringing about its renewal was a thought that consequently could not enter his mind. His plans were of an entirely different character. In the course of the year 1723 he formed with Frederick de Watteville, Rothe the parish minister at Berthelsdorf, and Schaefer, the pastor of the Church of the Trinity at Görlitz, the so-called "Covenant of the Four Brethren." Its object was the spread of the religion of the crucified Saviour (Die Universalreligion des Weltheilandes) in all the world. The means to be employed in accomplishing this work were the preaching of the Word, itinerant evangelists, schools, publications, and correspondence. But, the more Zinzendorf urged this enterprise, the more evident it became that it did not constitute the mission to which he had been called of God; whereas Herrnhut, that settlement of refugees from Moravia and Bohemia which had been established on his estate, continually increased in population and importance, until it comprised a body of several hundred souls. By slow degrees Zinzendorf realized that his work lay among the Moravian Brethren. In 1727 he resigned his office at Dresden, and took up his abode at Berthelsdorf. Soon after, he met with a copy of the Ratio Disciplina of the Bohemian Brethren, as published by Bishop

Amos Comenius. This work made a very deep impression upon him, and he now resolved to do all in his power to bring about a resuscitation of the Brethren's church. To this resolution God himself set his seal. In August of the same year a wonderful outpouring of the Holy Spirit took place at Herrnhut. From this time until his death, the biography of Zinzendorf is identical with the history of the Moravians. He became their leader; shaped their development according to that fundamental idea, which he never relinquished, of constituting them "a little church within the [Established] Church;" introduced nearly all their peculiar usages; furthered in every possible way their foreign missionary work; secured for them the episcopal succession of the Bohemian Brethren, and was himself consecrated a bishop by Bishops Jablonsky and Nitschmann (1737); induced various Continental governments and the Parliament of Great Britain to acknowledge their church; spent nearly his entire property in their behalf; and in all other respects promoted their welfare with a most self-sacrificing spirit. At the same time he embraced every opportunity to labor for Christ's kingdom in general, and never allowed himself to be bound by denominational restraints. His course awakened great hostility. He was often misunderstood and misrepresented; sometimes he gave just cause for offence by his extravagant utterances. A flood of polemical writings was poured out against him, and in 1736 he was banished from Saxony. But this measure helped to spread the cause which he represented. Surrounded by his family and his principal assistants, — constituting together what he called "The Church of the Pilgrims." — he took up his abode, now in Germany, then in Holland, and again in England, furthering the gospel, and establishing Moravianism wherever he came. Moreover, he went out on many evangelistic journeys alone, or with only a few companions. In 1739 he visited St. Thomas, and three years later came to America (November, 1741). He spent more than a year in this country, laboring among the Germans, especially the Lutherans; organizing the so-called "Congregation of God in the Spirit," that is, a sort of evangelical alliance among the German religious denominations of Pennsylvania, which were represented in a union synod, an undertaking that proved to be a total failure; preaching the gospel wherever he found an opportunity; establishing a Moravian church at Bethlehem; and going out on missionary journeys to the Indians, the last of which extended as far as the Wyoming Valley, where, in all probability, he was the first white man to pitch his tent. His work in America was again misunderstood, and led to the most unfortunate complications, especially with the Lutherans. The ideal which inspired him was too lofty for that time of sectarian bigotry and disputes. He was more than a century in advance of his age. And yet in the end he came forth victorious from every attack that was made upon him and from all the persecutions to which he was subjected. In 1749 the Saxon Government not only rescinded the decree of banishment against him, but also begged him to establish within its jurisdiction more settlements like that at Herrnhut. Some of his worst enemies became his friends: the assaults of those who remained hostile made no more impression upon him, says his biographer, Bishop Spangenberg, than the waves of the sea beating upon a rock. He died in peace, on the 9th of May, 1760, at Herrnhut, honored by thousands in many parts of the world. Thirty-two presbyters and deacons, from Germany, Holland, England, Ireland, North America, Greenland, and other countries, bore his remains to their last resting-place. His tombstone describes his work in these brief words: "He was ordained to bring forth fruit, and that his fruit should remain." However great and distinguished a place Zinzendorf occupies in the history of the church of God, he was by no means without faults. His lively imagination and joyous piety often led him to give expression, both in his public discourses and in his writings, to sentiments that were sensuous and objectionable; he occasionally developed biblical doctrines to extremes unwarranted by the Bible; at times he appealed to his feelings for the decision of a question, instead of to the law and the testimony; and, while his love to his fellow-men not unfrequently made him too yielding, his zeal for the Lord rendered him too severe and fiery. But all these and other faults were more than counterbalanced by the noble traits of his character. To the day of his death, Christ his Saviour remained to him all, and in all. He lived only to his glory, and abode with him in an unbroken communion of faith and love. Earthly possessions, honors, and fame were to him as nothing in comparison with Christ: to do good to his fellow-men for Christ's sake was his highest joy. He had the rare faculty of knowing how to deal with the highest and the lowest. He corresponded and conversed with kings and princes, that he might bring them to the Saviour; and he followed the Indian savage into his wilderness, that he might tell him of Jesus. His personal appearance was distinguished and noble. He had a piercing and yet benevolent eye; his countenance reflected the divine peace which filled his heart and the joy which his constant communion with the Lord gave him. It was impossible to approach him without becoming conscious of an inner life hidden with Christ in God. He was affable and kind in his social intercourse, but no one ever became familiar with him. His public ministrations were in the highest degree priestly, instinct with a dignity and power that never failed to impress. The writings of Zinzendorf, comprising sermons, hymnals, catechisms, historical collections, devotional and controversial works, number more than one hundred and fifty; but the most of them are obsolete. Several years after his death a selection of his sermons was published by GODFREY CLEMENS, Auszüge aus Zinzendorfs Reden, 10 vols. Knapp published a new edition of his hymns in 1815, Geistliche Gedichte des Grafen v. Zinzendorf. Other republications are: Jeremias, ein Prediger der Gerechtigkeit, Berlin, 1830; Gedanken über Evangelische Wahrheiten, Gnadau, 1840, etc. Zinzendorf's style is peculiar, and marred by a multitude of foreign phrases from the Latin, Greek, French, and English. Some of his hymns, of which he composed a very large number, are and will remain in universal use; for instance, Christi Blut und Gerechtigkeit ("Jesus, thy Blood and Righteousness," etc.), Jesu geh' voran ("Jesus still lead on," etc.), etc. Zinzendorf has had numerous biographers. The most important are the following, SPANGENBERG: Leben von Zinzendorf, 1773-75, 3 vols.; SCHRAUTENBACH: Graf v. Zinzendorf, Gnadau, 1851; VERBEEK: Graf v. Zinzendorf, Gnadau, 1845; DUVERNOY: Kurzgefasste Lebensgeschichte Z., Barby, 1793; VARNHAGEN VON ENSE: Leben Z., Berlin, 1816; MÜLLER: Bekenntnisse merkwürdiger Männer, Part 3, 1775; THOLUCK: Vermischte Schriften, i. No. 6, 1839; SCHRÖDER: Z. und Herrnhut, Nordhausen, 1857; BOVET: Le Comte de Zinzendorf, Paris, 1860, 2 vols., Eng. trans. entitled The Banished Count, London, 1865; BURKHARDT: *Zinzendorf u. die B. ZI'ON, or SI'ON (snunny), strictly speaking, the south-western hill of Jerusalem, although sometimes used as a synonyme for the entire city, and sometimes symbolically. It was bounded on the south by the Valley of Hinnom; on the west, by the "Valley of Gihon," a part of Hinnom, originally two deep valleys with precipitous sides, but now partially filled up; while on the north there was no such definite boundary, but the hill extended to the Jaffa gate. It is 2,539 feet above the Mediterranean, and 105 feet higher than Moriah, on which was the temple.

Zion is first mentioned in Josh. xv. 63 as a Jebusitic stronghold. David took it, and built upon it his palace; and it was the site of his capital, the "city of David" (2 Sam. v. 7), and eventually the aristocratic portion of Jerusalem. Josephus never speaks of it as Zion, but as "the city of David," "the upper city," and "the upper market-place." Herod built a palace upon its north-west corner, which became the prætorium, the residence of the Roman procurator (Mark xv. 16). It was the last part of the city to yield to the Romans under Titus (War, VI., viii.). The name "Zion" occurs six times in the historical, and a hundred and forty-eight times in the poetical and prophetic, books of the Old Testament, and seven times in the New Testament; making, in all, a hundred and sixty-one times in the Bible. In the later books it is sometimes used symbolically.

The present wall around Jerusalem includes only half of Mount Zion, but the only building outside it is the tomb of David. Upon the part of the hill from Zion gate, southwards towards the Jaffa gate, are the Christian cemeteries; another part is under cultivation (cf. Jer. xxvi. 18; Mic. iii. 12). See JERUSALEM and the Bible dictionaries.

ZO'AN, the present San, the Avaris of Manetho, and the Tanis of the Greeks; a city of Lower Egypt; was situated on the eastern bank of the ancient Tanitic branch of the Nile, in latitude 31° N. It was an exceedingly old city, built seven years after Hebron (Num. xiii. 22), and fortified by the shepherd-kings. According to tradition, it was the place of the meeting between Moses and Pharaoh; and in "the field of Zoan" (Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43) God's wonders were wrought. The mounds and ruins which surround the present city are very extensive; and interesting discoveries have recently been made there by Brugsch-Bey.

ZO'AR, one of the cities of the plain (Gen. xiii. 10); originally called Bela (Gen. xiv. 2); was spared from the destruction which overtook Sodom; and became the refuge of Lot (Gen. xix. 20-80). Its exact location has not been identified. It was included in the view Moses had from Pisgah (Deut. xxxiv. 3). The prophets place it among the cities of Moab (Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34).

ZO'BA, or ZO'BAH (station), that part of Syria between the north-east of Palestine and the Euphrates; the home of a powerful people who were frequently at war with the Israelites (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. 3 sqq.; x. 6 sqq.; 2 Chron. viii. 8). The region is rich in natural resources, but is now deserted save by the wandering Bedouin.

ZOLLIKOFER, Georg Joachim, b. at St. Gall, Aug. 5, 1730; d. at Leipzig, Jan. 22, 1788. He was educated at Bremen, studied theology at Utrecht, lived from 1749 to 1753 in Francfort as tutor, and was in 1758 appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation in Leipzig. He was considered one of the greatest preachers of his time. The collected edition of his sermons (1798-1804) comprises fifteen volumes [Eng. trans., London, 1803-12, 10 vols.]. His tombstone characterizes him very aptly by telling us that he is now "conversing in the sphere of the spirit with Socrates and Jesus." He was, however, not one of the common herd of rationalists, though he held that "conversion" was not necessary to everybody, but only improvement and progress. He also published a number of devotional books [some of which have been translated; e.g., Exercises of Piety (London, 1796) and Devotional Exercises and Prayers]. See R. FISCHER: Gedenschrift, and DÖRING: Deutsche Kanzelredner, Neustadt, 1830. PALMER.

ZONARAS, Johannes, b. in the last part of the eleventh century; d. in the middle of the twelfth; was secretary to the Byzantine emperor, Alexius Comnenus, but retired in 1118 to the monastery of St. Elijah in Mount Athos, and devoted himself to theological and literary studies. His Chronicle, from the creation, till the death of Alexius (edited by Hieronymus Wolf, Basel, 1537; Du Fresne, Paris, 1686; Pinder, Bonn, 1841-44, 2 vols.), is a mere compilation without interest. Of more value is his Commentary on the Synagoga of Photius, the best edition of which appeared in Paris, 1619, together with a Latin translation. See MORTREUIL: Histoire du droit Byzantin, Paris, 1843, tom. iii. pp. 423-428. He also wrote scholia to the New Testament, Commentaries on the poems of Gregory Nazianzen, etc. H. F. JACOBSON.

ZOSIMUS, Bishop of Rome, 417-418; the successor of Innocent I.; was a Greek by birth. He began his reign by cancelling the condemnation of Pelagius and Celestius, issued by several African synods, and confirmed by his predecessor. But when the African bishops refused to yield, and, after a new synod of Carthage, obtained a scriptum rescriptum against the Pelagians from the Emperor Honorius, Zosimus and Celestius saw fit to retract, and condemned also Pelagius in an Epistola tractatoria, or encyclical to the Eastern Churches. See SCHRÖCKH: Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1782, viii. 148. NEUDECKER.

ZWICK, Johannes, b. at Constance, about 1496; d. at Bischofszell, Oct. 23, 1542. He studied theology and canon law in Constance and Basel, took his degree in Padua, and was considered a rising light in the Roman camp, when he became acquainted with the writings of the Reformers; went to see Zwingli in Zürich, and inaugurated his entrance upon his first pastoral charge, Riedlingen, by marrying. In 1525 he was expelled from Riedlingen; and he then settled in his native city, where he contributed much to the establishment of the Reformation by his preaching, his disputations, his devotional publications, especially hymns, and his re-organization of the whole department of public education. His activity, however, was by no means confined to Constance, but extended to Wurtemberg and the whole of south-western Germany. In the union negotiations he took an active part. A collection of his letters is found in manuscript in Constance.

ZWINGLI, Huldreich, b. at Wildhaus, an Alpine village in the canton of St. Gall, Jan. 1, 1484; d. Oct. 11, 1531, on the battlefield of Kappel, whither he had accompanied the Protestant army as chaplain.

Zwingli's parents were peasants, grave and well-to-do people. One of his uncles was deacon of Wesen; another, abbot of Fischingen. As he was an uncommonly bright boy, eager to learn, and with a talent for music, he was destined for the church, and educated in the schools of Basel and Bern. In 1499 he entered the university of Vienna, where he went through the common course of philosophy, acquired the friendship of Vadian and Glarean, and made the acquaintance of Faber and Eck. In 1502 he returned to Basel, where he taught school, studied theology, lived in intimate intercourse with Leo Jud, and heard Thomas Wyttenbach. In 1506 he was ordained a priest, and appointed pastor of Glarus.

In Glarus, where he staid for ten years, he learned Greek, an arduous task, as he had none to help him along; studied Plutarch and Plato, and especially the Bible; copied the Epistles of Paul, in order to have them always with him; read Origen, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine, also Wiclif, Petrus Waldus, Hus, and Picus de Mirandola; and entered into correspondence with Erasmus. He became a learned man; and his scholarship, no less than the earnestness and energy he evinced in the discharge of his pastoral duties, and the great charm of his personal address, attracted attention. From the Pope he received through the legate, Cardinal Schinner, a pension of fifty gulden a year for the continuation of his studies. As a humanist, and a pupil of Wyttenbach, his relation to the doctrinal and disciplinary system of the Church of Rome was somewhat free; but there was nothing anti-Romanist or distinctly evangelical in his ministrations. Its character was moral rather than religious, and so were his first publications, — Der Labyrinth and Fabelsch Gedicht von einem Ochsen und elichen Thieren, 1510, 1511. Switzerland was at that time the barracks of Europe. Tens of thousands of young men hired themselves out every year as mercenaries; and foreign powers, France, the emperor, the Pope, inundated the country with enrolling agents, and paid regular pensions to the nobility in every canton in order to control the politics of the union. The results were the gradual decay of the old, stern republican virtues, and a steadily increasing profligacy and corruption. Zwingli, who, while pastor of Glarus, several times accompanied such regiments of Swiss mercenaries as their chaplain, saw the evil in all its hideousness, and attacked it with vehemence, both in the above publications and in his sermons. More especially he opposed the alliance with France; but, as the French party had the majority in the council of the canton, he was pursued with slander and chicanery to such a degree, that in 1516 he was glad to leave Glarus, and accepted the office of preacher at Einsiedeln.

Einsiedeln, in the canton of Schwyz, was the most celebrated place of pilgrimage in the country. Hic est plena remissio omnium peccatorum ("Full forgiveness of all sins can be had here") was written over its gates; and pilgrims, not only from Switzerland, but from the whole Southern Germany, flocked around its shrines. Zwingli, who knew what waste of human strength, what disturbance of human life, what suffering to the human heart, is the inevitable result of such superstition, turned away many a pilgrim by his sermons, to seek for consolation in some other way. He made no open attack. But he did not conceal, either, that he was fully aware of the horrible discrepancy between the ordinances of the Church and the ordinances of the Bible. He asked Cardinal Schinner, the papal legate Pucci, the Bishop of Constance, to employ their influence and power for the abrogation of gross misuses and the restoration of a pure preaching of God's word. In 1517 he began to discuss with his friends the possibility of abolishing the Papacy; in 1518 he drove the indulgence-seller, Samson, out of the canton by his open denunciations. The cardinal, the legate, the bishop, kept silent. They hoped to keep down the rising whirlwind by making Zwingli a titular chaplain to the Pope. But they mistook the man with the large, calm eyes, and the firmly-set mouth. In December, 1518, the "papal chaplain" accepted a call as preacher at the cathedral of Zurich, and the storm drew nearer, slowly but irresistibly.

On New Year's Day, 1519, he entered the pulpit of the cathedral of Zurich for the first time, and announced to his hearers, that, in a continuous series of sermons, he would preach on the life of Christ such as it was set forth in the Gospel of St. Matthew, and such as he had come to understand it by looking at it by its own inherent light to the exclusion of all human authorities. Thus he asserted what the Church was not willing to grant, — the freedom of the pulpit; and the impression he made was very great. Distinguished persons in the city who long before had ceased to frequent the church, because they derived no good from their visits, returned, and became active and zealous members of his flock. Even the peasants of the adjacent country crowded into the cathedral when he preached on market-days; and he had a peculiar manner of gaining their confidence also, outside of the church, always succeeding, when conversing with them, in "slipping a tract into their pocket, and the devil into their heart," as one of his adversaries expresses himself. In 1521 his influence had grown so great, that he was able to prevent Zurich from joining the other cantons in their alliance with France; and his Vermahnung an die zu Schwyz was received with much respect, though it did not achieve its purpose. But this political success, or, rather, this deed of patriotism, made him more enemies than his opposition to the practices of the Church. For the first time, the name "heretic" was applied to him. He answered with a sermon on 1 Tim. iv. 1-5, the pith of which is, that "it is no sin to eat flesh on a fast-day, but it is a great sin to sell human flesh for slaughtering;" and the result of which was, that a number of his hearers, for the first time, openly broke with the established discipline of the Church. The monks, the pensioners, the French partisans, the agents of foreign enrolment, then united, and caused an interference by the Bishop of Constance. The bishop sent his vicar-general to Zurich; but, in the debate which took place before the council, the vicar-general was miserably worsted by Zwingli, who shortly after, April 16, 1522, published his first tract of decided reformatory character, — Von Erbkiesen und Freyheit der Speisen. The pamphlet became the signal of battle. The ecclesiastical authorities decided that Zwingli should be put down speedily. But in July, same year, Zwingli held a meeting with ten other pastors at Einsiedeln, and thence an address was sent to the Bishop of Constance and the magistrates of Zurich, demanding, not only the freedom of the pulpit, but also the abolition of celibacy. In August he published his Archeteles, one of his boldest and one of his most characteristic polemical writings; and in the mean time echoes began to answer from everywhere in the neighborhood, — from Vadian in St. Gall, Myconius in Lucerne, Trachsler in Schwyz, Haller in Bern, etc. The mysterious disappearance of Luther after the diet of Worms, naturally made Zwingli the centre of the whole reformatory movement; and connections were opened with Capito, Hedio, and Bucer in Strassburg, with Pirkheimer and Dürer in Nuremberg, with Nesen in Franckfort, etc. The fermentation in Zurich finally became so violent, that the magistrates recognized the necessity of energetic action; and, in harmony with the temper of the time, a public religious disputation was decided upon.

It was held in the city-hall of Zurich, Jan. 29, 1523. About six hundred persons were present. The Bishop of Constance was represented by his vicar-general, Faber. For the occasion, Zwingli had drawn up sixty-five theses, in which he maintained that Christ is the only means of reconciliation with God, the only way to salvation, while the whole apparatus gotten up by the Church of Rome — papacy, mass, intercession of the saints, absolution, indulgences, etc. — is a vain thing; that Scripture is the highest, and, indeed, the only authoritative, guide, while the whole scheme laid out by the Church of Rome — priesthood, confession, fasting, penance, pilgrimage, monasticism, etc. — is a dangerous delusion. Both the formal and the material principles of the Reformation are set forth in these theses with great completeness, and applied with merciless logic. But the most characteristic and original feature in them is the new principle which is added,—the principle of ecclesiastical polity, which has exercised so decisive an influence on the whole development and organization of the Reformed Church. The congregation, and not the hierarchy, say the theses, is the representative of the Church; and to the congregation, consequently, and not to the hierarchy, belongs the right of considering the discrepancies which may arise between the doctrine and the practice of the Church. The administration of the Church belongs, like all administration, to the State authorities.—a proposition which at once overthrows the whole fabric of the Church of Rome. But, the theses add, if the State authorities go beyond the ordinances of Christ, let them be deposed. The disputation ended with a complete victory for Zwingli: the Reformation was formally adopted for the territory of Zurich. An artfully written letter was addressed by Pope Adrian VI. to Zwingli, insinuating that omnia præter sedem papalem ("every thing but the papal chair") was within his reach; but it failed to impress him. He published an explication of his theses, Ursagen und Gründ der Schlussreden oder Artikel, and began the gradual carrying-out of the necessary reforms in practical life. In June the female convents in the city and in the country were closed by the magistrates, without any preliminary conference with the bishop, and the nuns were sent back to their homes. In September the chapter of the cathedral was dissolved, and transformed into an educational establishment for theological students. April 2, 1524, the real but not formal marriage of Zwingli with Anna Reinhard was celebrated in the cathedral; and many of his colleagues followed his example. Meanwhile the question of the necessary reforms of the ritual began to cause considerable excitement. In September, 1523, Zwingli published his De Canone Missæ epichiresis, which in August, 1524, was followed by his Antibolon adversus Emserum. In these two pamphlets he for the first time broached his views of the Lord's Supper. It was, however, the question of the admissibility of images which attracted most attention; and in order to calm down the public mind, and prevent excesses, a second religious disputation was held, Oct. 26, 1523. About nine hundred persons were present. Vadian presided. The conclusions arrived at were, that images are forbidden by Scripture, and that the mass is not a sacrifice. Shortly after, the images disappeared from the churches, together with the organ and the relics. A number of festivals, processions, and ceremonies, were abolished; and at Easter, 1525, the Lord's Supper was for the first time celebrated in the Reformed manner, with the white spread table instead of the altar, the laity partaking of the cup, etc. In the same year Zwingli published his Commentarius de vera et falsa religione, the most complete, though not a systematic, presentation of his views.

Thus the Reformation had been established in Zurich through a gradual and peaceful development, without violence, almost without disturbances. Nevertheless, the situation was by no means without difficulties. First, the Anabaptists caused much embarrassment, and even some danger. They appeared at Zurich as early as 1523 (during the second disputation), represented by Grebel, Manz, and others, and demanding the formation of a holy congregation, from which all members who were not thoroughly regenerated and sanctified should be excluded. Zwingli held two conferences with them (March 20 and Nov. 30, 1525), and wrote against them, Vom Tauf, vom Wiedertauf und vom Kindertauf, May 27, 1525. But the peculiar manner in which they blended social and political radicalism with their religious enthusiasm, and their apparent connection with the peasant revolt in Germany, made more energetic measures necessary. By a decree of March 7, 1526, the magistrates put the penalty of drowning on re-baptisms. At the same time the attacks of the Roman-Catholic Church on the Reformation in Zurich became more and more vehement. They were directed through the union. At a diet of Lucerne, Jan. 26, 1524, the united canton decided to send a solemn embassy to Zurich, warning her from abandoning her old, time-honored traditions, and complaining of certain innovations already introduced. But Zurich answered (March 21), that, in matters referring to the word of God and the salvation of souls, she would brook no interference. A new embassy of July 12, same year, threatened Zurich with exclusion from the union, and she consequently immediately began to prepare for war. The invitation to the great disputation of Baden, where the Roman-Catholic Church was represented by Faber and Eck, Zwingli declined, as he knew that he could not accept it with safety. The Romanists gained a cheap victory, and the diet put Zwingli under the ban. To these difficulties was added the controversy with Luther, which finally split the whole reformatory movement into two hostile camps. It was Carlstadt's exposition of the doctrine of the Lord's Supper which occasioned Zwingli to give a full presentation of his views in the address to Alber, Nov. 16, 1524. All circumlocutions or ambiguous phrases are here avoided, and the symbolical conception of the copula of the words of institution (est=significat) is formally adopted. In the course of the controversy, Zwingli further published, Substitutum sive cororis de Eucharistia (Aug. 17, 1525), Ein klare Unterrichtung vom Nachtmal Christi (Feb. 26, 1526), Amica exegesis (March, 1527), Ueber Doctor Martin Luthers Buch (August, 1528), all distinguished by clearness and moderation; while the rejoinders of Luther are somewhat unattractive, both in form and tone. Finally, Landgrave Philipp of Hesse succeeded in gathering together all the principal representatives of the opposing views at the Conference of Marburg, October, 1529, and for a time the controversy subsided; but it did not remain a secret to the world, that there existed a discord between the two evangelical churches as deep and as passionate as that between the evangelical and the Roman-Catholic churches.

Meanwhile, the Reformation made rapid progress in Switzerland. By the conference of Jan. 4, 1528, at which Zwingli was present, the city of Bern was gained for the Reformation; and soon after, Basel, St. Gall, and Schaffhausen followed the example of Bern. But of course the progress of the Reformation carried with it a closer union of the opposite party. In November, 1528, five Roman-Catholic cantons, Freiburg at their head, concluded a separate alliance; and the following spring Archduke Ferdinand of Austria became a member of that alliance. April 21, 1529, Zurich, St. Gall, etc., formally protested against such a mixing-up of foreign princes with the internal politics of the union; but the answer they received was very chilling. A month later on (May 29, 1529), a Protestant pastor from Zurich was seized on the public highway, carried into Schwyz, tried for heresy, and sentenced to be burned. Zurich immediately declared war, and marched her troops into position, according to a plan of operation probably drawn up by Zwingli. He stood with the bulk of the army at Kappel, and the battle was about to begin, when mediators succeeded in preventing bloodshed; and a peace was negotiated June 23, 1529. Zwingli was not satisfied with the conditions of the peace, but predicted that they would cause still graver conflicts. During the Conference of Marburg he had by Landgrave Philipp been induced to take up a plan of forming a great coalition against the ambitious schemes of the House of Austria, and preliminary negotiations were opened with Venice, France, and other countries. At the same time he labored with great enthusiasm and energy for a reconstruction of the Swiss Union. The threads of the different plans became entangled; and at one time Zwingli's position was doubtful, even in Zurich. His theocratic ideas of civil government he had carried through with great severity, and discontent with him was actually brooding in the city. His wide political plans were used against him as a weapon of attack. He understood the situation very clearly; and on June 26 he appeared before the council, and handed in his resignation. The city was taken by surprise. All opposition grew dumb, and Zwingli's power was again almost without any restrictions. But only a few more moments were left to him. A famine in the Roman-Catholic cantons, and the rigid system of prohibition which Zurich maintained against the advice of Zwingli, brought about the conflict. On Oct. 10, 1531, the army of the Roman-Catholic cantons stood on the frontiers of Zurich. On the following morning Zwingli accompanied the troops of Zurich. At Kappel it came to a desperate battle. The troops of Zurich were utterly routed. Among the fallen was Zwingli: bending over a dying man, to comfort him, he was hit himself with a spear. His last words were, "They can kill the body, but not the soul."

Huldreich Zwingli was a well-balanced nature, wholly free from eccentricities, with a mind of large dimensions, and a character of great and noble simplicity. His will was his genius. An able scholar, with a ready perception of actual life, he saw, what most of the humanists saw, the evils of the time. But he had, what most of the humanists had not, a will to correct those evils; and with great practical tact he began with that which was most easy to handle, gradually enlarging his plans as his opportunities increased. His theology was in perfect harmony with his character. For transcendental speculation he had no talent. The metaphysical expositions of the idea of the Holy Trinity, found in the writings of the schoolmen, he adopted in a rather mechanical manner. The doctrines of creation, angels, miracles, status integritatis, the questions of the possibility of a fall and of the propagation of hereditary sin, the ideas of the intercession and royal office of Christ, he rarely touched. He took an active interest only in those doctrines which have a direct and practical bearing on the relation between God and man,—the way in which God communicates himself to man, and through man to the world; the indwelling of the Spirit of God in man, and the unity thereby effected between God and man; Christ as the great example entailing responsibility on every one who looks at it; faith as an organ, not of receptivity, but of spontaneity, etc. His writings have in a literary respect no particular merits; and he himself thought, that, as soon as the Bible was studied as it ought to be studied, they would prove superfluous, and fall into oblivion. The first collected edition of them is that by Gualther, his son-in-law, Zurich, 1545: the last and most complete is that by Schuler and Schulthess, Zurich, 1828-42, supplement, 1861. His correspondence with Œcolampadius appeared at Basel, 1536. Selections from his works have been made by Usteri and Vögelin, Zurich, 1819, 3 vols., and translations into High German by R. Christoffel, Zurich, 1843-46, 11 vols. [The following translations into English are mentioned by Lowndes: The Rekenynge and Declaration of the Fayth and Belefe of Huldrike Zwyngly, Zuryk, 1513 (another trans. ADAMS, Mrs. Sarah Flower, b. at Harlow, Essex, Feb. 22, 1805; d. Aug. 13, 1849; was the second daughter of Benjamin Flower, a well-known Liberal, and long editor of the Cambridge Intelligencer. In 1834 she married William Bridges Adams, an engineer and a writer of some eminence. She published Vivia Perpetua, a dramatic poem, 1841, and The Flock at the Fountain, a catechism with hymns, 1845. Her pastor in London was the able and distinguished William Johnson Fox (1787-1864), who was an Independent, and rather a deist than a Unitarian. To his remarkable Hymns and Anthems (1840-41) she contributed thirteen lyrics, among them the famous "Nearer, my God, to thee." In later years she is said to have become a Baptist. The story of her supposed residence in America, credited by Sir R. Palmer and Professor Cleveland, had no other basis than a purchase by a cousin of some land in Illinois, whereon her uncle settled in 1822. She has been confounded by Allibone and Dr. Belcher with her elder sister, Eliza Flower (b. at Cambridge, 180-; d. 1847), who set some of Mrs. Adams's songs to music, wrote sixty-two tunes for Fox's Hymns and Anthems, and published some poems, called Adoration, Aspiration, and Belief.

ADVENTISTS, the general name of a body, embracing several branches, who look for the proximate personal coming of Christ. William Miller, their founder, was a converted deist, who joined the Baptist church in Low Hampton, N.Y. He became a close student of the Bible, especially of the prophecies, and soon satisfied himself that the advent was to be personal and pre-millennial, and that it was near at hand. He began these studies in 1818, but did not enter upon the work of the ministry until 1831. The year 1843 was the date agreed upon for the advent: subsequently other dates were fixed, the failure of which divided a body of followers which had become quite numerous. In the year of his death (1849) they were estimated at 50,000. Many who had been drawn into the movement by the prevalent excitement left it, and returned to the churches from which they had withdrawn. After the second failure, Mr. Miller and some other leaders discouraged attempts to fix exact dates. On this question and the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, there have been divisions. There are now at least five distinct branches, all of which agree that the second coming of Christ is to be personal and pre-millennial, and that it is near at hand.

The oldest branch is the Evangelical Adventists. They believe in the natural immortality of the soul and in eternal future punishment. They publish a weekly paper in Boston, called Messiah's Herald. Their number has been estimated at from 5,000 to 9,000.

The most numerous branch is the Advent Christians, who are said to be upwards of 50,000 strong. They have two or three weekly papers, the chief of which is the World's Crisis of Boston. They also have a few missionary and denominational organizations. They believe that man is material, that the wicked are to be finally destroyed, and that the earth is to be made anew for the abode of the saints.

The third branch, the Seventh-Day Adventists, has a compacted organization, and has grown considerably, especially in the West. Its headquarters are at Battle Creek, Mich., where it has a health-institution, a college, a publishing-house, and other denominational enterprises. It maintains a number of missionaries abroad, and does home missionary work very systematically. It holds that it is still obligatory to observe the seventh day as the sabbath, and believes in visions as seen by Mrs. White, who has published several volumes of visions and testimonies. It numbers 16,000 or 17,000.

The Life and Advent Union, the fourth branch, believe that only the righteous dead will take part in the resurrection. They do not exceed 10,000 in number. They have a weekly paper, published in Springfield, Mass., called the Herald of Life.

The Age-to-come Adventists believe that the Jews are to be re-established in Jerusalem. A weekly paper called The Restitution, published in Plymouth, Ind., represents them. They are not numerous. All these bodies, excepting, perhaps, the Seventh-Day, are Congregational in polity. The latter has a general and annual conferences, and is, perhaps, more Presbyterian than Congregational.

The last census credits the Adventists with a total of 90,079 members, including 746 ordained ministers, and with 1,282 churches.

There is no wholly trustworthy literature. History of the Advent Message, by I. D. WELLCOME, Yarmouth, Me., 1874, is the fullest general history. The Seventh-Day Adventists publish a brief historical sketch of their own branch, with a statement of belief. The literature on the annihilation controversy is abundant. H. K. CARROLL.

ADVOWSON is the right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. It is synonymous with patronage. Advowsons are appendant (annexed to the possession of the manor), in gross (by legal conveyance separated from such possession), presentative (where the patron has absolute right of presentation), collative (where the bishop is also the patron), donative (where the patron puts the clergyman in possession by a simple written donation). See Dictionary of the English Church, Ancient and Modern, London and New York, 1881, s.v.

ALLATIUS, Leo (Leone Allacci), b. of Greek Catholic parents on the Island of Chios, 1586; d. in Rome, Jan. 19, 1669. He early manifested aptitude for learning, became a Roman Catholic, entered the Greek college at Rome (1600), and was graduated as doctor of theology and philosophy. For the next three years he taught in the seminary of the Bishop of Anglona, then became vicar-general of the Latin bishop of Chios, returned to Rome, took the degree of doctor of medicine (1616), became assistant in the Vatican Library, and professor of rhetoric in the Greek college; which latter position he resigned a few years afterwards. In 1622 Pope Gregory XV. sent him to Heidelberg to superintend the removal to Rome of the Palatine library, which the Emperor Maximilian had given to the Pope. This he accomplished (arriving at Rome Aug. 5, 1623), beset as he was with many difficulties; but Gregory XV.'s death (July 8, 1623) prevented his being rewarded for his valuable services, since the new pope, Urban VIII., did not like him. By the influence and assistance of friends—Cardinal Barberini made him his librarian—he was able, however, to continue his work in the Vatican Library and upon his private studies. In 1661 Alexander VII. appointed him custodian of the Vatican. His services to Greek learning, secular and patristic, are inestimable. There is scarcely an author among the Greek Fathers concerning whom he did not do some pioneer work, but his judgment by no means equalled his learning. One of the interests which lay near his heart was the union between the Greek and Latin churches, and his great learning was freely displayed to prove the insignificance of the separating causes. His principal writings upon this subject are De ecclesie occidentalis et orientalis perpetua consensione, Cologne, 1648; De utriusque ecclesie in dogmate de purgatorio consensione, Rome, 1655; De symbolo Athanasii, 1659; Vindicte Synodi Ephesine et S. Cyrilli de processione Spiritu Sancto ex Patre et Filio, 1661. He wrote also upon Johanna Papissa (1630), Græca orthodoxa (1652, 1659, 2 vols.), and innumerable topics connected with church history, philosophy, literary criticism, etc. His correspondence and his literary remains are found in the library of the Oratorians in Rome.

For further information, see STEPHAN GRADUS: Vita Leonis Allatii (unhappily unfinished, published by A. Mai, in Bibl. nova Patrum VI., ii. 5-28); TREINER: Schenkung der Heidelb. Bibliothek, München, 1844; RANKE: Gesch. der Päpste, ii. 306, and Appendix.

ALLEINE, Joseph, Nonconformist; b. at Devizes, 1634; d. Nov. 17, 1668. He was educated at Oxford, and took the degree of B.D. July 6, 1653; became chaplain to his college (Corpus Christi); resigned in 1655, to become assistant minister in Taunton. On Aug. 24, 1662, he was rejected for nonconformity, but preached whenever he had opportunity. In consequence, he was imprisoned; released May 26, 1664; again imprisoned, within a year, as violator of the Five-Mile Act, and again released. His last few years were troubled by constant danger of arrest for preaching. Before his ejection he had proved himself a model pastor. He had also remarkable learning. He associated as an equal with the fellows of the Royal Society, and concerned himself with scientific study and research. It is, however, as the author of An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners, that he is now remembered. This little book appeared in 1672, and has been ever since a religious classic. It is the fruit of a consecrated life. In 1675 its title was changed to A Sure Guide to Heaven. He wrote also an Explanation of the Assembly's Catechism (1656), and other works. See his Life by Baxter (London, 1672) and by Charles Stanford (1861).

ALLEN, James, b. at Gayle, Yorkshire, June 24, 1734; d. there Oct. 31, 1804; was one of the Inghamite preachers from 1752 to 1761, then associated with Glas and Sandeman, and during his later years ministered at a chapel which he built on his own estate. He edited the Kendal Hymn-Book, 1757, and, with W. and C. Batty, wrote most of its contents. One or two of his hymns are still used.

ANAN THE KARAITE. See KARAITE JEWS.

ANDREW, one of the twelve apostles, brother of Peter, like him born in Bethsaida (John i. 41, 45), and a member of Peter's family in Capernaum (Mark i. 21, 29). His name, although Greek, was common among Jews (Dio Cassius, 68, 32). According to John (i. 35 sqq.), Andrew was the first one to follow Jesus in consequence of the Baptist's testimony, and the one to introduce Peter to Jesus. In Jesus' later Galilean choice of disciples, the two brothers were the first called to the apostleship (Matt. iv. 18 sqq.; Mark i. 16 sqq.). It is not, therefore, without good grounds that the Greeks give to Andrew the epithet πρωτόκλητος. The Gospels evidence, that next to Peter, James, and John, Andrew with Philip occupied a prominent place among the twelve (Mark iii. 18, xiii. 3; John vi. 8, xii. 22; Acts i. 13). Yet in the Acts he is, like almost all the other apostles, barely mentioned. The apocryphal Acts of Andrew (Tischendorf: Acta ap. apocr., pp. 105 sqq.), which is distinguished from the other apocryphal Acts by its relatively earlier attestation (Tischendorf, l.c. Proleg. pp. xl. sqq.), relate that he labored in Greece, but Eusebius (H.E., III. 1) says in Scythia. According to tradition he was crucified on Nov. 30, at Patræ in Achaia, by the proconsul Ægeas, and upon a Cruz decussata (X), hence called a "St. Andrew's cross." See, on the traditional Andrew, FABRICIUS: Codex Apocr., pp. 456; [LIPSIVS: Apok. Apostelgesch., i. pp. 543-622]. KARL SCHMIDT.

ANSTICE, Joseph, b. at Madeley Wood, Shropshire, 1808; d. at Torquay, Feb. 29, 1836; was educated at Westminster and Oxford, where he graduated with great distinction, and when only twenty-two became professor of classical literature at King's College, London. He wrote some prize essays, poems, etc., and translated Selections from the Greek Dramatic Writers, 1832. His fifty-four Hymns appeared posthumously in 1836; and twenty-seven of them were incorporated in Mrs. Yonge's Child's Christian Year, 1841. Several of them are much used.

ANTI-MISSION BAPTISTS (Primitive or Old-School Baptists) agree with the regular Baptists, except in their opposition to missions, Sunday schools, and similar church enterprises. The Chemung Association (New York and Pennsylvania) in September, 1835, withdrew fellowship with those associations which countenanced such enterprises; in May, 1836, the Baltimore Association did the same; and similar divisions ran through other churches and associations, mostly in the South and West. In 1844 The Baptist Almanac reported 181 Anti-Mission Baptist Associations, 1,622 churches, 900 ministers, 61,162 members; in 1883 The Baptist Year-Book gives these Baptists 900 churches, 490 ministers, and 40,000 members; but the figures are doubtless too high. See Baptist Encyclopedia, pp. 77 sq.

ATWATER, Lyman Hotchkiss, D.D., LL.D., b. at Hamden, Conn., Feb. 23, 1813; d. at Princeton, N.J., Feb. 17, 1883. He was graduated at Yale College, 1831; was a tutor and theological student at Yale, 1832-35; pastor of the First Congregational Church in Fairfield, Conn., 1835-54; and from 1854 till his death a professor in the college at Princeton, N.J., at first of mental and moral philosophy, afterwards of logic and moral and political science. His numerous contributions to the Princeton Review, of which he became an editor in 1869, and to other periodicals, were of marked ability, and gave him a high place among American theologians. In 1867 he published A Manual of Logic, Philadelphia.

AUBER, Harriet, b. in London, Oct. 4, 1773; d. at Hoddesdon, Herts, Jan. 20, 1862; lived in retirement at Broxbourne and Hoddesdon, and wrote much unpublished poetry. She is known by a small volume of great merit, The Spirit of the Psalms, with a few hymns, which appeared anonymously, 1829. With the similar works of Montgomery (1822) and H. F. Lyte (1834) it contains the best versions published during the present century. Lyte, perhaps unconsciously, adopted the same title, and hence frequent confusion has arisen; Miss Auber's verses being sometimes ascribed to him.

AUSTIN, John, b. at Walpole in Norfolk, about 1620; d. in London, 1669; was of a good family, and studied at Cambridge, but became a Romanist. He is credited with The Christian Moderator, or Persecution for Religion Condemned, 1651, and some other books, besides Devotions in the Antient Way of Offices, 1668. This was "reformed" by T. Dorrington, 1684, and again by Mrs. S. Hop-ton, and published by Dean or Bishop Hickey, in which shape it reached a fifth edition, 1717, and was reprinted, 1846. It includes some forty hymns remarkable for freshness and fervency, and some of them possessing great beauty.

BAKER, Sir Henry Williams, b. in London, May 27, 1821; d. at Monkland, Herefordshire, Feb. 11, 1877; son of a baronet and vice-admiral; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; ordained deacon 1844, priest 1846, vicar of Monkland 1851. He wrote sundry tracts and prayers, and was the most prominent compiler of Hymns Ancient and Modern, 1861 (appendix, 1868, rev. and enlarged edition, 1871), the most successful and influential of modern collections. His own contributions to this (some twenty-five in number, including translations and originals) are of no little value. They are very popular in the English Church, and several of them are much used in America. Both as editor and as writer, Baker's is one of the most important names in the history of recent hymnody.

BAKEWELL, John, b. at Brailsford, Derbyshire, 1721; d. at Lewisham, March 18, 1819; was a Wesleyan preacher from 1749, and conducted an academy at Greenwich for many years. He wrote one universally familiar hymn, "Hail, thou once despised Jesus!"

BARTON, Bernard, b. in London, Jan. 31, 1784; d. at Woodbridge, Suffolk, Feb. 19, 1849; was widely known as "the Quaker poet." At fourteen he was apprenticed to a shopkeeper at Halstead, Essex, and from 1810 was a bank-clerk. Notwithstanding these practical employments, he produced a vast amount of verse, though wisely dissuaded by Byron and Lamb from trusting wholly to authorship. He published Metrical Effusions, 1812; Poems, 1820; Napoleon, 1822; Poetic Vigils, 1824; Devotional Verses, 1827; Household Verses, 1845; and others. His muse, if no-wise strong or striking, is pleasing, pure, and pious. One or two of his pieces have been used as hymns, and many of them are found in the collections of sacred poetry. His Memoirs and Letters were edited by his daughter.

BATHURST, William Hiley, b. at Cleve Dale, near Bristol, Aug. 28, 1796; d. at Sydney Park, Gloucestershire, 1877; was educated at Winchester and Oxford, and in 1820 became rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, Yorkshire. This living he resigned, 1852, and retired to Darleydale, Derbyshire, removing in 1863 to his inherited estate of Sydney Park. He published An Essay on the Limits of Human Knowledge, 1827; Metrical Musings, 1849; The Georgics of Virgil translated, 1849; and Psalms and Hymns, 1831, 2d ed., 1842. Of his two hundred and six hymns many have been used in England, and a few are well known in America, especially "Oh for a faith that will not shrink!"

BAUER, Bruno, b. at Eisenberg, Saxony, Sept. 9, 1809; d. near Berlin, April 13, 1882. He was graduated at Berlin; became a licentiate of theology there in 1834, privatdocent at Bonn in 1838, and extraordinary professor there in 1839. In 1812 he was deposed. From belonging to the right of the Hegelian school, he turned in 1839 to the left. He then went to Berlin, and sent forth book after book full of the wildest speculation, although full of learning. He outdid the Tübingen school in that he gave up all the Pauline Epistles. He outdid Strauss in that he traced Christianity to the conscience of Roman imperial times, sown with the seeds of stoical and Alexandrine philosophy, indeed, made Seneca the real founder of Christianity. He appears to have been of unsound mind. Of his numerous writings may be mentioned Kritik der ewange- lischen Gesch. des Johannes, Bremen, 1840; Kritik der evangelischen Geschichte der Synoptiker, Leipzig, 1841, 2 vols.; Kritik der Evangelien, Berlin, 1850–52, 4 vols.; Kritik der paulinischen Briefe, 1850–52, 3 vols.; Die Apostelgeschichte, 1850; Christus und die Casaren, 1877.

BEAUMONT, Joseph, D.D., b. at Hadleigh in Suffolk, March 13, 1615; d. at Cambridge, Nov. 23, 1699; was educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, and became a fellow and tutor there, but was ejected by the Puritans in 1644. At the Restoration he became a king's chaplain and D.D.; master of Jesus College, 1662, and of Peterhouse, 1663; rector of Feversham near Cambridge, 1663, and of Barley in Hertfordshire, 1664; and professor of divinity, 1670. In 1665 he had a controversy with Henry More, and received the thanks of the university for it. His Psyche, or Love's Mystery, the longest English poem, was begun in April, 1647, finished the following March, and published in folio, 1648. The second edition (1702) has 24 cantos and 38,922 lines, with occasional brilliancies. Pope said, "There are in it a great many flowers well worth gathering." His shorter Poems in English and Latin, with a memoir, appeared in quarto, 1749. These are extracted from his manuscripts written in the summer of 1652 and earlier. Though little known, and written with small attention to polish, a few of these poems are in the noblest style of that heroic age. If Beaumont had not the pathos of Herbert, he sometimes approaches the bluntness of Wither, the wit of Quarles, and the sublimity of Vaughan.

BEDDOME, Benjamin, b. at Henley-in-Arden, Warwickshire, Jan. 23, 1717; d. at Bourton, Gloucestershire, Sept. 3, 1795; spent his early years at Bristol and in London, and from 1743 was Baptist pastor at Bourton-on-the-water. Modest and unambitious, he declined a London charge, and left his writings, except an Exposition of the Baptist Catechism (1752), to be published by others. Twenty of his sermons appeared 1805, and sixty-seven, with a memoir, in 1835, forty years after his death. His eight hundred and thirty Hymns were gathered 1818; some sixty-four of them having been included in Rippon's Selection, 1787–1800. Many of these were widely used in former days, and some of them hold place still. Among hymnists of the old sober school—i.e., followers of Watts, with no taint of Wesleyanism and trochaic metres—Beddome stands high, ranking, probably, next to Doddridge and Steele. James Montgomery, in the Introduction to his Christian Psalmist (1825), gave a somewhat exaggerated estimate of his verses, finding them "very agreeable as well as impressive, being, for the most part, brief and fitting," and crediting them with "the terseness and simplicity of the Greek epigram." Other critics have hardly confirmed this judgment, but the lyrics have a modest usefulness yet.

BEGG, James, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Free Church of Scotland; was b. at New Monkland, near Airdrie, in Lanarkshire, where his father was parish minister, in 1809. Having been licensed in 1829, he was ordained to the ministry at Maxwelltown, Dumfries, in May, 1830, and from the first was a powerful and popular preacher. From Maxwelltown he was translated to Edinburgh as assistant to Mr. Jones of Lady Glenorchy's; thence to the Middle Parish, Paisley; thence, in 1835, to Liberton, near Edinburgh; and when the disruption occurred, in 1843, he had a church built at Newington in Edinburgh. There he ministered till his death, which took place at Edinburgh, Oct. 30, 1883. In 1847 he received the degree of D.D. from Lafayette College, Pennsylvania. In 1865 he was chosen moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church.

Dr. Begg began his career as an ardent supporter of evangelical views, and a very decided opponent of the "moderate" party in the church. He was strongly opposed to lay patronage, and an enthusiastic supporter of Dr. Chalmers in his church-extension scheme. He was at the same time an opponent of voluntarism, and contended eagerly for the establishment and support of the Church by the State. When the aggressions of the civil courts on the jurisdiction of the Church took place, he resisted them strenuously, and broke the interdicts of the Court of Session by preaching in the parishes of the suspended ministers of Strathbogie, contrary to the requirements of the civil courts. At the convocation of ministers in 1842, held to deliberate as to the propriety of dissolving the connection with the State, Dr. Begg was disposed to continue to fight the battle within the Establishment; but in May, 1843, he left along with his brethren. In the Free Church, Dr. Begg from the first was a conspicuous and powerful man. From an early period he showed a disposition to take his own course on several points, against the course recommended by Drs. Candlish, Buchanan, and other leading men; and this disposition became more and more pronounced, till latterly he was the recognized chief of a party of opposition, usually a somewhat small minority. In the discussion on union with the United Presbyterian and other churches, Dr. Begg's attitude of opposition and that of his friends was so serious and decided, that the project for an incorporating union had to be abandoned. What Dr. Begg was alarmed at was lest the door should be thrown open to voluntary views, and lest the severance of Church and State, and of all religion from matters under the control of the State, should follow. Dr. Begg thought that he saw unwholesome tendencies at work in this direction, and on various other questions he adopted more and more a conservative attitude. He opposed the use of hymns in public worship, and looked with horror on instrumental music. In these movements he found his greatest support in the Highlands, and many in that part of the country looked on him as a barrier raised up between the Church and the flood. In the Robertson Smith case he was most strenuous in opposing the views of the new critical school. Dr. Begg took a lively interest in the conflict with Popery, and was a strong advocate for the due observance of the sabbath. In many social questions he strenuously upheld the rights of the people. He was a vigorous advocate of better homes for the working-classes; and one of the last acts of his life was to show his sympathy with Highlanders from Rosshire, who had been imprisoned for preventing a goods' train from running one Lord's Day.

Dr. Begg was a great pamphleteer, and was fond of writing in newspapers and magazines. He was for a long time editor of the Bulwark, a journal devoted to the maintenance of Protestantism. The Watchword was his organ for opposing the union with the United Presbyterians. More recently the Signal was started, to oppose instrumental music in worship. Among his larger publications were A Handbook of Poetry, Free Church Principles, Happy Homes, and how to get them. In figure, Dr. Begg was tall and massive, with a handsome and expressive countenance. His bonhomie, frankness, and good-nature made him popular with both friends and foes; while at the same time it was apparent that he wanted certain qualities needful to one who would successfully lead a large body of earnest, spiritual men.

W. G. BLAIRIE.

BELLOWS, Henry Whitney, D.D., prominent Unitarian clergyman; b. in Walpole, N.H., June 10, 1814; d. in New York, Monday, Jan. 30, 1882. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1832, and at the Divinity School, 1837; was called to the First Congregational (Unitarian) Society, subsequently known as All Souls' Unitarian Church, New York, 1838, and remained their pastor till his death. He was faithful, energetic, zealous, and at times eloquent. An indefatigable worker and a man of broad sympathies, he connected himself prominently with all the best movements of art, literature, history, education, and philanthropy in the city. By his connection with the United-States Sanitary Commission (1861-66) during the American civil war, of which he was one of the organizers, president, and tireless advocate, he achieved a national reputation, and endeared himself to innumerable households. In 1867, on a visit to Europe, he promoted the organization there of International Sanitary Commissions, which have proved of great benefit in subsequent wars. Of his books may be mentioned Restatements of Christian Doctrine, Boston, 1859 (new ed., 1870), and Old World in its New Face: Impressions of Europe in 1867-68, New York, 1868.

BERRIDGE, John, b. at Kingston, Nottinghamshire, February, 1716; d. at Everton, Jan. 22, 1793; was long famous for evangelical zeal and eccentric humor. The son of a farmer, he was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. In his own words, he "remained ignorant of [his] fallen state till 1730, lived proudly on faith and works for salvation till 1751, fled to Jesus for refuge 1755." He became curate of Stapleford, 1749, and vicar of Everton, 1755. He was one of the few beneficed clergymen who co-operated actively with Wesley, Whitefield, and Lady Huntingdon. He published The Christian World Unmasked, 1773, and 312 Sion's Songs, 1755. A previous Collection of Divine Songs, 1760, he carefully recalled and burned. The same fate might well have befallen some of those which retained his approval, so coarse and extravagant is their imagery: but two or three of them are still valued and used.

BIBLE CHRISTIANS. This denomination originated in the west of England in 1815, under the ministry of W. O'Bryan, who had been a member and "local preacher" with the Wesleyan Methodists, and had subsequently for a while labored independently. On New-Year's Day, 1816, the first quarterly meeting was held, and the number of members was 237. It was soon found necessary, for carrying on the good work which had extended through Devon and Cornwall, that other laborers should be associated with W. O'Bryan; and these were supplied from among the young converts, James Thorne being the first. Preaching and other religious services were chiefly conducted in dwelling-houses, hired rooms, and the open air. The preachers had their food and entertainment among the friends where they labored, and a small salary was allowed them to meet other necessities. Mr. O'Bryan and his co-laborers expressed themselves strongly against ministerial titles, believing that ministers calling themselves "Reverend" was contrary to the teachings of Christ and the practice of the primitive church; but gradually this scruple has passed away, and the use of the title almost universally obtains. In about two years from the formation of the first society, there were 6 itinerant preachers, 4 helpers, and 1,112 members of society. In the summer of 1819 the first conference was held at Launceston in Cornwall. There were then 16 men and 14 women itinerant preachers, as reported in the minutes of conference. The denomination from the first favored female preaching, though it did not consider it was their place and work to take part in church government. And, if great success in winning souls is a proof of divine sanction, then was the approbation of God manifested in connection with the labors of these pious sisters; and though every brother could not be said to be without fault, yet of these devout sisters it may be said, not one of them disgraced her sex or the cause of Christ. After some years, however, from various causes, instead of increasing, the number of female preachers grew less; so that, at the conference of 1882, though a few females still acted as local preachers, not one remained on the list of itinerant preachers in the conferences of England and the colonies. The Tenth Annual Conference (1829) reports a membership of 7,845, with 59 male and 22 female itinerant preachers. In 1838 the itinerant men preachers had increased to 84, while the itinerant females were reduced to 11. The membership had risen to 9,839. For some years the conference consisted of preachers only; and, by the consent of all, Mr. O'Bryan presided at these assemblies, and, without being appointed to any one circuit in particular, had the superintendency of the whole work. Ultimately lay-delegates were admitted to the conference; and, as some of Mr. O'Bryan's doings did not give general satisfaction, it was thought by other members of the conference, that, though they were willing he should still preside at their annual assemblies, yet some restraint ought to be laid on the power of government which he claimed. This was so contrary to Mr. O'Bryan's principles, and caused such unpleasantness between him and the preachers and lay-delegates, as led, after two or three years, to a rupture between them. At the conference of 1829 Mr. O'Bryan, not being able to overrule the other members, declared the conference adjourned, and left. Few, if any, of the members of conference left with Mr. O'Bryan: the rest remained, and carried on the business. Some of the members of society, and two or three preachers, held with Mr.

O'Bryan and some others he called out as preachers to assist him. Each party claimed the right of property, and an unhappy conflict and rivalry continued for about two years. God, however, who so greatly blessed Mr. O'Bryan's labors at first, did not prosper him in this movement. Ultimately a reconciliation took place. The members and most of the preachers, in connection with Mr. O'Bryan, returned to the other party; and Mr. O'Bryan left England for America, and settled in New York, where he died Jan. 8, 1868. He never became nominally united to the Bible Christians after he left; but a friendly intercourse was kept up, and Mr. O'Bryan paid more than one visit to his friends in England. He also once visited the Bible Christians in Canada, and after the re-union he received a liberal annuity from the English conference till his death. His error was one of judgment rather than of principle, for he still lived an exemplary Christian life till his earthly course terminated. Before the separation from Mr. O'Bryan, the work had extended from Devon and Cornwall to the Scilly Islands, the Norman Isles, Somerset, Wales, Isle of Wight, Portsmouth, London, Kent, and Sussex. In 1831 missionaries were sent to Canada and Prince Edward Island, and subsequently to the United States, Australia, Melbourne, New Zealand, and Queensland. In 1865 the jubilee of the denomination was held, and a jubilee volume published at the book-room, 26 Paternoster Row, London, Eng. Before this, in 1854, the American work was organized into a separate conference; and the same privilege was subsequently granted to South Australia. In 1882, under the government of the Canadian conference, there were ten districts, — one in Prince Edward Island, six in Ontario, one in Manitoba, and two in the United States, one of which is in the State of Ohio, and the other in Wisconsin. On these stations there were 81 itinerant preachers and 7,531 members. The Australian conference has 31 ministers and 2,306 members. Victoria, New Zealand, and Queensland are not as yet invested with conferential powers. The entire denomination as reported in 1882 had a membership of over 31,000, with 299 ministers. The denomination has a good school, or college as it is now called, situated at Shebbear, in the County of Devon, Eng. It has three publishing-houses, one at 26 Paternoster Row, London, Eng., another in Bowmanville, Ontario, Can., and the third in Adelaide, South Australia. In doctrine the Bible Christian Church is Methodist, according to the recognized standards; and their polity is liberal, admitting to all their church courts the laity as well as ministers. The name "Bible Christian" was not assumed in disrespect to other Christian bodies, as though they were unworthy of the appellation; but having been first given them because the preachers made so much use of the Bible in their sermons, family visits, and their closets, they adopted it, as they desired that both their faith and practice should be in harmony with divine revelation as contained in the Bible, and they did not wish to be called after any mere man.

With the small sect bearing the same name in the Eastern States of America this denomination has no connection.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, D.D., b. at Annan in Scotland, 1721; d. at Edinburgh, July 7, 1791; lost his sight when six months old, yet became a man of learning and literary activity. He studied at the university of Edinburgh, and was licensed as a preacher in 1759. Among his publications are Poems, 1754; Paracelsus, 1767; A Panegyric on Great Britain, 1773; The Graham, 1774; and a few hymns still somewhat used.

BODEN, James, b. at Chester, 1757; d. at Chesterfield, June 4, 1841; was Congregational pastor at Hanley, Staffordshire, for fifteen years, and at Sheffield, 1796–1839. He was one of the founders of the London Missionary Society in 1795, and in 1801, with Edward Williams, D.D., issued a collection of hymns supplementary to Watts, which was one of the most creditable and useful hymnals up to its date. It contained a few of his own.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY, School of Theology of. This oldest of the theological seminaries of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was projected in 1839, the first centennial year of British Methodism. In connection with the then strong academic institution in Newbury, Vt., instruction was commenced in 1840, though for lack of funds the institution could not be independently established and officered until 1847. At this latter date, under a charter from the Legislature of New Hampshire, it was opened at Concord, N.H., as the Methodist General Biblical Institute. Its first faculty included men of marked character, such as the Rev. John Dempster, D.D., later the projector and organizer of the theological school at Evanston, Ill.; the Rev. John W. Merrill, D.D., who was called from the presidency of McKendree College; the Rev. Osmon C. Baker, D.D., soon to be chosen one of the bishops of the church; the Rev. Stephen M. Vail, D.D., the enthusiastic Hebraist; the Rev. Charles Adams, D.D.; and, a little later, the saintly David Patten, D.D.

In connection with the celebration of the centennial of American Methodism, the school was more adequately endowed; and, as a consequence, it was removed to Boston, re-organized, and opened in the fall of 1876 as the Boston Theological Seminary. In 1871 it was merged into the newly established Boston University, taking the name which it now bears. Its chief benefactors were the same men who founded the university, — Isaac Rich, Lee Claflin, Jacob Sleeper, and ex-Governor William Claflin.

The curriculum of the school is of unusual breadth. In addition to all the branches ordinarily taught in similar institutions, it presents a great variety of elective studies in ancient and modern languages, philosophy, and the moral sciences. It was the first in America to maintain a regular required course in theological encyclopædia and methodology, and another in the science of missions. It has long maintained a required course of one year in the history of Christian philosophy in its relations to Christian doctrine. It was the first to give three hours a week for one year to the study of the ethnic religions, comparative theology, and the philosophy of religion. It has had advanced classes in which the instruction was wholly in German, with the use of German text-books, and original German lectures. It has maintained missionary classes in Spanish; and as a fruit the Methodist-Episcopal mission in Mexico is almost exclusively manned by former members of these classes. Large numbers of graduates have also gone to other missions throughout the world. Courses of lectures have been given before the school by President McCosh, ex-Presidents Hopkins and Woolsey, Presidents Martin B. Anderson and E. G. Robinson, and a great number of other foremost divines and scholars of the country.

At the present time (1883-84) the governing faculty is as follows: William F. Warren, president, professor of comparative theology and of the history and philosophy of religion; James E. Latimer, dean, professor of systematic theology; John W. Lindsay, professor of exegetical theology and New-Testament Greek; Luther T. Townsend, Harris professor of practical theology; Henry C. Sheldon, professor of historical theology; Samuel S. Curry, professor of sacred oratory; Hinckley G. Mitchell, instructor in Hebrew and Old-Testament exegesis.

WILLIAM F. WARREN.

BOWDLER, John, jun., b. in London, Feb. 4, 1783; d. there Feb. 1, 1815; was a young lawyer of talent and high character, whose promising career was cut short by consumption. He studied at Sevenoaks and Winchester; was articled to a solicitor, 1800; admitted to the bar, 1807, and travelled abroad 1810-12, in a vain search for health. His Select Pieces in Verse and Prose, issued 1816 by his father, in two vols. 8vo, contain a few hymns of unusual elegance.

BROWN, James, a banker and Christian philanthropist; b. at Ballymena, County Antrim, Ireland, Feb. 4, 1791; d. in New-York City, Nov. 1, 1877. He came to Baltimore, Md., in 1800, with his father, Alexander Brown, and his three brothers, William, John A., and George. The father established himself in the Irish linen business, and greatly prospered. James Brown founded the famous banking-house of Brown Brothers and Company in New-York City, in 1826. He made wise use of his great wealth, giving freely, largely, and judiciously, but without ostentation, from mere pleasure in doing good. For many years he was president of the New-York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, an active elder of the University-place (Presbyterian) Church, a director of Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and a friend to every worthy enterprise. In 1874 he greatly enlarged the usefulness of that seminary by the grant of three hundred thousand dollars for the full endowment of all the professorships, — an amount largely exceeding the aggregate of all that had been given by the founders of the several chairs.

BROWN, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., b. in Northumberland County, Penn., 1776; d. at Pittsburgh, Penn., July 29, 1853. He was graduated at Dickinson College, 1794; pastor at Mifflin; called to Washington, Penn., as first pastor of the church, and principal of the academy, Oct. 16, 1805. In 1806 a charter was obtained, and Washington College began, Dr. Brown president. Success here in all functions pronounced. Resigned presidency in 1816, continued pastorate until 1822, then called to Jefferson College, Cannonsburgh, Penn. Here ability, energy, teaching faculty, and marvellous personal influence, with experience and growing popular power, told in the rapid development of the institution. In twenty-three years the graduates numbered seven hundred and seventy-two. "Nearly one-half entered the ministry, and not a few went as foreign missionaries" (Brownson). Six years after leaving Washington he was invited to resume his place there as pastor and president, but declined. Yet at his death he was, according to his own request, buried there.

Besides sermons and addresses, he published Memoir of Rev. O. Jennings, D.D., 1832, and Life of Rev. J. McMullan, D.D. SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

BROWN, Phœbe (Hinsdale), b. at Canaan, N.Y., May 1, 1783; d. at Marshall, Henry County, Ill., Oct. 10, 1861; was left an orphan at two, and never learned to read or write till eighteen. Her youth was passed under "intense and cruel suffering," and her whole life in poverty and trouble. She married Timothy H. Brown, a painter, and went to Ellington, Conn.; there, in August, 1818, her famous "I love to steal a while away" was written, under circumstances, probably, the most pathetic that have attended the origin of any hymn. It was altered and abridged by Nettleton, or some one else, and appeared, with two more by her, in Village Hymns, 1824. She contributed other hymns, some of them still popular, to later collections, and wrote sundry newspaper articles, tracts, and a volume of tales, The Tree and its Fruits, N.Y., 1836. After living some thirty years at Monson, Mass., her last years were spent with a daughter in Illinois. Her autobiography was "written at the urgent request of her children, at Chicago, in 1849," and, with her poetical manuscripts, is preserved by the family of her son, Dr. S. R. Brown, the first American missionary to Japan, who was not alone in reverently cherishing her memory. (See New-York Independent for Jan. 6, Jan. 20, and April 14, 1881.) "My history," she wrote, "is soon told, — a sinner saved by grace and sanctified by trials."

BROWNE, George, the first Protestant archbishop of Dublin; d. about 1556. He was graduated at Oxford, and was an Augustinian friar when he embraced the Reformation. On March 19, 1535, he was consecrated archbishop of Dublin. In consequence of his reformatory labors he was deposed by Queen Mary.

BROWNE, Peter, b. in Ireland about 1660; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; consecrated bishop of Cork and Ross, 1710; d. 1735. His principal works are The procedure, extent, and limits of human understanding, 1728, 2d ed., 1729 (an able critique of Locke's Essay); Things divine and supernatural conceived by analogy with things natural and human, 1733 (asserts that God's essence and attributes can only be expressed analogically).

BROWNE, Simon, b. at Shepton Mallet, Somersetshire, about 1680; d. 1732; was Independent pastor at Portsmouth, and from 1716 at Old Jewry, London. This charge he gave up in 1723, when laboring under a singular mania, — a case long cited in books of mental philosophy. In that year, grief for the deaths of his wife and son, and of a highwayman whom he had killed unintentionally and in self-defence, unhinged his mind, though only in one particular. He maintained that God had "annihilated in him the thinking substance, and utterly divested him of consciousness," and replied to a friend who instanced his learned and laborious occupations, "I am doing nothing that requires a reasonable soul: I am making a dictionary." Yet, as Toplady said, "instead of having no soul, he wrote and reasoned and prayed as if he had two." His publications numbered twenty-three, including A Disquisition on the Trinity, and a defence of Christianity against Woolston, etc. Prior to his misfortune had appeared Sermons, 1722, and two earlier treatises, besides two hundred and sixty-six Hymns and Spiritual Songs, 1720. This last is an important volume, and places him high in the school of Watts, whom he was the first to follow in order of time. His hymns, if not eminently poetical, are unusually solid: their strongly ethical character has caused many of them to be long and largely used by Unitarians, though Browne himself was rigidly Orthodox; and a few of them are still general favorites, as eminently, "Come, gracious Spirit."

BRUCE, Michael, b. at Kinrosswood, Kinross-shire, March 27, 1746; d. there July 5, 1767; is the hero of one of the most pathetic chapters in literary history. The son of a poor weaver, he was designed for the ministry, and managed to study at Edinburgh; but severe labors and privations cut short his promising career. His parents intrusted his poetical manuscripts to his friend Logan, who published a few of them in 1770, and in 1781 printed nine hymns and the famous Ode to the Cuckoo as his own. The Rev. A. B. Grosart, in The Works of Michael Bruce, with Memoir and Notes, 1865, has done justice to his memory, and exposed Logan's villainy. Several of Bruce's lyrics were admitted among the Scotch Paraphrases, 1781, of which they are the chief ornament.

BRYANT, William Cullen, b. at Cummington, Mass., Nov. 3, 1794; d. at Roslyn, L.I., June 12, 1878; entered Williams College, 1810; began to study law, 1812; admitted to the bar, 1815, and practised at Plainfield and Great Barrington; removed to New York, 1825, and became connected with the Evening Post, 1826. His long, honorable, and successful career is known to every reader. His poetry, which he began to write at the age of ten, and to publish in 1821, though never emotional, is always grave, and often devout. His hymns appeared in various collections from 1820 to 1878, beginning with the New-York Unitarian Collection, and ending with the Methodist Hymnal; and nineteen were privately printed in 1869. Some of them have been widely used.

BULFINCH, Stephen Greenleaf, D.D., b. in Boston, June 15, 1809; d. at East Cambridge, Mass., Oct. 12, 1870; graduated at Columbia College, Washington, D.C., 1827, and at the Cambridge Theological School, 1830; Unitarian minister at Charleston, S.C. (1831), Pittsburgh (1837), Washington (1838), Nashua, N.H. (1845) Dorchester (1852), East Cambridge (1865). Besides sundry prose-works, he published Contemplations of the Saviour, 1832; Poems, Charleston, 1834; Lays of the Gospel, 1845; Harp and Cross (a selection), 1857. His hymns possess considerable merit, and have been rather extensively used.

BURDER, George, b. in London, June 5, 1752; d. there May 29, 1832; was Independent minister at Lancaster (1778), Coventry (1783), and Fetter Lane, London (1803). He was among the founders of the London Missionary Society, 1795, the Religious Tract Society, 1799, and the British and Foreign Bible Society, and from 1803 to 1827 served gratuitously as secretary of the first named, besides editing the Evangelical Magazine. The most successful of his many publications were Village Sermons, 1797-1820, 8 vols., and a Supplement to Watts, 1784. The latter went through some fifty editions, and contained four hymns of his own.

BURLEIGH, William Henry, b. at Woodstock, Conn., Feb. 12, 1812; d. at Brooklyn, N.Y., March 18, 1871; was an active and zealous reformer, editing temperance and antislavery papers in Pittsburgh (1837), Hartford (1843), Syracuse (1849), and Albany. From 1855 he was harbor-master of New York. He published Poems, Philadelphia, 1841, enlarged edition, with memoir by his wife, New York, 1871. Several of his hymns are used in England as well as here.

BURNHAM, Richard, b. 1749; d. in London, Oct. 30, 1810; was a Baptist minister, and wrote some three hundred and twenty hymns, which appeared 1783 and 1796. They are of a low order, but have had success in certain quarters.

BYROM, John, b. at Kersall, near Manchester, 1691; d. there Sept. 28, 1763; entered Trinity College, Cambridge, 1708, and became a fellow of it, 1714; contributed to the Spectator; invented a system of shorthand, and taught it with much success; became F.R.S., 1724; succeeded to the family estate at Kersall, and spent his later years there in peace and honor. Though a disciple of Jacob Behmen and other mystics, he was a man of great acuteness and equanimity, and combined ardent piety with views then novel. His Poems, written in easy, colloquial style, for his own and his friends' amusement, were printed posthumously in 1773 and 1814, and his Literary Remains in 1857. He wrote some of the best epigrams in the language, and a Christmas-hymn which is in almost universal use in England.

CARLYLE, Joseph Dacre, b. at Carlisle, June 4, 1758; d. at Newcastle, April 12, 1804; was professor of Arabic at Cambridge, 1794, and, later, chancellor of Carlisle, and vicar of Newcastle-on-Tyne. He published Specimens of Arabic Poetry, 1796, etc. His Poems appeared in quarto, 1805, including a hymn now in nearly universal use.

CARY, the name of two sisters, Alice (b. near Cincinnati, O., April 26, 1820; d. in New-York City, Feb. 12, 1871) and Phoebe (b. Sept. 4, 1824; d. at Newport, R.I., July 31, 1871). They were joint workers in literature, and published a volume of poems in 1850. In 1852 they came to New-York City, and supported themselves by literary work. Their poems and prose-writings are much admired. Phoebe Cary's "One sweetly solemn thought," written when but seventeen years old, has passed into all hymn-books. Her Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love (1868) sold widely. See M. C. AMES: Alice and Phoebe Cary, N.Y., 1871.

CASWALL, Edward, b. July 15, 1814, at Yately in Hampshire; d. Jan. 2, 1878; was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford; ordained deacon 1838, and priest 1839; perpetual curate of Stratford-sub-Castle, near Salisbury, 1840. In 1846 he resigned this charge, and in January, 1847, exchanged the Church of England for that of Rome. His wife dying in 1849, he entered Dr. J. H. Newman's Congregation of the Oratory in Birmingham, March 29, 1850. He has published The Child's Manual, 1846; Sermons on the Seen and Unseen, 1846; Devotions for Confession, 1849; Verba Verbi, 1855; Confraternity Manual, 1861, etc. To hymnody his services have been illustrious. His Lyra Catholica (1848) is our most important volume of translations from the Latin, and has been more or less extensively drawn upon by nearly every subsequent collection. These renderings are usually simple and unpretentious, aiming chiefly at fidelity and usefulness. His talent had freer range in Poems (1858) and A May Pageant, etc. (1865): these are sometimes marked by delicacy of thought, beauty of expression, and fervency of devotional feeling. With Faber, Newman, and Bridges, Caswall leads the roll of Roman-Catholic poets of our time and tongue, all of them bred in the Church of England; and among our hymnists of the last forty years, he, if judged by translations and originals together, may probably stand next to Dr. Neale. An apparently complete edition of his Hymns and Poems, Original and Translated, appeared 1873.

CAWOOD, John, b. at Matlock, Derbyshire, March 18, 1775; d. Nov. 7, 1852; was the son of a farmer; educated at Oxford; ordained 1801; curate at Ribbesford and Dowles; in 1811 became perpetual curate of Bewdley, Worcestershire. He published The Church and Dissent, 1831, and two volumes of Sermons, 1842. Cotterill's Selection, 1819, included nine hymns of his, two or more of which have been much used.

CENNICK, John, b. at Reading, Berkshire, Dec. 12, 1718 (?); d. in London, July 4, 1755; was teacher of Wesley's school at Kingswood, but joined Whitefield 1741, and the Moravians 1745. He published an autobiography, 1745; some tracts and sermons; Sacred Hymns for the Children of God in the Days of their Pilgrimage, 1741-42, 2 vols.; Sacred Hymns for the Use of Religious Societies, 1743-45, 3 parts; and Hymns for Children, 1754. The last is not now known to exist: the others are scarce and remarkable volumes. Cennick's talents were better than his education, and his piety in advance of both. His Muse had the Wesleyan fire without the Wesleyan elegance, but with a passionate simplicity of her own. His first book of verse was corrected, and the contents of all were more or less suggested and inspired, by C. Wesley; but he had something of his own. His hymns, extensively used during the last century, have, with a few exceptions, been condemned by the colder taste of our age; but they are vivid and curious memorials of the style of religious feeling A.D. 1740-50.

CHANDLER, John, b. at Witley, Surrey, June 16, 1806; d. at Putney, July 1, 1876; has a leading place among translators of Latin hymns. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, graduating, 1827; was ordained, 1831; became vicar of Witley, 1837, and afterwards rural dean. He published Life of William of Wykeham, 1812; Howe Sacre, 1854; and sundry sermons and tracts, besides his great work (in quality, not in size, for it is a moderate 12mo), Hymns of the Primitive Church, 1837. This volume, now rare, contains a hundred and eight Latin hymns, with translations of his own. The renderings are simple and unpretentious, but of such solid merit that a large number of them have attained wide acceptance in the English Church, and not a few have come into use elsewhere. In the important service of adapting to modern use the treasures of Latin hymnody, Chandler had no immediate or notable predecessors, except J. H. Newman. Bishop Mant's Ancient Hymns appeared the same year; and the books of Isaac Williams, Caswall, Copeland, R. Campbell, Neale, Chambers, and others, later. Chandler's influence on all these must have been great; and none of them has done as good work in this field except Caswall, and perhaps Neale: so that, both directly and indirectly, his modest labors have been very fruitful. It is one of several cases in which very moderate poetic talents have produced eminent hymnic benefactions. A much smaller work, Hymns of the Church, 1811, has its contents mostly selected from the former, but contains some altered or added versions, and a few originals.

CHRISTADELPHIANS, a small sect originating in this country half a century ago. They call themselves Christadelphians because of the belief that all that are in Christ are his brethren, and designate their congregations as "ecclesias" to "distinguish them from the so-called churches of the apostasy." John Thomas, M.D., the founder, seceded from the Disciples of Christ, and established a separate denomination, because he believed, that, though the Disciples were the most "apostolic and scripturally enlightened religious organization in America," the religious teaching of the day was contrary to the teaching of the Bible. It is not known how many "ecclesias" there are in this country. Jersey City has one or two, and there is one in Philadelphia, and one in Washington. A few have been organized in England, where most of the literature of the denomination is printed.

Christadelphians reject the Trinity. They believe in one supreme God, who dwells in unapproachable light; in Jesus Christ, in whom was manifest the eternal spirit of God, and who died for the offences of sinners, and rose for the justification of believing men and women; in one baptism only,—immersion, the "burial with Christ in water into death to sin," which is essential to salvation; in immortality only in Christ; in eternal punishment of the wicked, but not in eternal torment; in hell, not as a place of torment, but as the grave; in the resurrection of the just and unjust; in the utter annihilation of the wicked, and in the non-resurrection of those who have never heard the gospel, lack in intelligence (as infants), or are sunk in ignorance or brutality; in a second coming of Christ to establish his kingdom on earth, which is to be fitted for the everlasting abode of the saints; in the proximity of this second coming; in Satan as a scriptural personification of sin; in the millennial reign of Christ on earth over the nations, during which sin and death will continue in a milder degree, and after which Christ will surrender his position of supremacy, and God will reveal himself, and become Father and Governor of a complete family; in salvation only for those who can understand the faith as taught by the Christadelphians, and become obedient to it.

COAN, Titus, D.D., missionary; b. at Killingworth, Conn., Feb. 1, 1801; d. at Hilo, Sandwich Islands, Sept. 16, 1882. He was graduated at Auburn Theological Seminary in 1833, and on Dec. 21, 1834, sailed for the Sandwich Islands, where he labored as missionary, under the care of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, until his death, with great success; his conversions up to 1880 numbering 12,113. In 1870 he returned to America for a very brief visit. He published Life in Hawaii, New York, 1882.

COLEMAN, Lyman, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Middlefield, Mass., June 14, 1796; d. at Easton Penn., March 16, 1882. He was graduated at Yale College, 1817; principal of the Latin Grammar School at Hartford, 1817-20; tutor in Yale College; student of theology, and for seven years pastor of the Belchertown (Mass.) Congregational Church. He resigned, spent two years in foreign travel, held various positions, until in 1862 he became professor of Latin in Lafayette College. He was the author of several widely circulated volumes embodying the results of much study, — Antiquities of the Christian Church, Philadelphia, 1841; Ancient Christianity Exemplified, 1852; Historical Text-book and Atlas of Biblical Geography, 1854; Prelacy and Ritualism, 1869.

COLENSO, John William, D.D., English prelate; b. Jan. 24, 1811, in the Duchy of Cornwall; d. at Durban, Natal, South Africa, June 20, 1883. He was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1836; became fellow of his college; was assistant master of Harrow School, 1838-42; resided at St. John's College, 1842-46; rector of Forncett St. Mary, Norfolk, 1846-53; and on Nov. 30, 1853, was appointed first bishop of Natal, South Africa. He made a great sensation by his Pentateuch and Book of Joshua critically Examined (London, 1862-79, 7 parts), calling in question the historical accuracy and the traditional authorship of these books. This work was condemned by small majorities in both Houses of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury (1864); and he was deposed by his metropolitan, the Bishop of Cape Town. Colenso appealed to the Privy Council; and this body declared his deposition null and void in law, on the ground that "the crown has no legal power to constitute a bishopric, or to confer coercive jurisdiction within any colony possessing an independent legislature; and that, as the letters-patent purporting to create the sees of Cape Town and Natal were issued after these colonies had acquired legislatures, the sees did not legally exist, and neither bishop possessed in law any jurisdiction whatever." As his stipend had been refused by the council of the Colonial Bishopric's Fund, he brought suit in the Court of Chancery, and was again sustained. The result of the trouble was, that, while Bishop Colenso remained the only bishop of the Church of England in Natal, there was at Cape Town a bishop of Maritzburg for the Province of South Africa. In 1874 Bishop Colenso visited England, and reported to the Archbishop of Canterbury. He was a warm friend of the Zulus.

Besides the book already mentioned, and which called forth a library of attacks and replies (some of value), Bishop Colenso published Natal Sermons, 1866; Lectures on the Pentateuch and the Moabite Stone, 1873; The New "Bible Commentary" Examined, 1874; and several mathematical text-books, a Zulu grammar, dictionary, and translation of the New Testament, and Prayer-Book.

COLLYER, William Bengo, D.D., b. at Blackheath, near London, April 14, 1782; d. in London, Jan. 9, 1854; was educated at Homerton College, and for half a century was one of the most eminent and popular dissenting ministers in the metropolis. He published Lectures on Scripture Facts, 1807; Prophecy, 1809; Miracles 1812; Parables, 1815; Doctrines, 1818; Duties, 1820; Comparisons, 1822; also a large and important Supplement to Watts (1812), containing fifty-eight hymns of his own, and a book of Services (1837), with eighty-nine more. He also contributed thirty-nine to Leitch's Original Hymns, 1839. His best and most familiar lyrics are among the fifty-eight earliest, which are generally graceful, though sometimes too ornate.

CONDOR, Josiah, b. in London, 1789; d. Dec. 27, 1855; was a Congregational layman and a voluminous author, memorable for his services to hymnology. Being a publisher in early life, he purchased the Eclectic Review in 1814, and conducted it till 1837. He edited The Patriot from 1832 till his death. His prose-works are, Protestant Nonconformity, 1818-19, 3 vols.; The Village Lecturer, 1822; The Law of the Sabbath, 1830; the Modern Traveller, 1830, 30 vols.; Italy, 1831, 3 vols.; A Dictionary of Geography, Ancient and Modern, 1834; Epistle to the Hebrews, 1834; Life of Bunyan, 1835; View of all Religions, 1838; Exposition of the Apocalypse, Literary History of the New Testament, 1845; Poet of the Sanctuary, 1851. The last is a eulogy on Dr. Watts, read before the Congregational Union at Southampton, 1850. In verse he published The Associate Minstrels (with others), 1810; The Star in the East, etc., 1824; and Choir and Oratory, 1837. His Hymns of Praise, Prayer, and Devout Meditation appeared posthumously in 1856. He edited The Congregational Hymn-Book, a Supplement to Watts, 1836, containing some sixty-two pieces of his own, and four by his wife. Of this meritorious and memorable collection ninety thousand copies were sold in seven years; and then, in a slightly revised form (1844), it remained the official book till 1859. His revised and expurgated edition of Watts (1838) was less successful, as at that date Watts's entire was ceasing to be used. Conder's own hymns always show a devout and cultivated mind, and in elegance and taste are far above the average. Some of them are widely known and used, especially "Bread of heaven, on thee I feed."

COOPER, Peter, an American manufacturer, inventor, and philanthropist; was b. Feb. 12, 1791, in New York, and d. there April 4, 1883. His grandfather and father were soldiers in the American Revolution, after which his father resumed business as a hatter. Peter was the fifth of nine children, seven of whom were boys. He attended school for part of one year only; learned and practised his father's trade; and at the age of seventeen, the family having left New York, he returned thither, and apprenticed himself for four years to a carriage-maker. Upon a salary of twenty-five dollars a year and board, he kept out of debt, and saved money. His industry and inventive ingenuity won the favor of his employer, who offered to loan him the necessary capital to establish himself in business. Not wishing to assume the burden of debt, he declined this offer, and went as a workman on day-wages to a woollen-factory at Hempstead, L.I. Here he perfected a machine for shearing the nap from cloth, for which he obtained a patent. By the war of 1812 American cloth manufactures were greatly stimulated, and this machine found for a brief period a rapid sale. It is said that the first five hundred dollars realized by the inventor were devoted to the relief of his father, then seriously embarrassed. In 1813 Mr. Cooper married Sarah Bedell, a lady of Hempstead, with whom he enjoyed more than fifty-six years of wedded happiness. Of six children, two survive, — Edward Cooper, recently mayor of New York, and Mrs. Sarah Amelia Hewitt, wife of Abram S. Hewitt, several times elected a representative in Congress from New-York City.

At the close of the war with England, Mr. Cooper turned his shop at Hempstead into a manufactory of cabinet-ware. A year later he established a grocery in New York; and after another year he sold out this business, and embarked in the manufacture of glue and isinglass, which he carried on with great success, amassing from this and other enterprises the large fortune which he administered with so much generosity and public spirit. Among his business undertakings may be mentioned the establishment of iron-works at Baltimore, New York, Trenton, and Phillipsburgh, N.J., and the laying of the Atlantic cable, which he promoted with enthusiastic faith, by large advances of money at critical periods. Of his genius as an inventor, many instances might be cited: among them, the construction, in 1824, of the first steam locomotive ever made in America; the movement of canal and river boats by means of an endless chain (now revived as the Belgian towing-system); the introduction of rolled wrought-iron beams for fire-proof buildings, etc. His wide acquaintance with trades and handicrafts, the quick interest with which he watched their progress, the fruitful suggestiveness of his mind, and an unconquerably sanguine temperament, combined to make him naturally an inventor and pioneer.

But the keynote of Mr. Cooper's character was active benevolence. He was a Unitarian Christian; and through the charities of that denomination, as well as through innumerable channels, public and private, he distributed his beneficence. It is not too much to say that sympathy sometimes overpowered his judgment and reason. Some of his later political views on the subject of finance, views not altogether consistent with those he had advocated in his vigorous manhood, were doubtless the expression of his benevolence, and his notion that the measures he urged would bring immediate relief to the debtor-class. Although the Greenback party, of which he was in 1876 the presidential nominee, was generally distrusted, and overwhelmingly defeated, no one among its opponents questioned the purity and sincerity of its candidate.

As a member of the common council of New York in early days, a trustee of its first public-school society, and subsequently a school commissioner under the present system, he was active in all measures of public and educational improvement. But the great work of his life, and that for which he will be longest remembered with praise and thanks, is the Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art, established and endowed by him in the city of New York at a cost of more than a million of dollars. This institution is in many respects unique. It is devoted to the free instruction of working men and women, and comprises day schools of drawing, painting, wood-engraving, modelling, and telegraphy for women; evening classes for both sexes in all branches of art and art-decoration, mathematics, the natural sciences, mechanics, engineering, etc.; a free library and reading-room; and a free course of popular scientific lectures. It may be said in round numbers, that nearly 4,000 students are enrolled annually in the various classes, about 1,500 persons frequent the reading-room daily, and an audience of 2,000 attends the weekly lectures. The expenses of the institution amount to over $50,000 per year, the greater part of which is obtained from the rent of stores and offices in the building. Any deficit has been met by Mr. Cooper, who also left by his will an additional endowment of $100,000. To this, his son and daughter have notified the trustees that they will add another $100,000. This will make the total endowment, apart from building and apparatus, $100,000.

The funeral of Mr. Cooper was an imposing spectacle, testifying the universal love and esteem in which he was held. A popular subscription is in progress for a monument in his honor. This purpose all must applaud. Yet, after all, his best monument is the "Cooper Union." And what epitaph can be better than that inscribed upon the scroll, which, thirty years ago, he deposited within its corner-stone? —

"The great object that I desire to accomplish by the erection of this institution is to open the avenues of scientific knowledge to the youth of our city and country, and so unfold the volume of nature that the young may see the beauties of creation, enjoy its blessings, and learn to love the Author from whom cometh every good and perfect gift."

R. W. RAYMOND.

COTTERILL, Thomas, b. at Cannock, Staffordshire, Dec. 4, 1779; d. at Sheffield, Dec. 29, 1823; was educated at St. John's, Cambridge; ordained, 1806; ministered two years at Tutbury, and nine at Lane End, in the Staffordshire potteries; perpetual curate of St. Paul's, Sheffield, from 1817. He published a book of family prayers, and a memorable Selection of Psalms and Hymns, of which the chief edition appeared at Sheffield, 1819. In this he was assisted by James Montgomery, who was the printer. They both contributed numerous originals, and altered or rewrote other people's verses very freely. The legitimacy of hymn-singing was not then well established in the English Church; and a suit was brought against the compiler, which ended in the book being withdrawn, to be succeeded by an abridged and altered edition. Though its life was so short, its influence was great. Cotterill's hymns, while not highly poetical, were judicious, neat, and sometimes impressive. They met a want then widely if not deeply felt, and for a generation were largely copied into most Anglican hymnals; some of the chief favorites being such as were his only in part, for he was the most successful practitioner of the doubtful art of "tinkering," or amending. Several of his alterations and originals keep a place still.

COTTON, Nathaniel, M.D., b. 1707; d. at St. Albans, Aug. 2, 1788; studied medicine at Leyden, and kept a lunatic-asylum at St. Albans. He was praised and loved by Cowper, who was for some time (1763-64) his patient. He published two medical books in 1730 and 1749, and Visions in Verse, 1751. His Various Pieces in Verse and Prose appeared, 1791, in 2 vols., containing a few very graceful renderings of psalms.

COWLEY, Abraham, M.D., b. in London, 1618; d. at Chertsey, in Surrey, July 28, 1667; entered Trinity College, Cambridge, 1636, and was ejected as a royalist, 1643. He published various poems, essays, and Libher Plantarum, 1662-78. Once counted the first poet of his time, he is now mildly valued for his graver strains, which show a sober and studious mind, with moderate inclinations toward religion.

CROLY, George, LL.D., b. in Dublin, August, 1780; d. in London, Nov. 24, 1860; was from 1835 rector of St. Stephen's, Wallbrook, London. He published many volumes of prose, mostly on sacred themes, and of verse, chiefly secular, besides a slight collection of Psalms and Hymns (1854), largely made up of unimportant originals. Mrs. Hall thought him "an almost universal poet, grand and gorgeous, but too cold and stately."

CROSSMAN, Samuel, b. at Bradfield, Suffolk, 1624; d. at Bristol, Feb. 4, 1683; was prebendary of Bristol, and published sundry sermons, etc., and The Young Man's Meditation, 1664, reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1863. This contains nine hymns, one or two of which are meritorious and well known.

CROSSWELL, William, D.D., b. at Hudson, N.Y., Nov. 7, 1804; d. in Boston, Nov. 9, 1851; graduated at Yale, 1822; studied divinity at New York and Hartford; became rector of Christ Church, Boston (1829), of St. Peter's, Auburn (1840), and of the Advent, Boston (1844). His memoir was published by his father. His Poems, edited by Bishop Cox, appeared 1861. They contain some meritorious hymns, one of which is widely used.

DARBY, John Nelson, b. in London, Nov. 18, 1801; d. in Bournemouth, April 29, 1882. He was graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, 1819; took orders, and served a curacy in Wicklow, until, in 1827, doubts as to church establishments led him to leave the Church altogether, and meet with a little company of like-minded persons gathered in Dublin. In 1830 he visited Plymouth, and carried on the work there. An assembly of Brethren was shortly formed in the town that has lent its name to this movement. James L. Harris, perpetual curate of Plymstock, resigned his living to unite with them, and in 1834 started the Christian Witness, their first periodical. Darby became an assiduous writer. In the first volume of the Witness appeared his Parochial Arrangement destructive of Order in the Church. In 1836 he wrote for the same serial Apostasy of the Successive Dispensations, afterwards published in French as Apostasie de l'économie actuelle, in which he "laid the axe to the tree of the Christian Church" (Herzog, cf. "Plymouth Brethren").

Between 1838 and 1840 Darby worked in Switzerland. In the autumn of 1839 an influential member of the congregation at Lausanne invited Darby thither to oppose Methodism. In March, 1840, he came, and obtained a hearing by discourses, and a tract, De la doctrine des Wesleyens à l'égard de la perfection, etc. In the spring of 1841 the greater part of the Methodists joined the other dissenters of Lausanne. Some lectures by Darby on prophecy made great impression, bringing together nationalists and dissenters. The key to the prophecies had been found. Darby at the same time continued his preaching. He soon gathered young men round him at Lausanne, with whom he studied the Scriptures. The fruit of these conferences was his Études sur la Parole, a work which has appeared in English as Synopsis of the Books of the Bible. His associates were not long in beginning missionary enterprise among, not the indifferent or worldly, but awakened souls. Many congregations were formed in Cantons Vaud, Geneva, and Berne. Certain of his followers started a periodical, Le témoignage des disciples de la Parole.

When, by Jesuit intrigues, a revolution broke out in Canton Vaud (February, 1845), the Darbyites in some parts of Switzerland suffered persecution. Darby's own life was in jeopardy. He thenceforth took a more active lead among the English Brethren, and in particular, from 1845 to 1848, in respect to the disruption at Plymouth (cf. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN); but his heart seems ever to have turned towards Switzerland and France.

The appearance of Newman's Phases of Faith evoked a reply from Darby, The Irrationalism of Infidelity (1853). Nor did the advance made by Anglo-Catholics, inspired of old by another Newman, escape his notice. See his Remarks on Puseyism (1854), and review of The Church and the World, his Christianity and Christendom (1874), etc.

It was not long before Darby had formed links with several congregations in Germany. In 1853 he paid a first visit to Elberfeld. Already were there some dozen assemblies of Brethren, holding the same views of the church as those already spoken of in Great Britain and Switzerland, but without formal connection. Darby was wont to say, "The Lord has not given me Germany." Nothing was required, however, but his appearance on the scene to turn these "Baptisten" into "Darbisten." In 1854 he was in Elberfeld a second time, translating on their behalf the New Testament into German. Next he exercised his ministry far and wide.

In 1858 Darby took up independently a subject which he had before touched only in controversy with Newton (cf. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN), — the sufferings of Christ. Though harassed by opposition, he retained the confidence of the bulk of his supporters, manifest when he offered to withdraw from his ministry. In 1859 appeared his Righteousness of God, which subject also plunged him into controversy. In the latter year he executed a French translation of the New Testament (Vevay). After the completion of this work, he made a first visit to Canada, where had been assemblies of Brethren for many years. Shortly after his return to England (1863) appeared his dialogues on the Essays and Reviews. In 1861-65 he was again in Canada: in 1866 he issued his analysis of Dr. Newman's Apologia pro vita sua, and in the same year paid a third visit to Canada, terminated in 1868, and followed by a sojourn in Germany, when he took part in a translation of the Old Testament into German. This done, in 1870 he made a fourth journey to Canada, taking also the States, and, as ever before, actively disseminated his views. Between 1870 and 1880 he was occupied at intervals in writing, amongst much else, his Familiar Conversations on Romanism, into which he infused much fire and energy of thought, and about 1871 gave his fellow-laborers in Italy the encouragement of his presence for a short time. His Meditations on the Acts of the Apostles (C. W., xxv.) was composed in Italian. In 1872-73 came a vigorous campaign in the United States. A Boston journal, the Traveller, records at that time his daily meetings at 3 Tremont Row, and says, "Now seventy-two years of age, he is hale and dignified, yet genial and joyful in his life of unclouded faith." At a subsequent period he visited the West Indies. He was again in the States in 1874, and visited, in 1875, the Brethren in New Zealand. Between 1875 and 1880 he was occupied very much with his translation into French of the Old Testament, in connection with which he sojourned long at Pau, after having made several other occasional visits to France.

In 1881 he wrote Letters on the Revised New Testament, impeaching the judgment of the revisers, principally in respect of the Greek aorist. He had already discussed this in the Preface to his English Translation of the New Testament (2d ed., 1872).

He had, besides, found time to make known his judgment on several points of scholarship. His view of the Greek article approximates to that expressed by Donaldson. In the Bible Witness and Review (1877-81) appeared several articles by him in apologetics; e.g., a review of W. Robertson Smith's well-known article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, another of Mill's Logic, and a paper on Miracles, with reference to Hume. In metaphysics, as in theology, he struck out his own path. Well acquainted with Kant's system, he valued the Königsberg philosophy as little as Mill's. We possess papers of his on the Relative and Absolute, Self-consciousness, and the Infinite with reference to the Bampton Lectures of Mansel.

Though his works are largely doctrinal and controversial, his delight was to write any thing devotional and practical. How he lived in the Psalms appears from his Practical Reflections thereon. Never did any Englishman live more in the Bible than he, unless it were John Bunyan. He was, besides, a hymn-writer. The hymnal in general use among the Brethren was last edited by him. His writings have been collected and edited by W. Kelly. EDWARD E. WHITEFIELD

(Member of the Brethren at Oxford, Eng.).

DAVIES, Sir John, b. in Wiltshire, 1570; d. Dec. 7, 1626, soon after his appointment as lord chief justice; was educated at Queen's College, Oxford; solicitor-general of Ireland, 1603; knighted, 1607; became attorney-general, judge of assize, and member of Parliament. His Nosce Teipsum, our ablest and most famous metaphysical poem, was dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, 1592, but not printed till 1599. Later editions appeared 1602, 1711, and 1773. The best parts of it have been frequently copied, and are familiar to all readers.

DEWEY, Orville, D.D., Unitarian; b. in Sheffield, Mass., March 28, 1794; d. there March 21, 1882. He was graduated at Williams College, 1814, and at Andover, 1819; was, soon after graduation, Dr. Channing's assistant; pastor of the Unitarian Church at New Bedford, Mass., 1823-33; of the Second Church of New-York City, 1835-48; of the New South Church, Boston, 1858-62. He was a frequent contributor to the North-American Review. His works were collected in 3 vols. in 1847 (N.Y.), and were in the twentieth edition in 1876. Since 1847 he issued his Lowell Lectures on the Problem of Human Destiny, N.Y., and Sermons on the Great Commandments, 1876. A new edition of his Works in one volume appeared in Boston, 1883. See his Autobiography and Letters, edited by his daughter, Boston, 1883.

DOBELL, John, b. 1757; d. at Poole, Dorset, May, 1840; was an exciseman of limited education, but wrote or edited several books, among them a very important and influential New Selection, 1806, including some rude hymns of his own, and many others not previously published, with the authors' names.

DODGE, Hon. William Earl, an eminent merchant and philanthropist; son of David Low and Sarah Cleveland Dodge; b. Sept. 4, 1805, in Hartford, Conn.; d. in New York, Feb. 9, 1883. Sprung from Puritan stock, he illustrated in a marked degree the sturdiness, enterprise, and piety of his ancestry. With a lithe figure, elastic step, keen black eye, a countenance beaming with intelligence and kindness, a mind discriminating and fertile in resources; with ready tact, pleasing address, sound judgment, and unceasing energy; forgetful of self; with broad views, yet adhering firmly to religious convictions; a wise and sympathetic adviser, a forcible speaker, and apt presiding officer,—he was a natural and acknowledged leader among men. He entered a store at thirteen; and with the exception of a short interval spent at his father's cotton-mills near Norwich, Conn., his entire life was passed in New York. He was identified with its mercantile, social, and religious interests, and took part in most of the great political and national movements of the day.

At first a dry-goods merchant, he soon joined his father-in-law, Anson G. Phelps, in the meta trade, and established the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., now one of the oldest houses in America. He was among the originators of the Erie, the New-Jersey Central, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, the Houston and Texas Central and other railroads. He was largely interested in manufactures, and had extensive lumber operations in different parts of the United States and Canada. He was a prominent member of the Chamber of Commerce, and for several years its presiding officer. He acted as director in various corporations and companies, and was a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

Mr. Dodge's chief distinction, however, was the zeal and liberality he displayed in every form of Christian and benevolent work, not merely in his own city, but in all sections of the country, and throughout the world. Trained by godly parents, and converted during the revival days of Nettleton, it was his delight to engage in direct personal labors for the cause of Christ. He especially loved to take part in general religious awakenings, where all sects and classes united. In his early days he was an efficient promoter of the labors of Finney and other evangelists, and, more recently, of Moody and Sankey. He long held prominent positions in the church. A Presbyterian elder, a sabbath-school superintendent, a manager of the American Bible Society, a vice-president of the Tract Society, a warm supporter of young men's Christian associations, and city missions, he was as conspicuous for his counsels as for his gifts. He was president of the American Branch of the Evangelical Alliance, and frequently represented it at home and abroad. He was chiefly instrumental in founding the National Temperance Society, and was its first president. He stood in a similar relation to the Christian Home for Intemperate Men, and his last work was to aid in creating a like institution for women. During the civil war his patriotic zeal was manifested in a hearty support of the government by both voice and purse, and also in the work of the Christian and the Sanitary Commissions. He felt peculiar sympathy for the freedmen, and gave largely to institutions and churches for their benefit. He believed in sound Christian education, and aided colleges and schools in every part of the land. He was a trustee of the Union Theological Seminary in New-York City, and a liberal donor to its work. He also gave freely to theological seminaries in other places. His wide railroad and business relations and frequent journeys made him familiar with the growing wants of the West and South. Impressed with the urgent need, in those sections, of gospel institutions and influences, he constantly maintained at his own expense, in different seminaries and colleges, a number of carefully selected young men, who could make special and somewhat shorter preparation for the ministry. He left a fund to continue this work. In foreign missions he took profound interest. He was vice-president of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and also a member of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. His regular annual subscriptions to this cause for many years amounted to ten thousand dollars, and his special contributions were frequent. Scarcely a field or station but knew his name, and enjoyed his aid. He was the principal founder of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut, and himself laid the corner-stone.

But in his sympathies and gifts he never confined himself to his own denomination or immediate surroundings. Any cause which sought to honor his Master, and benefit his fellow-men, was sure to gain his ear, and, if wisely conducted, to share his bounty, whatever ecclesiastical body it represented, or wherever it was located. His private charities, and his individual exertions to help the needy or degraded, were, perhaps, more generous and characteristic than any acts known to the public; and it was in the family circle, or in dispensing the hospitalities of his own home, that his engaging personal qualities shone most brightly, although in every company, and with all associates, he seemed instinctively to inspire warm and lasting affection. His business insight, industry, and integrity gave him ample means, and also the unfailing confidence of his fellow-merchants. His conscientious and scriptural views of stewardship led him to acquire wealth that he might use it for philanthropic ends, and the same spirit is manifest in the liberal bequests his will contained for the leading religious and charitable organizations. In his wife he always found the fullest sympathy and most prudent counsel for all his benevolent undertakings. She and their seven sons survive him.

DOREMUS (Sarah Platt Haines), Mrs. Thomas C., b. in New-York City, Aug. 3, 1802; d. there Jan. 29, 1877. Her life was consecrated to Christ and to the relief of sorrow in every form. For thirty-two years she was a manager of the Woman's Prison Association, and from 1863 its presiding officer. For thirty-six years she was a manager of the City and Tract Mission Society, and twenty-eight years of the City Bible Society. In 1850 she was a founder of the House and School of Industry, and since 1867 its president. She was also a founder, and always second directress, of the Nursery and Child's Hospital. In 1855, by her hearty co-operation, she enabled Dr. J. Marion Sims (d. Nov. 13, 1883) to establish the Woman's Hospital in New-York City, — the first institution of the kind to be founded anywhere. In 1866 she helped to organize the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women, presided at its first meeting, and continued a manager. During the civil war she played a prominent part in distributing supplies to all the hospitals in and around the city. All her life she was a Sunday-school teacher, and greatly interested in child-life. Her own family was large, and she never forgot her home duties amid the distractions of her many public enterprises.

But her greatest work was for foreign missions. She was called the "Mother of Missionaries." No missionary entered or left the port of New York without substantial evidence of her interest. At ten years of age she attended, with her mother, meetings held by Mrs. Isabella Graham and other women to pray for the conversion of the world; and from that time on she labored in the great cause. In 1828 she organized a band for the relief of the Greek Christians persecuted by the Turks, in 1835 a society in New York in aid of Madame Feller's Baptist Mission at Grand Ligne, Canada. Her memorial is the Woman's Union Missionary Society, which she organized in New York, November, 1860, and which has led to similar organizations all over the country. It is unconnected with any church board, is supported by voluntary contributions, and devoted to work among women in heathen lands.

Mrs. Doremus was a member of the South Reformed (Dutch) Church; but in her love for the Master she knew no denominational lines. Among all the women who have advanced the world she has a foremost place.

See In Memoriam of Mrs. Doremus, Edinburgh, 1877; The Missionary Link, vol. viii. No. 2, March, 1877.

DRUMMOND, William, of Hawthornden, b. Dec. 13, 1585; d. Dec. 4, 1649; "the first Scottish poet who wrote well in English;" was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and studied civil law in France, whence he returned in 1609 to occupy his beautiful ancestral seat. There Ben Jonson visited him in 1619. He wrote a History of Scotland and other prose-works, besides many poems, which have been published together, 1711, 1791, and, with life by Peter Cunningham, 1833. His Flowers of Zion appeared 1623. His Divine Poems include some of our earliest translations of Latin hymns.

DUNN, Professor Robinson Porter, b. 1825; d. Aug. 28, 1867; was a professor in Brown University, and an accomplished scholar. He translated from the Latin, German, and French a few hymns which are much used.

EDMESTON, James, b. at Wapping, London, Sept. 10, 1791; d. at Ilomerton, Middlesex, Jan. 7, 1867; was an architect, but better known as a voluminous writer of sacred verse. Besides one or two prose-works he published The Search, and other Poems, 1817; Sacred Lyrics, 1820-22, 3 vols.; The Cottage Minstrel, 1821; a hundred hymns for Sunday schools, 1821; another hundred for particular occasions, and fifty for missionary prayer-meetings, 1822; Patmos, etc., 1821; The Woman of Shunem, etc., 1829; Sonnets: Hymns for the Chamber of Sickness, 1814; Close Hymns and Poems, 1814; Infant Breathings, 1816; Sacred Poetry, 1817. In all he produced near two thousand of these effusions, some of which are spirited and elegant, while many of them have been useful, and one or two are still largely used.

ELLIOTT, Charlotte, b. 1789; d. at Brighton, Sept. 22, 1871; was a daughter of Charles Elliott, and sister of two somewhat eminent clergymen, Henry V. and Edward B.; but her "Just as I am" has been far more widely useful than her brother Edward's Horae Apocalypticæ. She wrote Hours of Sorrow, 1836; Morning and Evening Hymns for a Week, 1812; Poems by C. E., 1863; and over a hundred lyrics in The Invalid's Hymn-Book, 1831-51, the last edition of which she edited, as also The Christian Remembrancer, an annual. Several of her hymns have been and are very popular. The earliest of them appeared in the Psalms and Hymns of her brother, Henry Venn, whose wife, Julia Anne Elliott (d. 1811), also contributed to it several of great merit.

ELLIOTT, David, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sherman Valley, Penn., Feb. 6, 1787, of pious ancestry, and carefully educated in religion; d. at Allegheny, Penn., March 18, 1871; diligent at academics; successful teacher at Washington, Penn., in 1805-06; valedictorian at Dickinson College in 1808; licensed, 1811; pastor from 1812 to 1829 at Mercersburg, Penn., from 1829 to 1836 at Washington, Penn. Both pastorates were filled with "well-studied, clear, convincing, and persuasive" sermons, successful conflicts with error, faithfulness in discipline, organization of Christian activity in various directions, revival-seasons, initiation of prayer-meetings and Sunday schools, and accompanied by a steadily increasing influence in the denomination.

Dr. Elliott's educational life began with the re-organization of Washington College in 1830. Owing to his enterprise, wisdom, and resolution, the new movement rapidly attained success. He was "acting president" two years, president of the Board of Trustees thirty-three years. His transfer to Allegheny in 1836 brought him to the theological seminary at one critical period, and he continued through many others. He made the burdens of the seminary his own, laid all his gifts and experience upon its altar, pleaded its cause against all opponents, bound it upon the heart of the church, increased the number of its students, often performed the extra duties of its unoccupied chairs, accepted whatever place best suited its needs, proved equal to every exigency in teaching and administration, sustained its work alone in 1840, begged it out of difficulties in 1850, watched with delight its later rapid growth, saw nearly a thousand men go from its doors to preach the gospel, and when made emeritus in 1870, lived to pray for it and with its every student, and still lives as its model of piety and devotedness.

For ecclesiastical usefulness Dr. Elliott was pre-eminently fitted by clear thinking, directness in expression, perfect impartiality, and a judicial habit of mind. All these traits were often exhibited, but especially in the disruption assembly of 1837, of which his moderatorship was a marvel of fairness as tested by the feelings of the time, and his decisions unimpeachable in their accuracy as tested by subsequent judicial deliberations. Present and assenting at the re-union of the Presbyterian Church in 1869, he died, leaving to the church and the world the legacy of a great work well done, and of a character wonderfully symmetrical.

SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

ENFIELD, William, LL.D., b. at Sudbury in Suffolk, March 29, 1741; d. at Norwich, Nov. 3, 1797; was an eminent Unitarian minister and author. After studying at Daventry, he ministered successively at Liverpool, Warrington, and Norwich. His Speaker, 1774, and History of Philosophy, 1791, passed through several editions, and are well known. He also wrote An Essay towards the History of Liverpool, 1774; Observations on Literary Property, 1774; Exercises on Elocution, 1781; Institutes of Natural Philosophy, 1783; and some volumes of sermons; and compiled the Preacher's Directory, 1771, and a Selection of Hymns, 1772 (2d ed., 1797), containing a few of his own.

EPHRA'IM. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

ERSKINE, Ralph, b. at Monikies, Northumberland, March 18, 1685; d. Oct. 6, 1752; was educated at the university of Edinburgh; became minister at Dunfermline 1711, and joined the seceders 1731. His Gospel Sonnets, 1732, which are extraordinary reading now, were long very popular, and went through many editions. They were followed by A Paraphrase on the Song of Solomon, 1738, and Scripture Songs. His entire Poetical Works were printed in one volume, 8vo Aberdeen, so lately as 1858.

EUCCHARIST (Greek ευχαριστία, "a giving of thanks"), the ancient church-name for the sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a feast of thanks giving, a thank-offering of the whole church to all the favors of God in creation and redemption. The term denoted in the first place the prayer of thanksgiving, which was part of the communion-service and the service itself. The sacrament is not so called in the New Testament; but the designation quite naturally followed from the use of εὐχαριστίας ("he had given thanks") in Matt. xxvi. 27, Mark xiv. 23, Luke xxii. 19, 1 Cor. xi. 24, and is used by Justin Martyr (1 Apol. i. 65, 66), Irenæus (Adv. hæres. iv. 41), Clement of Alexandria (Paedag. ii. 2), and others. See LORD'S SUPPER.

FAWCETT, John, D.D., b. at Lidget Green, near Bradford, Yorkshire, Jan. 6, 1739; d. at Brearley Hall near Wainsgate, July 25, 1817; was an eminent hymn-writer of the school of Watts. Converted under Whitefield in 1755, he became in 1764 Baptist minister at Wainsgate, and there remained through life, rejecting all allurements to larger fields. His most popular hymn, "Blest be the tie that binds," is said to have celebrated his refusal, under touching circumstances, of a London charge in 1772. He also declined the presidency of the Baptist academy at Bristol in 1793, and eked out his scanty income by taking pupils at home, and by his pen. He published The Devotional Family Bible, 1811, 2 vols., and sundry smaller works in prose, besides Poetic Essays, 1767, and a hundred and sixty-six Hymns, 1782, 2d ed., 1817. Many of these had merit enough to be largely used in former days, and some of them still retain a place in our collections. His Life and Letters were published by J. Parker, London, 1818.

FITCH, Eleazar Thompson, D.D., b. at New Haven, Jan. 1, 1791; d. there Jan. 31, 1871; graduated at Yale, 1810; studied theology at Andover; and was professor of divinity, and college pastor, at Yale, 1817-63. He published some sermons, etc., and was one of the compilers of the Connecticut Congregational Psalms and Hymns, for which he wrote a few pieces of merit.

FOLLEN, Eliza Lee (Cabot), b. in Boston, Aug. 15, 1757; d. at Brookline, Mass., Jan. 26, 1860; was a voluminous writer of prose and verse for children and adults. In 1828 she married Professor Charles Follen, who was exiled from Germany, fled to America, 1823, and was lost on the "Lexington," 1840. Her Poems appeared 1839. Some of her hymns have been popular and are still sometimes used.

FRIENDS, The Society of, commonly called QUAKERS. Liberal Branch.—Until early in this century, American Friends were generally united on the original ground of the society, viz., "conversion to God, regeneration, and holiness, not schemes of doctrines, and verbal creeds, or new forms of worship" (Penn's Rise and Progress), and did not "require a formal subscription to any articles, either as a condition of membership, or to qualify for the service of the church" (London Summary, 1790).

For more than forty years, Elias Hicks of Long Island had been an eminent minister, and apparently acceptable, when in 1819 he was publicly opposed in Philadelphia. A separation in that Yearly Meeting took place in 1827; one party styling the other "Hicksites" and "Separatists," terms which have ever been repudiated. These Friends constituted the much larger portion of the membership in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore Yearly Meetings.

The utterances of Elias Hicks will bear comparison with those of ancient Friends; and Job Scott of Rhode Island, who died in 1793, acknowledged to be an acceptable minister and writer, was his contemporary and of a kindred spirit. Facts prove that other causes were potent in producing the difficulties.

The re-organized Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1830 wrote to London Yearly Meeting: "We are not sensible of any dereliction on our part from the principles laid down by our blessed Lord. The history of the birth, life, acts, death, and resurrection of the holy Jesus, as in the volume of the book it is written of him, we reverently believe. We are not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because it is the power of God unto salvation to all them that believe; neither do we hesitate to acknowledge the divinity of its author, because we know from living experience that he is the power of God and the wisdom of God;" and, "under the present glorious dispensation, he is the one holy principle of divine life and light." "Neither are we sensible of any departure from the faith or principles of our primitive Friends. We are not ignorant, that, on some points of a speculative nature, they had different views, and expressed themselves diversely. In the fundamental principle of the Christian faith, 'the light of Christ within, as God's gift for man's salvation,' . . . they were all united, and in that which united them we are united with them" (Printed Epistles).

The Scriptures, without this divine illumination, "will not give a knowledge of Christ" (Fox's Great Mystery).

"Christ is the substance of all figures, and his flesh is a figure; for every one passeth through the same way as he did who comes to know Christ in the flesh" (George Fox's Great Mystery).

"The true grounds of salvation by Christ . . . in all ages has been a real birth of God in the soul, a substantial union of the human and divine nature,—the Son of God and the Son of man, which is the true Emanuel state" (Job Scott).

The "second covenant is dedicated with the blood, the LIFE of Christ Jesus, which is the alone atonement unto God, by which all his people are washed, sanctified, cleansed, and redeemed to God. . . . The true witnesses of this" are "they only that have drunk of the blood of Christ, and eaten of his flesh, which he gives for the life of the world" (Fox's Doctrinals).

Friends do not believe in imputative righteousness, nor that "Christ died as a substitute for the whole human race in order to satisfy the offended justice of God, and render him propitious to guilty man" (Janney's Conversations).

They do not accept the commonly received doctrine of the Trinity, and hold that children are only sinners by actual transgression of the divine law.

(For other views held by all branches of Friends, see under FRIENDS.)

They have seven Yearly Meetings, laboring jointly on behalf of the Indians; and recently four of these agreed to co-operate in a Union for Philanthropic Labor.

First-day schools are maintained in very many localities, and an official sanction to some extent has been extended. Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, and Friends College, Long Island, are well patronized; and flourishing schools are supported in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places.

He published Sermons, 1852; Metrical Pieces, Translated and Original, 1855; Part Second of the same, 1870. The latter includes many versions from the German. Several of his hymns have been largely used by Unitarians.

GENERAL BAPTISTS. See p. 2202.

GIBBONS, Thomas, D.D., b. at Reak, near Newmarket, May 31, 1720; d. in London, Feb. 22, 1785; an eminent independent minister and hymn-writer; was educated at Deptford, and pastor at Haberdashers' Hall, London, from 1743 to his death. He was a friend of Dr. Watts and Lady Huntingdon. He published in prose Sermons, 1762; Rhetoric, 1767; Memoirs of Eminent Pious Women, 1777, 2 vols.; Memoir of Dr. Watts, 1780, etc.; and, in verse, Jaculinia, 1750; The Christian Minister, etc., 1772; and two volumes of Hymns, 1769 (including some by President S. Davies and others) and 1781. A few of these have considerable merit, and are still used. He also translated the Latin Epitaphs in the Nonconformists' Memorial (1775) and the Latin poems in Watts's Horti Lyrica. Three volumes of his Sermons appeared posthumously in 1787.

GILMAN, Samuel, D.D., b. at Gloucester, Mass., Feb. 16, 1791; d. at Kingston, Mass., Feb. 9, 1858; was an eminent Unitarian clergyman. Graduating at Harvard, 1811, he was pastor at Charleston, S.C., from 1819 till his death. Besides many contributions to the reviews, he published Memoirs of a New-England Choir, 1829; Pleasures and Pains of a Student's Life, 1852; and Contributions to Literature, 1856. His few hymns appeared in collections of 1820 and 1823.

CISBORNE, Thomas, b. at Derby, 1758; d. at Yoxhall Lodge, near Barton, 1816; was educated at Harrow, and St. John's College, Cambridge; perpetual curate of Barton-under-Needwood, Staffordshire, 1783; prebendary of Durham, 1826.

He published Principles of Moral Philosophy, 1789; Duties of Man, 1795; Duties of the Female Sex, 1797; Familiar Survey of the Christian Religion and History, 1797; On Christian Morality, 1810; and several volumes of sermons, poems, etc. His Walks in a Forest (1794) was much esteemed, and one of his hymns is still valued by those who use it.

GOODE, William, b. at Buckingham, April 2, 1762; d. April 15, 1816; was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; curate of Abbots Langley, Herts, 1781; curate to Romaine at St. Ann, Blackfriars, London, 1786; rector of the same, 1795, besides filling several lectureships; was one of the founders of the Church Missionary Society. His New Version of the Book of Psalms (1811, 2 vols.) has been a good deal valued and extracted from. A volume of his sermons appeared, 1812; and his Essays on All the Scriptural Names and Titles of Christ, etc., with a memoir, was published in six volumes by his son in 1822. The Divine Rule of Faith and Practice (1812), and sundry other works against the Tractarians, were written by a later London rector of the same name.

GRAHAM, James, b. at Glasgow, 1765; d. 1811; was educated at the university of Glasgow; was for a time a lawyer; took orders, and served as curate at Shipton, Gloucestershire, at St. Margaret's, Durham, and at Sedgfield, near Durham. He published sundry poems, as The Sabbath (1804), Birds of Scotland, etc. (1806), which were once much valued.

GRANT, Sir Robert, b. 1785; d. at Dapoorie, in Western India, July 9, 1838; graduated at Cambridge, 1806; was admitted to the bar, 1807; member of Parliament for Inverness, 1826; privy-councillor, 1831; governor of Bombay, 1834. He wrote one or two books on India, and twelve Sacred Poems, issued by his brother, Lord Glenelg, in 1839. All of these are meritorious, most of them are more or less used as hymns, and two are of the first rank. "When gathering clouds around I view" appeared in the Christian Observer, February, 1806, and "Saviour, when in dust to thee," November, 1815.

GRIGG, Joseph, d. at Walthamstow, near London, Oct. 29, 1768; was a Presbyterian assistant minister in Silver Street, London, 1743-47, and after that seems to have lived at St. Albans and Stourbridge. He issued a few tracts in prose and verse. His hymns and poems were collected by D. Sedgwick, 1861: two of them have long been very popular. "Jesus, and shall it ever be," was written at the age of ten.

GURNEY, John Hampden, b. in London, Aug. 15, 1802; d. there March 8, 1862; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; curate at Lutterworth, 1827-44; district rector of St. Mary's, Marylebone, 1817. He published sundry historical sketches, lectures, etc., and two hymn-books, 1838 and 1851. These contain several good and useful originals.

HABINGTON, William, b. at Heudlip, Worcestershire, Nov. 5, 1605; d. there Nov. 30, 1651; wrote several books in prose and verse, chief of which is Castara, 1634, reprinted by C. A. Elton, 1812. His Muse was sober and devout.

HAMMOND, William, b. at Battle, Sussex, Jan. 6, 1719; d. in London, Aug. 19, 1783; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, but joined the Calvinistic Methodists, and afterwards, with his friend Cennick, the Moravians. He published Medulla Ecclesie (1744), and Psalms, Hymns, and Spiritual Songs (1745). The latter show the Wesleyan influence strongly, and form a volume of considerable size and importance. Many of them were in use during the last century, and one or two of them are still somewhat popular.

HANNA, William, D.D., LL.D., author of the Life of Dr. Chalmers, etc.; b. at Belfast in 1808, and d. in London, May 21, 1882. Having studied in Glasgow, he became a licentiate of the Church of Scotland, and was settled at East Kilbride, and subsequently removed to Korling, both in Lanarkshire. He married the eldest daughter of Dr. Chalmers. At the disruption, in 1843, he joined the Free Church. Subsequently he was called to Edinburgh as colleague to the Rev. Dr. Guthrie. He was a very graceful and impressive preacher, but his fame rests chiefly on his books. Besides the Life and Letters of Dr. Chalmers (Edinburgh, 1849-52, 5 vols.), he published Lectures on Wilkie and the Huguenots; The Life of Christ, Edinburgh, 1868-69, 6 vols. He was editor of the Letters of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen, London, 1877, 2 vols. Dr. Hanna retired from the duties of the ministry several years before his death.

W. G. BLAIRIE.

HART, Joseph, b. in London about 1712; d. there May 24, 1768; "received a classical education," and for some years was a teacher of languages, translating Herodian's History of his Own Times (1719), and doing other work which he afterwards considered immoral and profane; e.g., a pamphlet on The Unreasonableness of Religion (1741). He began preaching about 1759, and soon settled at the independent chapel in Jewin Street, where his ministry was most vigorous and effective. He was an advanced Calvinist, but not an Antinomian. Personally he was an original and striking, if not an attractive, character, with a plain and narrow mind, a temper sincere, vehement, and entirely devoted, and an utterance blunt and unpolished to the last degree. His Hymns, with the Author's Experience, appeared 1759, with additions in 1762 and 1765. Like nearly all the lyrics of last century dissent, they are without refinement, or any evidence of culture, but not, like them, commonplace. Hart established a new and strong type of his own. His rudeness often runs into quaint boorishness, but has occasional gleams, not only of good sense and good feeling, but of something like poetry. Such as they are, these hymns have been immensely influential. With the extreme Calvinistic sects they have always been prime favorites, and some of them are still largely used by most English-speaking Christians. But the natural effect on a cultivated man is expressed in the familiar anecdote of Dr. Johnson's giving a crown at church to "a poor girl in a bedgown, though I saw Hart's Hymns in her hand."

HASTINGS, Thomas, Doctor of Music; b. in Washington, Conn., Oct. 15, 1784; d. in New-York City, May 15, 1872. In 1796 he removed to Clinton, Oneida County, N.Y. In early youth he began his musical studies, and prosecuted them without a teacher, mastering every treatise that came within his reach. He began his career as a teacher in singing-schools in 1806, and as an editor in 1816. In connection with Professor Norton of Hamilton College he published two pamphlets (1816), afterwards enlarged, and united with The Springfield Collection, in a volume entitled Musica Sacra. From 1823 to 1832 Mr. Hastings, by special request, was the editor of The Western Recorder, a religious paper published at Utica. In 1832, at the call of twelve churches, he removed to the city of New York. Not only had he studied his favorite art, but with great diligence he had applied himself to the study of English literature, philosophy, and theology, and had acquired facility in public address and in writing. Before leaving Utica he had begun to write hymns, impelled by the lack of variety in those then current, and by the need of adapting suitable words to the music he arranged. In the Spiritual Songs (1832) there are more than thirty of his hymns published anonymously. Among these are some of the best that he wrote; such as, "How calm and beautiful the morn!" "Gently, Lord, oh gently lead us," "Child of sin and sorrow." The popularity of these first attempts led him to continue and cultivate the habit thus early begun. About two hundred of his hymns are in current use, and he left in manuscript about four hundred more. Doubtless his name will live longer as a writer of hymns than as a writer of tunes. His music, with that of Dr. Lowell Mason, did important service in the church, and marks in this country the transition period between the crude and the more cultured periods of psalmody. In his lifetime Dr. Hastings was criticised, as a musician, as too far in advance of the general cultivation: now he is criticised as too far behind the present wants. Both criticisms point to the truth that he aimed to lead higher the people of his own time. His cardinal principle was, that in church music the artistic must be strictly subordinated to the devotional. He was a devout and an earnest Christian, a hard student, a resolute worker, not laying aside his pen till three days before his death, which came to his relief in his eighty-eighth year. A list of his publications, with their dates, is subjoined.

Musica Sacra, 1816-22; The Musical Reader, 1819; A Dissertation on Musical Taste, 1822, revised and republished, 1853; Spiritual Songs (Dr. Lowell Mason, co-editor), 1832-36; Prayer, 1831; The Christian Psalmist (the Rev. Dr. William Patton, co-editor), 1836; Anthems, Motets, and Sentences, 1836; Musical Magazine, 24 numbers, 1837-38; The Manhattan Collection, 1837; Elements of Vocal Music, 1839; Nursery Songs, The Mother's Hymn-book, The Sacred Lyre, 1840; Juvenile Songs, 1842; The Crystal Fount, 1847; The Sunday-school Lyre, 1848. THOMAS S. HASTINGS.

HATFIELD, Edwin Francis, D.D., b. at Elizabethtown, N.J., Jan. 9, 1807; d. at Summit, N.J., Sept. 22, 1883. He was graduated at Middlebury College, Vt., 1829; studied two years (1829-31) at Andover Theological Seminary; was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis (1832-35), of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, New-York City (1835-36, during which time he received 1,556 persons on professions of faith, and 662 by letter), and of the North Presbyterian Church (1856-63). In 1863 he retired from the pastorate on account of loss of health. From 1864 to 1866, and again from 1870 to 1873, he acted as special agent of the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and raised much money. He was Stated Clerk of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church from 1846 until his death, first of the New-School Assembly (1846-70), and then of the united body. In 1866 he was a member of the Re-union Committee of the New-School Assembly. In 1883 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly; and, although seventy-six years old, he discharged the onerous duties of the position with surprising freshness and vigor. He was an eminent student of hymnology, had collected a large and valuable library in this branch, and in 1872 published at New York The Church Hymn-Book, with Tunes. His library is now in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. His acquaintance with ecclesiastical polity, with parliamentary law, and with the history and the members of the Presbyterian Church, was remarkable. He wrote the Memoir of Elihu W. Baldwin, D.D., 1813; St. Helena and the Cape of Good Hope, 1852; and The History of Elizabeth, N.J., 1868. For his contributions to this encyclopædia, see ANALYSIS.

HAWEIS, Thomas, M.D., b. at Truro, Cornwall, 1732 (or 1734); d. at Bath, Feb. 11, 1820; was educated at Christ College, Cambridge; became rector of Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, 1764, and chaplain to Lady Huntingdon. He published Communicant's Spiritual Companion, 1763; Evangelical Principles and Practice, 1762; Evangelical Expositor, 1765-66, 2 vols.; Improvement of the Church Catechism, 1775; Translation of the New Testament, 1795; Life of Romaine, 1797; History of the Church, 1800, 3 vols. His Carmina Christo, or Hymns to the Saviour, appeared 1792 and 1808: some of them are valuable and popular.

HEGIBOTHAM, Ottiwell, b. 1741; d. at Sudbury, 1765; was a student of Daventry, and a youth of "uncommon merit and abilities." Nov. 20, 1765, he was ordained at Sudbury as pastor of a congregation made up of two hostile parties, whose disputes drove him (being noted for "sensitivity, gentleness, and tenderness") into consumption and an early grave. His twenty-five hymns were not printed till 1794, in a small volume now rare. They are of fair merit, and have been considerably used.

HEMANS, Felicia Dorothea (Browne), b. in Liverpool, Sept. 25, 1791; d. near Dublin, May 12, 1835; was married to Capt. Hemans 1812, and separated from him 1818. Her voluminous poetry, long very popular, appeared in some nineteen separate publications, beginning 1808, and was collected, with a memoir by her sister, 1839, in 7 vols. Her Hymns for Childhood, and Scenes and Hymns of Life, were her last publications, 1831.

HERBERT, Daniel, b. about 1751; d. Aug. 29, 1833; was an illiterate but indefatigable rhymist, whose Hymns and Poems (1819-27) fill three volumes of over a thousand pages. Despicable from a literary view point, they have been used by extreme Calvinists. He lived at Sudbury.

HERRICK, Robert, b. in London, Aug. 20, 1591; d. at Dean Prior's, Devon, October, 1674; one of the most eminent of our lyric poets; was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge; M.A., 1617; vicar of Dean Prior's, 1629; ejected by the Puritans, 1648, and reinstated 1660. His Noble Numbers appeared 1647, and Hispanides, or Works both Human and Divine, 1648. The frequent levity or licentiousness of what he calls

"My unbaptized rhymes, Writ in my wild, unhallowed times," rather heavily overweighs his occasional sober moods, and but a small proportion of his verses entitle him to be called a sacred poet; but his fresh style and joyous fancy have won as many admirers in our time as he ever had. His "Litanie to the Holy Spirit" is well known.

HERRON, Francis, D.D., b. June 28, 1774, near Shippensburg, Penn.; d. Dec. 6, 1860, at Pittsburgh, Penn. He was born of Scotch-Irish and pious parents, and trained by them and the times to faith and manliness; Dickinson graduate, May, 1794; studied theology with Cooper; licensed Oct. 4, 1797; toughened by severe journey West, 1798-99, kindled by great revivals in progress there; settled at Rocky Springs, Penn., in April, 1800, and, after eleven years' successful pastorate, translated to Pittsburgh First Church.

Here began "labors more abundant." As preacher, he was careful in preparation, impressive, and experimental. The house, too large before, soon became too small. As pastor, he was affectionate, accessible, and progressive in methods. As presbyter, a born leader in synod and presbytery, and moderator of General Assembly in 1827. He was president of the board of directors of the Theological Seminary, Allegheny, from its beginning till his death. Having secured its location at Allegheny, he carried the institution by force of will, large influence, incessant begging, and indomitable trust in its future. As Pittsburgher, he was devoted to the city's interests, jealous of its morals, helpful in extending the churches, founding the first Moral Association, and holding the first temperance meetings.

He was pre-eminently a man to mould the times. "There are but two things in Pittsburgh," was once said,—"Dr. Herron and the Devil," and the doctor seems to be getting the advantage." In personal influence he was commanding and magnetic (aided by an unequalled majesty of presence), equal to emergencies in church or city, with pronounced opinions and well-understood convictions, sound judgment, and warm sympathies, of remarkable courage, and great practical wisdom.

SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

HERZOG, Johann Jakob, D.D., b. at Basel, Sept. 12, 1805; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 30, 1882. He pursued his university studies (1823-29) at Basel and Berlin. In 1830 he became licentiate in theology, and privatdocent in the university of Basel. In 1835 he was called as provisional, but in 1838 was appointed definitely professor of historical theology in the academy at Lausanne. There his colleague was Alexandre Vinet (see art.). He contributed to the Studien u. Kritiken, 1839, an essay upon Zwingli's doctrine of providence and election. Four years later he issued his sketch of John Calvin (Basel, 1843), and the same year and place his elaborate Life of Oecolampadius and the Reformation in Basel (Basel, 2 vols.). In 1845 he criticised the Plymouth Brethren in his Les frères de Plymouth et John Darby, Lausanne, and that year resigned his professorship (November, 1845) in consequence of a radical revolution, and retired into private life, until, on Tholuck's suggestion, he was called in 1847 to Halle as professor of church history. His acquaintance with two Waldensian students at Lausanne had led him to investigate that ancient sect's early history, and he published De Origine et pristino statu Waldensium (Halle, 1848), the first-fruits of such study. His essay attracted great attention; and under the patronage of the Prussian Government he made a journey through Switzerland, France, and Ireland for the inspection of manuscripts bearing upon the Waldenses. In 1853 he published Die romanischen Waldenser (Halle); in which he proved, that both the Waldensian and other historians were mistaken in attributing to the sect direct primitive descent from apostolic times, but, on the contrary, that the Roman-Catholic historians were right in maintaining that it started in the twelfth century. He also showed, that the sect had from the beginning biblical principles, but was first brought by the Hussite movement and the Reformation of the sixteenth century upon truly Protestant ground. His work was based upon comprehensive and careful study of the sources, and written in a friendly spirit. In 1854 Herzog went to Erlangen as professor of Reformed theology; and there he lectured until 1877, when he retired upon a pension. At the time of his death he had just finished his Abriss der gesammten Kirchengeschichte, Erlangen, 1876-82, 3 vols. Translations of it into Swedish, French, and Italian have been made, or are in preparation. It was Dr. Herzog's intention to add a supplementary volume, upon the church history of the nineteenth century.

But Dr. Herzog's greatest service was his Real-Encyclopädie für protestantische Theologie u. Kirche. The idea of a religious encyclopædia of a very comprehensive character had long been in the minds of Protestant theologians, and preparations had been made for it under the editorship of Schneckenburger (q.v.); but the Revolution of 1818 put a temporary end to the enterprise. After the excitement of that time had passed, and their business again justified it, the publishers revived the project: and Tholuck was asked to take charge of it, Schneckenburger having meanwhile died (1845); but he recommended Herzog, his colleague, and under the latter's care the first volume appeared at Hamburg in 1854, and the twenty-second and last volume, which contained the very elaborate index, at Gotha in 1868. The encyclopædia was an extraordinary success. It became at once a standard and indispensable work. Such a display of learning had not been previously made. And Dr. Herzog was just the man for his position,—learned, modest, energetic, wide in his sympathies, and liberal in his theology; for, although of the Reformed Church, he had the friendliest feelings towards Lutherans. He treated his contributors with uniform courtesy, kindness, and liberality. Besides bearing the burden of responsibility and care necessarily attached to the editing of so extensive a work, he assumed a large part of the authorship, contributing no less than five hundred and twenty-nine articles, some of them quite extensive and elaborate. But within less than ten years after the completion of his encyclopædia he was called upon to edit a second edition. He prudently allied to himself a younger man, Professor G. L. Plitt, his colleague; and the first volume of the new edition appeared at Leipzig in 1877. Professor Plitt died in 1880, after the completion of the seventh volume. Dr. Herzog then associated with himself another colleague, Professor Albert Hauck, and three volumes appeared under their conduct; but part 103, the third part of the eleventh volume, brought the announcement that Dr. Herzog had finished his work on earth.

See Professor F. SIEFFERT: Wissenschaftlicher Nachruf an Dr. Herzog, Erlangen, 1882, and the Beilage zur allgemeinen Zeitung, Jan. 31, 1883.

HORNBLOWER, William Henry, D.D., b. March 21, 1820, at Newark, N.J.; son of Chief Justice Hornblower; graduated at Princeton College in 1838; led to Christ by a tract written by Dr. Archibald Alexander, and devoted himself to the ministry; graduated from Princeton seminary in 1843; ordained by presbytery of Elizabethtown; missionated some months; ordained and installed pastor of church at Paterson, N.J., Jan. 30, 1844; resigned in October, 1871, to become professor of sacred rhetoric, pastoral theology, and church government in the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Allegheny, Penn.; died in that position, July 16, 1883.

He relinquished brilliant prospects in choosing the ministry, and proved his earnestness by devotedness. He earned so good a degree in the faith as to gratify the pride felt in him by Dr. Alexander. His diligence in biblical study issued in critical skill in Scripture exegesis. This found expression in the scholarly, discriminating, and edifying work done in editing and enlarging the Schaff-Nägelsbach-Lange Commentary on the Lamentations, published in 1871.

Dr. Hornblower's unvarying characteristics were a firm gentleness, a dignified courtesy, a winning and unselfish interest in others, a tenderness to the suffering which overlooked none. He was the most loving, bright, and genial of friends, the staunchest of advocates where principle was concerned, and eminently spiritually minded and devout.

HOSKINS, Joseph, b. 1745; d. at Bristol, Sept. 28, 1788; was for his last ten years an earnest and successful dissenting minister at Castle-Green Chapel, Bristol. His three hundred and eighty-four Hymns, published 1789, are of the humblest and most commonplace character; but a few of them are still used.

HURN, William, b. at Breccles Hall, Norfolk, Dec. 21, 1751; d. at Woodbridge, Oct. 9, 1829; was ordained, 1781, and became vicar of Debenham, Suffolk, 1790. In October, 1822, he left the Established Church, and in 1823 became Congregational pastor at Woodbridge. He wrote The Fundamental Principles of the Established Church, proceed to be the Doctrine of the Scripture, 1790; A Farewell Testimony, 1823; Reasons for Secession, 1830; A Glance at the Stage, A Catechism, and four hundred and twenty Hymns, 1813-24. Most of these are no more than respectable; but a few have merit, and are used.

HYDE, Abby (Bradley), b. at Stockbridge, Mass., Sept. 28, 1799; d. at Andover, Conn., April 7, 1872; married Rev. Lavius Hyde, 1818, and lived at Salisbury (Mass.), Bolton and Ellington (Conn.), Wayland and Becket (Mass.). She contributed to Nettleton's Village Hymns, 1821, nine pieces, three of which have been widely copied and used.

INDIANS OF NORTH AMERICA. 1. Religion. — The Indians universally believe in God or gods, and in the immortality of the soul, and its existence in a conscious state hereafter. There has never, probably, been an infidel among them. They believe in multitudes of spirits or gods everywhere, — gods of the woods, gods under the lakes, gods everywhere: in fact, the world to them is full of spiritual existences. Every kind of animals even, as the bears, has, according to their belief, its spiritual antitype, of which the body which they see is but the outward expression. In their religious rite, or Grand Medicine, they call all these gods, one by one, in endless numbers to their aid. Besides this, the Algonquin races now acknowledge one of these innumerable gods as God supreme: but whether this was their original belief before their discovery by white people, or whether they have insensibly imbibed this from the missionaries with whom they have come in contact from time to time for the last few hundred years, the writer does not pretend to decide; but he believes the latter to be the case. This Supreme Deity the Algonquin races call sometimes "Kitchi-Manido" ("the Great Spirit"), sometimes "Kije-Manido" ("the Kind, Christ-like Spirit"). The writer is, on the whole, inclined to believe, from all he has heard from the Indians, that their fathers had gradually lost entirely the notion of one supreme God, and had degenerated into that of gods everywhere, among whom Kije-Manido was only one. Even now the heathen Indians occasionally speak of him as such.

They are also worshippers of idols, even to this day. About their villages one may often see a rude image — carved in wood, and dressed up with clothes — placed aloft at the outskirts of their village, to ward off disease and ill luck, to which they pay their devotions. Everywhere, too, if there be a stone of striking shape or size, or naturally resembling the human face or figure, they will bow down in adoration to it, or to the spirit of which it is the outward expression; and one may everywhere see the offerings of tobacco, which, in their veneration, they have laid upon it.

As to their great religious rite, the "Grand Medicine," or "Me-da-wi-win," which is common to all the tribes, we quote from one of themselves (an educated mixed-blood, who spent his life in finding out their true beliefs on all subjects) as to its origin and purpose, and which any one who is much among them and hears them will know to be the truth.

"They fully believe that the red man mortally angered the Great Spirit, which caused the deluge; and at the commencement of the New Earth it was only through the medium and intercession of a powerful being whom they denominate Wa-wen-a-bo-zhe, that they were allowed to exist, and means were given them whereby to subsist, and support life; and a code of religion was more lately bestowed upon them, whereby they could commune with the offended Great Spirit, and ward off the approach and ravages of death. This they term 'Me-da-wi-win,' or 'Grand Medicine.'"

All the heathen Indians firmly believe, as the above writer states, that the Grand Medicine was given them by the Great Spirit. He is also right in saying that they use it in obtaining long life in this world, and warding off the ravages of sickness and death. It has no reference to life in the other world, all the Indian's hopes and fears being bounded by this life. He tries to prolong his life in this world by every means, of which he esteems this the very chief; but beyond that his thoughts do not go. He has no fear or dread of the future, nor any idea that his actions here may influence his state there. Very often, accompanying his most solemn performance of the Grand Medicine, there will be in the same vicinity gambling, lewdness, and even murder; and it is not thought that there is any thing out of consonance with what he is engaged in. Very often he is drunk when beginning its performance, and that is thought to be just as proper as if he were sober. Morality is entirely divorced from his religion, and has nothing to do with it.

As to their belief about the immortality of the soul, it cannot be more exactly told than in the words of the writer before quoted, who had it from Indian sources, and was most careful to have it exactly correct.

"When an Ojibway d. s. his body is placed in a grave, generally in a sitting posture, facing the west. With his body are buried all the articles needed in life for a journey, — of a man, his gun, blanket, kettle, fire-steel, flint, and moccasins; of a woman, her moccasins, axe, portage-collar, blanket, and kettle.

"The soul is supposed to stand, immediately after the death of the body, on a deep beaten path, which leads westward. The first object he comes to in following this path is the great 'Odeimin' ('Heart-berry'), or strawberry, which stands on the roadside like a huge rock, and from which he takes a handful, and eats on his way.

"He travels on until he reaches a deep, rapid stream of water, over which lies the much dreaded 'Go-gog-azh-ogun,' or 'Rolling and Sinking Bridge.' Once safely over this, as the traveller looks back, it assumes the shape of a huge serpent swimming, twisting and untwisting its folds across the stream.

"After camping out four nights, and travelling each day through a prairie country, the soul arrives in the land of spirits, where he is greeted by his relatives accumulated since mankind were first created. All is rejoicing, singing, and dancing. They live in a beautiful country, interspersed with clear lakes and streams, forests and prairie, and abounding in fruit and game to repletion; in a word, abounding in all that the red man most covets in this life. It is that kind of a paradise which he only by his manner of life in this world is fitted to enjoy."

The Ojibways call the road which leads to this place "Tchi-be-kuna," or "the Road of Souls."

They all — good, bad, and indifferent — expect to go there, and to find all their relatives there. There, also, they believe they will be waited on by the souls of those whom they have slain in battle, as slaves.

When entering on manhood, the heathen Indian practises a rigid fast, that he may, if possible, obtain a vision of the Great Spirit, or of some subordinate spirit, and may in consequence be directed to a long and prosperous life. He builds himself a sort of nest in a tree, or on the top of a rock, and there retires, and fasts for from four to ten days, till he obtains the much desired vision, or is compelled by hunger to desist. By this vision, if he obtain it, all his subsequent life is directed. He never mentions it but with the utmost veneration, and even with the sacrifice of tobacco, or some other thing precious to him, to the spirit of the vision he has seen.

They often hang up an offering of tobacco or clothing on poles to the sun (whom they suppose to be a god, a man) and the moon his wife. They have some sense of guilt, though faint till it is aroused by contact with Christianity; for in circumstances of great distress they will take a dog, and, carrying him out in a canoe, drop him into the middle of a lake as a sacrifice to appease the angry powers unseen.

2. Influence of Christianity. — Within the last twenty-five years almost have serious efforts been begun to Christianize the Indians. These efforts have been attended with, on the whole, good success, and have done more towards preventing wars, saving the treasury, protecting the frontier settlers, spreading peace, prosperity, and advancement, as well among the Indians as among the whites, than have all the countless wars, tens of thousands of lives, and hundreds of millions of dollars spent in hostile operations against them during the last hundred years. There are now very many native clergy and Indian congregations; and in consequence, though a very remote and unexpected consequence, there are now tens of thousands of acres of land tilled, and hundreds of thousands of bushels of grain of all kinds raised by them, and more progress made by them since that policy was inaugurated than in all the previous hundred years of gospelless wars.

3. Prospects of the Indian. — If the present policy of peaceful Christian missions to civilize and Christianize the Indians be continued and zealously prosecuted, their prospects are brighter than ever before, and not many years will pass till they will be self-sustaining Christian farmers and herdsmen. Experience shows that there is no use trying to make a civilized man out of an Indian, without first making a Christian of him: it is beginning at the wrong end. In our experience, no heathen man ever amounts to any thing as a farmer. The two are inseparably bound up together, — to be a farmer Indian and to be a Christian Indian.

Christianity changes the very expression of their faces, especially of the women. One can tell a Christian Indian woman, by her expression, from a heathen as far as one can see her. She has lost that hard, wild, and forbidding expression, more like that of a wild animal than of a human being; and in its place an expression of softness, gentleness, mildness, and love, has crept over her features. She is no longer a wild animal and a slave: she has become human by the gospel.

The Indians are not so quick to adopt Christianity, or any new thing, as the negroes, being very slow and deliberate in the movement of their minds; but, once embraced, they cling faster to it. They seem to value religion, when they do embrace it, far higher than we, as, indeed, it is often all they have. It makes them well dressed, clean, quiet, and industrious.

What the Indian needs now is to have all law extended over him the same as over all the other people of the land, to have schools like little district schools established everywhere by the government wherever there are Indian children, to have their lands allotted to them in severalty the same as white people, to be made to pay taxes as soon as possible, to be made citizens, and allowed to vote.

The system of free rations should cease the earliest possible moment, and in its stead a complete outfit for farming should be offered to every Indian family willing to commence that life; namely, a hundred and sixty acres of land in severalty, a yoke of oxen, wagon, sleigh, cow, plough, harrow, and all necessary farming-implements, seed for his land, and provisions to last until he can raise a crop; and, having once given him this complete outfit, let him then shift for himself. Cease to baby him. If white people were always so babied, it would take all the manliness and self-reliance out of them.

And, with all this, let missions be sustained among them by the good Christian people; so that Christianity can have an opportunity to do its work among them, and raise them, as it has raised all other people with whom it has come in contact. And, as the chiefest means to this end, let native Indian clergy be raised up and employed, of whom there are now very many, and whose labors have been blessed with abundant success. Thus employing the two powerful arms, — the temporal and the spiritual, education and Christianity, — an end will be reached which will gladden every lover of humanity, and solve the most difficult of problems.

J. A. GILFILLAN (indorsed by Bishop Whipple).

IRONS, Joseph, b. at Ware, Herts, Nov. 5, 1785; d. in London, April 3, 1852; was originally a builder, but became an Independent minister, and settled at Hoddesdon 1812, Sawston 1815, and Camberwell 1818, where he was pastor of Grove Chapel from 1819. He wrote Jacer, and other works in prose, besides Calvary, Zion's Hymns, 1816; Judah, a paraphrastic version of the Psalms, 1817; and Nymphs, being Canticles similarly treated, 1841. Some of his hymns have been used by advanced Calvinists. A memoir by C. BAYFIELD appeared 1852.

IRONS, William Josiah, D.D., b. at Hoddesdon, Herts, Sept. 12, 1812; d. June 19, 1883; was a son of the above, but became an advanced Anglican. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford; curate of Newington, 1835; vicar of Walworth, 1837; of Barkway, Herts, 1838; of Brompton, London, 1842; since then prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of St. Mary Woolnoth. He published many theological works, besides a Metrical Psalter, 1857, and a hundred and ninety original Psalms and Hymns for the Church, 1875. He has made the best version of Dies Ira, now generally used.

JOHNS, John, D.D., b. in New Castle, Del., July 10, 1796; d. April 5, 1876, at the Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia. Bishop Johns entered Princeton College in 1812, and graduated with the first honors in 1815. In 1816 he entered the theological seminary of Princeton. In both the college and seminary he was the classmate of Rev. Dr. Charles Hodge. Their friendship was lasting, and, like that of David and Jonathan, was "wonderful." On hearing of Bishop Johns's death, Dr. Hodge said, "I have no such friend on earth."

He was ordained by Bishop White in 1819. His first charge was in Frederick, Md.; from thence, in 1829, he became rector of Christ Church in Baltimore, where he remained till he was elected assistant bishop of the diocese of Virginia. He was consecrated in 1842, and on the death of Bishop Meade, in 1862, became bishop.

Bishop Johns was no ordinary man. He was by his natural gifts "fashioned to much honor." His classmate, Dr. Hodge, said of him, "He was always first, — first everywhere, and first in every thing." He had a well modulated voice, an earnest and impassioned delivery, a tenacious memory, and extraordinary fluency of language, which made him very popular as a preacher. As bishop, in the administration of his diocese and of the affairs of the church generally, he manifested wisdom, prudence, and gentleness. He was also a professor of homiletics and pastoral theology in the Protestant-Episcopal Theological Seminary of Virginia. As a man he was greatly beloved for the indescribable charm of his manner and the warmth of his friendship. His last hours were cheered by the full assurance of faith in that gospel he had always preached. The sting of death was taken away, and the grave robbed of its victory.

JOSEPH PACKARD.

JOYCE, James, b. at Frome, Somersetshire, Nov. 2, 1781; d. at Dorking, Oct. 9, 1850; was vicar of Dorking, and wrote A Treatise on Love to God, 1822, The Lay of Truth, 1825, and some hymns, one of which, on the Jews, is much used.

KENT, John, b. at Bideford, Devonshire, December, 1766; d. at Plymouth, Nov. 15, 1843; was a shipwright in Plymouth dockyard, and a warm believer in the tenets of extreme Calvinism. His Original Gospel Hymns, 1803, were enlarged to two hundred and fifty-nine in 1833, and reached a tenth edition, 1861: they are remarkable for "height of doctrine." Christians of ordinary altitude have found but one or two of them adapted to general use.

KEY, Francis Scott, b. in Frederick County, Md., Aug. 1, 1779; d. in Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1843; is remembered as the author of The Star-spangled Banner, 1814. He was educated at St. John's College, Annapolis; began to practise law at Frederick, Md.; removed to Washington, and became United-States district attorney. His Poems, 1857, include three hymns of some value.

KRAUTH, Charles Porterfield, D.D., LL.D., b. in Martinsburg, Va., March 17, 1823; d. in Philadelphia, Jan. 2, 1883. He was the oldest son of Charles Philip Krauth, D.D.; was educated at Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Penn. (of which his father was president), graduating in 1839, and at the Lutheran Theological Seminary at the same place; was pastor at Baltimore, Md. (1841-47), Shepherdstown, Va. (1847-48), Winchester, Va. (1848-55), Pittsburgh (1855-59), and of several churches in Philadelphia after 1859; editor of Lutheran and Missionary, 1861-67; professor of systematic theology in the Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia from its foundation in 1864 until his death; professor of mental and modern science, University of Pennsylvania, from 1868; vice-provost of same institution from 1873. He was a member of the American Oriental Society, of the American Philosophical Society, and of the Old-Testament Company of the American Bible Revision Committee. He was by universal acknowledgment the most accomplished scholar and theologian of the Lutheran Church in the United States. Furnished with a well selected library of fourteen thousand volumes, which, in some of the departments represented, was almost exhaustive with respect to primary sources of information, a most exact and conscientious student of a wide range of learning, especially fond of the most minute and thorough investigations that penetrated all the ramifications and development of a subject concerning which he was searching, endowed with rare powers as a thinker, writer, and debater, and with social gifts that always made him the centre and admiration of every circle in which he moved, he has left a permanent impress on the life and heart of the entire church. His associates in the Bible Revision Committee record their estimate in the words, "America has produced few men who united in their own persons so many of the excellences which distinguish the scholar, the theologian, the exegete, the debater, and leader of his brethren, as did our accomplished associate. His learning did not smother his genius, nor did his philosophical attainments impair the simplicity of his faith." His greatest work, The Conservative Reformation and its Theology (Philadelphia, 1872), is both historical and doctrinal. He translated Tholuck's Commentary on John (1859) and Ulrici's Review of Strauss (1874), and edited Berkeley's Principles of Human Knowledge (1874) and Fleming's Vocabulary of Philosophy (1860), to the last edition of which (1877) he added a Vocabulary of the Philosophical Sciences of almost equal size with the main work. He was an associate editor of Johnson's Cyclopædia. His review articles are numerous. In the controversy in the Lutheran Church which resulted in a division in 1866, Dr. Krauth was the leader of the wing, which, after the separation in the General Synod, established the General Council upon the confessional basis he has defended in The Conservative Reformation, viz., that of a strict adherence to the symbolical books. The revised doctrinal basis of the General Synod (1868) is a modification of a form of subscription to the Augsburg Confession he had prepared for the Pittsburgh synod (1868). Of the General Council he was president for ten years, composed its Fundamental Principles of Faith and Church Polity, co-operated largely in the determination of its liturgical forms, moulded to a great extent all its legislation involving doctrinal questions, while, in the defence of doctrinal theses he at various times presented, all his exalted gifts shone with their fullest brilliancy. Failing health prevented the completion of a life of Luther for the fourth Luther centenary, for which he had made extensive preparations, including a visit to the homes of Luther in 1880. A memoir is in preparation by his son-in-law and colleague, Dr. A. Spaeth. See also biographical sketch by Dr. B. M. Schmucker, in Lutheran Church Review for July, 1883 (separately printed), where Dr. Krauth's bibliography fills five pages of fine type. H. E. JACOBS.

LELAND, John, b. at Grafton, Mass., May 14, 1751; d. at North Adams, Jan. 14, 1811; was an eminent and active Baptist minister and politician in Virginia, 1775-90, and thenceforth at Conway, Cheshire, and New Ashford, Mass., excepting the years 1804-06 in New-York State. His influence contributed largely to the election of Madison instead of Patrick Henry to the Virginia Convention, and the consequent ratification of the United-States Constitution. Leland was a man of some talent and immense energy, and a local celebrity and power through life. He preached near eight thousand sermons, baptized 1,278 persons, and published some thirty pamphlets. He wrote some hymns, one or two of which are still used. His autobiography, sermons, etc., appeared 1845.

LENOX, James, b. in New-York City, August, 1800; d. there Feb. 17, 1880. He inherited and possessed all his life great wealth, but lived in noble simplicity. He was educated at Princeton College, and studied law, but never practised it. His means enabled him to gratify his taste for art and rare books. He accumulated a most valuable library of some twenty-five thousand volumes, and a gallery of choice paintings. These he removed to the Lenox Library, on Fifth Avenue, opposite Central Park, New York, which he founded in 1870, and built at an expense of nearly half a million of dollars. The library is particularly rich in Bibles (including a Mazarin Bible, the Complutensian Polyglot, and one of the two extant copies of Tyndale's Pentateuch), in Shakespeare, Dante, Milton, and Bunyan literature, and in American history. He founded the New-York Presbyterian Hospital in 1872, and in 1873 gave the site of the Presbyterian Home for Aged Women. He contributed liberally to literary and theological institutions, especially to Princeton Theological Seminary, and perhaps, in the aggregate, still more largely in ways unknown to the public. He was president of the American Bible Society from 1861 to 1871, and a lifelong member of the Presbyterian Church. He had such an aversion to even posthumous fame that he enjoined it upon his family to furnish no details for any sketch of his life.

LE QUIEN, Michael, b. at Boulogne-sur-Mer, Oct. 6, 1661; d. in Paris, March 12, 1733. He became a Dominican in his twentieth year, studied particularly Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic, and on account of his learning and services was made librarian of the convent of St. Honoré, Paris. He was a modest, pious, and zealous man, and constantly corresponded with the most learned men of his time. The most important of his writings are Sacri Joannis Damasceni opera omnia, 1712, Paris, 2 vols.; Stephani de Altamura Ponticensis contra schisma Græcorum Panoplia adversus Nectarii patriarch. Hieros., 1718; Oriens Christianus, 1740, 3 vols.

LLOYD, William Freeman, b. at Uley, Gloucestershire, Dec. 22, 1791; d. at Stanley Hall, in the same county, April 22, 1853; lived mainly in London, and long served as a secretary of the Sunday-school Union and of the Religious Tract Society, editing their publications. He wrote a few good hymns.

LOWRIE, Hon. Walter, b. near Edinburgh, Scotland, Dec. 10, 1784; d. in New-York City, Dec. 14, 1868. He was brought to America at eight years of age; wrought on the farm in Butler County, Penn., until after conversion at eighteen; sought the ministry, and studied with marked zeal and swift progress, but providentially hindered from finishing his studies, went into politics, and in 1811 he was chosen to the Senate of Pennsylvania; after seven years' service, elected to the United-States Senate, and, after six years in that office, made secretary of the Senate. This honorable life-station he surrendered in 1836 for a call to the secretaryship of the infant missionary society of the synod of Pittsburgh, which became, the year following, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

The place for the man was the result of Christian faith and moral heroism; the man for the place, the result of a long chain of preparatory providences. His public life had proven his ability, integrity, sagacity, practical judgment, systematic study, and thorough mastery of every question considered, and had demonstrated permanency and depth of his Christian convictions and character under the most trying circumstances. The man who had elicited the respect of Webster and Clay as "authority upon all points of political history and constitutional law," and had opposed slavery, studied and befriended the Indians, founded the congressional prayer-meeting and temperance society, was just the man in mental power and furniture, and he who gave three sons to foreign missions, and robbed himself of sleep to study Chinese, was just the man in heart, to undertake the new and difficult cause, to allay the irritations of the times while developing the true principles, to awaken the churches, to enlist the public authorities, to grasp comprehensively the world to be evangelized, and rapidly to develop the latent energies, and shape the hitherto unknown instrumentalities.

That he did all this is simple matter of precious history. Walter Lowrie lives everywhere in missionary zeal and efficiency. In the work he constantly manifested executive energy, unflagging industry, self-sacrificing readiness to endure the exposure of distant journeys, and the utmost patience with minutest detail. His religion of principle, joined with his calm and judicial mind, and enkindled by his ardent love for souls and their Saviour, and supported by unquestioning and invincible faith in the promises of God, made him for thirty years the efficient head of the mission-work. SYLVESTER F. SCOVILL.

LYNCH, Thomas Toke, was b. at Dunmow, Essex, July 5, 1818, and brought up in Islington, London. He was successively pastor at Highgate, 1847; Mortimer Street, London, 1849; Fitzroy Chapel, 1852; and Mornington Church, Hampstead Road, 1862. Always in feeble health, and in later years able to preach on Sunday mornings only, he died May 9, 1871.

He was a brilliant man, with a vivid and subtle imagination, and a temperament essentially poetical. He wrote Memorials of Theophilus Trial (which is largely autobiographic), 1850; Essays on Some of the Forms of Literature, 1853; Lectures in Aid of Self-Improvement, 1854; Among Transgressors, 1860; A Group of Six Sermons, 1869; The Mornington Lectures, 1870; and Sermons for my Curates, 1871, reprinted as The Moral of Accidents, etc. Some of these were not so much written by him, as reported from his delivery.

In 1855 he published The Rivelet, a Contribution to Sacred Song. This was attacked with great virulence by James Grant in the Morning Advertiser, and Dr. John Campbell in The British Banner. Newman Hall, Thomas Binney, and other leading Independents stood by Mr. Lynch; and thus arose the once famous "Rivelet Controversy," which filled some thousand pages, chiefly of closely printed octavo. The most memorable part in it was borne by Lynch himself, as "Silent Long," in Songs Controversial and The Ethics of Quotation, and under his own name in the Christian Spectator for November, 1856. In his puny frame dwelt an indomitable spirit, with the indignation as of a Hebrew prophet for meannesses, slams, compromises. The Rivelet won him many friends, and the assaults upon it many enemies. The book itself is full of fresh thought, delicate poetry, uncommonplace experience, and quiet devotion: it reached a third edition, much enlarged, in 1868. Selections from it are found in many recent hymnals, both English and American; the most familiar of them beginning, "Gracious Spirit, dwell with me." See LYNCH'S Memoirs, edited by William White, London, 1874.

MACURDY, Elisha, b. Oct. 15, 1763, in Carlisle, Penn.; d. at Pittsburgh, Penn., July, 1845. Education interrupted by the Revolution and family embarrassment. Character early developed. Total abstainer from boyhood. Advised by presbytery, because of zeal and success, to prepare for the ministry. Cannonsburgh Academy entered at twenty-nine years of age; theology from McMillan; finished in 1799. Ardent piety farther developed through Philip Jackson, the "praying elder." Licensed in 1799. Missionary tour to Erie and thereabouts; second one. Decided with difficulty to settle at Cross Roads, Penn., in connection with Three Springs; installed in 1800. Preaching expository, condensed, pithy; work largely blessed. Refused to ask a blessing on whiskey at a funeral, and persuaded presbytery to exclude it from its meetings. Missionary tour in 1802.

Most eminent as factor in revivals of 1802. Much in prayer. Originated the sunset, fifteen-minute concert of prayer for revival. On fourth sabbath of September, 1802, after sermon on "Choose ye this day," etc., whole night spent by people in prayer; interest deepened; bodily prostrations were experienced. Other neighborhoods stirred. People continued together, despite rain and snow. Enlarged communion seasons. Ten thousand present at Upper Buffalo, 14th November. There Macurdy preached, as if by inspiration, from Ps. ii., the famous "war sermon." Scene at close, says an eye-witness, "like the close of a battle in which every tenth man had fallen, fatally wounded." Revival continued from two to four years; saved the district from infidelity and immorality, and exerted powerful influence on the West. Macurdy's Indian work as remarkable for sagacity, bravery, perseverance, and self-sacrifice. Eight missionary journeys to Wyandottes, Maumees, etc., travelling forty-five hundred miles, all on horseback. Pastorate resigned, 1835, for infirmity. Labored unremittingly in Allegheny City as long as strength endured.

MADAN, Martin, b. 1726; d. 1790; was a cousin of Cowper, and the founder and first chaplain of Lock Hospital, in London. There he was long useful, but lost repute through his Thelyphthora, which favored polygamy. His Collection of Psalms and Hymns, 1760, was one of the most important and influential of early hymnals. He wrote no originals, but altered and enlarged some verses of others, and with unusual judgment and taste, so that several favorite hymns as now used are his in part.

McMILLAN, John, D.D., Presbyterian; b. Nov. 11, 1752, of Scotch-Irish parents, at Fagg's Manor, Penn.; d. at Cannonsburgh, Penn., Nov. 16, 1833. His sisters labored in the field to aid in educating him, first at academy, and then at Princeton College, from 1770. Awakened in the academy when less than seventeen years old, he passed through characteristically strong religious struggles, but finally yielded his will to God's call to the ministry. His theological studies were with Dr. Robert Smith of Pequea. He was ordained at Chambersburg, Penn., June, 1776, as pastor of Chartiers and Pigeon Creek in Washington County. Revolution intervening, he visited the congregations frequently, but removed with his family only in November, 1778. Once settled among a people grappling with the forests, and surrounded by savages housed in log huts, clothed in linsey-woolsey, fed from the products of their own labor, but true to God and their standards, he shared their lot, organized their churches, rebuked rising immorality, kept the generations true to the faith, provided for a needed ministry, visited, catechised, preached and lived the truth through the nearly sixty years' most fruitful ministry, whose fruits remain. He was prominent in the revivals of 1781, when the people spent whole nights in prayer, of 1795, of 1799, of 1802, and of 1823. As ecclesiastic, he was the nucleus of presbyteries, the stern advocate of sound discipline, the relentless opponent of laxity in doctrine; as citizen, he was the defence of law and order during the whiskey insurrection (1791); as educator, he was the father of the "Log-cabin College," the "founder of Jefferson," and the teacher in theology of more than a hundred ministers, who were well taught despite defective apparatus. He resigned his pastoral charge in 1830.

MEDLEY, Samuel, b. at Cheshunt, Herts, June 23, 1738; d. at Liverpool, July 17, 1799; was apprenticed to an oilman in London, 1752; entered the navy as a midshipman, 1755; was wounded, 1759, and soon after "converted;" opened a school in London, 1760 or 1761; became Baptist pastor at Watford, Herts, 1767, and at Liverpool, 1772, where his ministry was earnest and efficient. His Hymns appeared on leaflets or broadsides; seventy-seven of them were gathered in a volume, 1789, and two hundred and thirty-two in 1800. They show some talent, but no taste; yet several of them have been very popular. He was fond of building a hymn on some text or catchword, repeated as often as possible and usually at the end of every stanza: the result is sometimes successful, but oftener weak and offensive.

MERRICK, James, b. at Reading, Jan. 8, 1720; d. there Jan. 5, 1769; was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became a fellow of it; took orders, but no parochial charge. Bishop Lowth called him one of the best of men and most eminent of scholars. He published Annotations on the Psalms, 1767, and on the Gospel of St. John, 1761-67; a translation of Tryphiodorus' Destruction of Troy, 1742; Poems on Sacred Subjects, 1763; and The Psalms Translated, or Paraphrased in English Verse, quarto, 1765, divided into stanzas, etc., by W. D. Tattersall, 1789. The weakness of this important version is its excessive verbosity: had the author known how to condense, he might have done excellent work. Yet some have greatly valued and largely used his renderings. Of his few other lyrics, those on The Providence of God and The Ignorance of Man possess great beauty and interest; and the last half of the latter makes a popular and admirable hymn.

MILLS, Henry, D.D., b. at Morristown, N.Y., March 12, 1786; d. at Auburn, June 10, 1867; graduated at Princeton, 1802; taught for some years; received Presbyterian ordination, 1816; professor of biblical criticism at Auburn, 1821-51. He published Hære Germanice, a Version of German Hymns, 1815, enlarged edition, 1856.

MOFFAT, Robert, D.D., African missionary; b. at Ormiston, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, Dec. 21, 1795; d. at Leigh, near Tunbridge Wells, Eng., Aug. 9, 1883. He was of humble parentage. Became a gardener, but in 1814 offered himself to the London Missionary Society, and by it was sent to South Africa, Oct. 31, 1816. He at first lived in Namaqua Land, with Africaner, a dreaded chief whom he converted; but after his marriage at Cape Town, in 1819, with Miss Mary Smith (b. at New Windsor, near Manchester, Eng., May 21, 1795; d. in England, Jan. 10, 1871), he settled at Kuruman, among the Bechuana tribes, translated the Bible into Bechuana, and carried it through the press after his return to England in 1870. In all his labors and dangers he had a most efficient helper, counsellor, and friend in his remarkable wife. As the result of his vigorous, large-minded, and spiritual labors, civilization and Christianity have been spread through his field of operations,—Kuruman to the Zambesi. In 1812, while on a visit home, he published Missionary Labors and Scenes in South Africa. On his final return, in 1870, he was enthusiastically welcomed, and in 1873 given a testimonial of six thousand pounds. David Livingstone was his son-in-law.

MONCREIFF, Sir Henry Wellwood, Bart., D.D., a distinguished and much valued minister of the Free Church of Scotland; was b. at Edinburgh in 1809, and d. there Nov. 4, 1883. He was the eldest son of Sir James Wellwood Moncreiff, Bart., known as Lord Moncreiff, a judge in the supreme court of Scotland. He was the head of a family that for many generations had been noted for their attachment to the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, and had given to that church in almost unbroken succession a line of most estimable ministers. The baronetcy in the family is one of the oldest in Scotland, having been created in 1626. The grandfather of Sir Henry was long known and widely esteemed as minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, and a leader of the evangelical party in the church.

After receiving education at the high school and university of Edinburgh, young Moncreiff entered the university of Oxford, where he was a fellow-student of Mr. Gladstone and other eminent men. Influence was brought to bear on him to join the Church of England; and, as the Archbishop of Canterbury was the husband of his aunt, his prospects there were excellent. But he preferred to labor in the church of his fathers; and, returning to Edinburgh to study at the Divinity Hall, he was ordained to the ministry in the country parish of Baldernoch in 1836, whence he was translated to East Kilbride, near Glasgow, in 1837. At the disruption in 1843 he joined the Free Church, and in 1852 was translated to Free St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, in which charge he remained till his death. Sir Henry was one of the principal clerks of the General Assembly of the Free Church; and he likewise held the situation of secretary to the Queen's printers in Scotland, in which capacity it was his duty to see to the correctness of the various editions printed of the Bible. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly of the Free Church. He was the first lecturer under the foundation of the Chalmers Lectureship, and had but recently delivered and published his course of lectures on the Principles of the Free Church.

Sir Henry had quite a genius for ecclesiastical law and ecclesiastical procedure and forms. His services as clerk of the Free-Church Assembly were of great value, not only in promoting the orderly course of business, but likewise in guiding deliberations, and elucidating the principles that were applicable to difficult questions. The whole question of the relation of Church and State in Scotland, especially as it came to a crisis in 1843, was the subject of his very profound and careful study. He published several treatises on the subject, including A Letter to Lord Melbourne, in 1840; The Practice of the Free Church in her Several Courts, 1871; A Letter to the Duke of Argyle, in 1875; Vindication of the Claim of Right of the Free Church, 1877; and, most elaborate of all, his Chalmers Lectures, just referred to. The Practice of the Free Church is the book by which he will probably be most remembered. He deemed it quite competent, in harmony with Free-Church principles, to negotiate for union with the United Presbyterians; although, when the question of disestablishment came up, he thought that step inconsistent with these principles. He equally disapproved of the existing Established Church, and of the attempt to pull it down without rearing a purer establishment in its room.

Sir Henry Moncreiff was an assiduous and faithful minister. His discourses were earnest, evangelical, substantial, and often powerful, though he was not a very popular preacher. He was regular and unwearied in visiting the members of his congregation, and in all the other parts of pastoral duty. Personally he was kind, affable, and unobtrusive, ready to do any service to the poorest of his brethren, quite cordially accepting the humble place of a minister of a nonconformist church, and content to see the favors of the state bestowed upon others. His personal earnestness as a Christian, his sympathy with evangelistic work, his desire for the spiritual good of his people and for the presence of God's spirit in the church at large, were very sincere. Few men have enjoyed a more general esteem for integrity and purity of character, for the true bearing of a Christian minister and a Christian gentleman, throughout his whole life.

W. G. BLAIRIE.

MONSELL, John Samuel Bewley, LL.D., b. at St. Columb's, Londonderry, March 2, 1811; d. at Guildford, April 9, 1875; was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; B.A., 1832; became examining chaplain to Bishop Mant, rector of Ramoon, and chancellor of the diocese of Connor; vicar of Egham, Surrey, 1858, and rural dean; rector of St. Nicholas', Guildford, 1870. Besides Our New Vicar, 1867, and other prose-works, he published Hymns and Poems, 1837; Parish Musings, 1850; Hymns of Love and Praise for the Church's Year, 1863; Spiritual Songs; The Parish Hymnal, 1873; Simon the Cyrenian, etc., 1873, and several pamphlets, etc. His devotional verses combine warmth with refinement, and are greatly valued by many of schools widely different from his own.

MOORE, Thomas, b. in Dublin, May 28, 1779; d. at Slapton, Wilts, Feb. 25, 1852; enters into religious literature by his Sacred Songs, 1816. These have their full share of the spirited elegance which usually marks his lyrics, and some of them touch deep subjects with apparent feeling; so that a few are much valued and sometimes sung by Christians of almost every denomination.

MORGAN, Edwin Denison, b. in Washington, Berkshire County, Mass., Feb. 8, 1811; d. in New-York City, Feb. 14, 1883. He was of genuine New-England descent in the eighth generation of a Connecticut family. His early years were spent in Hartford, where he began his business-life. In 1836 he removed to New-York City, and entered upon a commercial career, which was from the first one of marked and growing success, and gave him a high place among the merchant princes of the metropolis. His political career began with his election, at the age of twenty-one, to the city council of Hartford. In 1849 he was made one of the assistant aldermen of the city of New York, and from this time forward was engaged in public service for twenty years, holding positions of highest honor and responsibility. He was State senator from the Sixth District in 1850 and in 1852, commissioner of emigration from 1855 to 1858, governor of New York from 1858 to 1862, senator of the United States for New York from 1862 to 1869. He was nominated for the secretaryship of the treasury twice by President Lincoln, and in 1881 by President Arthur, but declined the appointment. His services to the country during the first years of the civil war were excelled by none; they are still held in most honorable remembrance: and his name is marked as that of one of our most upright, energetic, and capable public men.

In all this he ever declared and proved his personal adherence to the religion of Jesus Christ.

Christianity was the foundation of his character. In 1817 he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, to which he remained bound by a love and loyalty which deepened with every year of his life. Connected during his later years with the Brick Church of New York, and devoted to its interests, he brought forth abundant fruits of Christian benevolence in large gifts and earnest labors for many good causes. His benefactions to Union Theological Seminary, Williams College, the Woman's Hospital, the Presbyterian Boards of Missions, the Presbyterian Hospital, and other similar objects, were most generous. He furnished funds for a fire-proof building of the valuable library of the Union Theological Seminary in New York, now called "the Morgan Library." He was a director in many of the religious and charitable societies; and his name abides in honor in the church as one who feared God, adorned his faith, and did great good in the world.

HENRY J. VAN DYKE, JUN.

PATTERSON, Joseph, b. County Down, Ireland, March, 1752; d. at Pittsburgh, Feb. 4, 1832. Accepted Christ beside his father's plough, and held prayer-meetings with his playmates at ten years of age. Married and immigrated in 1772. Present at first public reading of the Declaration of Independence; in the army until 1777. Came to Washington County, Penn., 1779. Shared perils of time and place until 1785. Prepared for the ministry, at much sacrifice, by suggestion of the presbytery; licensed, August, 1788; settled at Raccoon and Montours churches, April, 1789. Preached to people who walked ten to fifteen miles to worship without house or fire even in winter. Made missionary journey to Maumee Indians in 1802. Resigned pastorate in 1816. Removed to Pittsburgh, where he sought the river population, distributed Bibles (6,863 copies in all), formed the Sabbath-school Association (in 1817), stimulated the piety of all the churches, led the "sunrise" prayer-meetings, conversed with inquirers in all the revivals, helped every good work, prayed in every room of the unfinished theological seminary for its future tenant, visited the sick, and gave tender exhortations at the communion-table.

SCHWAB, Gustav, b. at Stuttgart, June 19, 1792; d. there Nov. 4, 1850. He studied theology and philosophy at Tübingen as a classmate of Baur; was appointed professor of ancient literature in the gymnasium of Stuttgart in 1817, pastor at Gomaringen in 1837, and at the St. Leonard Church in Stuttgart in 1842, and member of the highest ecclesiastical tribunal of Württemberg. His reputation is chiefly literary. He belonged to the Swabian school of poets, with his intimate friend Ludwig Uhland; and his poems are distinguished by purity and warmth of feeling, and simplicity and naïveté of form. A few of them are religious, and one (Lass dich nicht den Frühling täuschen) was admitted into the new hymn-book of Württemberg. The first collected edition of his Gedichte appeared in 1828-29 in 2 vols.: a second revised edition, Neue Auswahl (1832), has often been reprinted. Of his prose-works, mostly consisting of sketches from nature and history, the most remarkable are Schiller's Leben (1840).

Sagen des classischen Altherthums (1840), Deutsche Volksbücher (1813), and Wegweiser durch die Literatur der Deutschen (1846). He wrote with his friend Ullmann against the pantheistic worship of genius, and some witty epigrams against the Leben Jesu of Strauss and modern infidelity, one of which is worthy of preservation:—

“Ich bin der Weg, die Wahrheit und das Leben, Sprach Der, den Gott zum Führer uns gegeben;
Doch wie spricht der, mit dem ihr uns bedroht?
Ich bin der Weg, die Wahrheit und der Tod.”

STARK, Johann Friedrich, b. at Hildesheim, Oct. 10, 1680; d. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, July 17, 1756. He was the author of the famous German devotional works, Tägliches Handbuch in guten und bösen Tagen (Frankfort, 1727; 52d ed., 1875; other editions elsewhere; Eng. trans., Philadelphia), Morgen- u. Abend-Andachten frommer Christen auf alle Tage im Jahr (Frankfort, 9th ed., 1862; other editions elsewhere), Göldenes Schatz-Kästlein, and also of the sermons, Predigten über die Sonn-Fest- u. Feiertags-Evangelien, many editions. Among his other works may be mentioned a commentary (in Latin) upon Ezekiel, Frankfort, 1731. The biography of Stark is found in the modern Frankfort edition of his Handbuch.

STARKE, Christoph, b. at Freienwalde, March 21, 1684; d. as chief pastor at Driesen-in-the-Neumark, Dec. 12, 1744. He wrote in German a well-known and excellent homiletical commentary upon the Bible under the Latin title Synopsis Bibliothecæ eregetice in V. et N. Testamentum, Leipzig, 1733–41, 9 vols., reprinted Berlin,—New Testament, 1865–68, 10 vols., 2d ed., 1870–73; Old Testament, 1870–72, 3 vols. The commentary is constantly quoted in the homiletical portion of Lange's Commentary.

STUART, Robert L. (b. in New-York City, July 21, 1806; d. there Dec. 12, 1882) and Alexander his brother (b. in New-York City, Dec. 8, 1810; d. there Dec. 23, 1879), two philanthropists, whose princely gifts entitle them to lasting honor. From 1828 until 1873 they carried on, under the firm name of R. L. & A. Stuart, an extensive business, at first as caudy-manufacturers only (1828–32), then in connection with steam sugar-refining (1832–56), but since 1856 as refiners only. They accumulated large wealth, and their reputation for integrity was such that their name upon an article was a guaranty of its excellent quality. They refined annually about forty million pounds of sugar. They made no concealment of their religion. To each new employee they presented a Bible. During their long business-experience their workmen never struck once; and when their establishment was threatened by the rioters in 1863, they stood to a man in its defence. They were zealous Presbyterians, but to many an enterprise which did not bear this name they gave liberally. Princeton College and Theological Seminary received from them, probably, more in buildings and endowments than other institutions. One of their plans was to devote a certain sum each year to charity. Mr. R. L. Stuart was also a liberal patron of art; and both brothers were public-spirited, influential citizens, held in esteem by all good men.

UEBERWEG, Friedrich, Ph.D., b. near Solingen, Rhenish Prussia, Jan. 22, 1826; d. at Königsberg, June 7, 1871. He studied at Göttingen and Berlin, from 1852 to 1862 was privatdocent at Bonn, and from 1862 to his death professor of philosophy at Königsberg. His principal works are System der Logik und Geschichte der logischen Lehren, Bonn, 1857 (5th ed. by J. B. Meyer, 1882; Eng. trans. from 3d ed., 1868, by T. M. Lindsay, System of Logic and History of Logical Doctrines, London, 1871), and Grundriss der Geschichte der Philosophie, Berlin, 1862–66, 3 vols. (6th ed. by M. Heinze, 1880–83; Eng. trans. from 4th ed., 1871, by Professor G. S. Morris, with supplementary chapters by Professor Botta on Italian, and by President Porter on American philosophy, New York, 1871, London, 1872, 2 vols.). The latter work is extensively used as a text-book in Great Britain and the United States, and is also well adapted for general reading. It is noted for its objectivity, and fulness of reference to the literature.

VENI, CREATOR SPIRITUS. The authorship of this hymn has been very much disputed. George Fabricius (1564) assigns it to Ambrose; Thomasius and Daniel, to Charlemagne; the Encyclopædia Britannica (art. “Hymns”), to Charles the Bald (Carolus Crassus, grandson of Charlemagne); and Mone, Wackernagel, and March, to Gregory the Great. It is first mentioned in the Annales Benedictorum in an account of the removal of the relics of St. Marculfus, A.D. 898. The Anglican Church retains it in the offices for ordering of priests, and consecrating of bishops; the Roman Church, additionally, in the consecration of the Pope. Superstitious reverence attached to its repetition as a charm against enemies. It is found, generally, in the German breviaries and missals of the thirteenth to the fourteenth century. Its true author is doubtless Rabanus Maurus, pupil of Alcuin, bishop of Mayence, and poet-laureate of the time of Charlemagne. The arguments in behalf of this view are, (1) The hymn can only be attributable to a scholar, a theologian, and a poet. (2) Its latest date is restricted by the considerations just offered, and its earliest date depends on the doctrinal point of the procession of the Holy Spirit from both the Father and the Son. This was affirmed (by adding Filioque to the Creed) by the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589, and re-affirmed by the synod of Aquisgranum (Aachen), A.D. 809. (3) The word “paracletus” (παράκλητος) in the hymn is scanned differently from Prudentius and Adam of St. Victor, who in the usual manner make the penultimate syllable short. This would go far to establish the author as a person who pronounced Greek by quantity rather than by accent, and certainly shows him to have understood that language. (4) The hymn (divested of its modern stanza, Da gaudiorum, etc., and of Hincmar of Rheims' doxology, Sit laus, etc.) was found by Christopher Brower (1559–1617) in “an approved and very ancient manuscript.” Brower was a Jesuit, and the antiquarian and rector of the college at Fulda, and published the poems of Rabanus Maurus as an appendix to those of Fortunatus (Cologne, 1617). Wackernagel (i. 75) admits that this assignment deserves “some notice,” though he prefers the Gregorian authorship. (5) But this hymn does not appear among the eight which are included in the works of Gregory the Great (cf. Migne: Patrol., 78, 849), and does appear in those of Rabanus Maurus (Migne: Patrol., 112, 1657). (6) Charlemagne was not scholar enough to have composed it without Alcuin's help (Wackernagel, i. 75). (7) The hymn is really a paraphrase of Rabanus Maurus' own chapter on the Holy Spirit (Migne, 111, 25); and in his hymn "Æterne rerum conditor, et clarus," etc., Rabanus Maurus scans "paracletus" as in the "Veni, Creator." (8) In respect to the lines "Infirmus," etc., and its companion, it is noticeable that these are in the "very doubtful" stanza of Ambrose's "Veni, Redemptor gentium," where they probably are an interpolation.

For an exhaustive treatment of the point at issue, see the undersigned's book (soon to be issued), The Latin Hymn-Writers and their Hymns; DANIEL: Thesaurus Hymnologicus, i. 213 and iv. 121; and WACKERNAGEL: Das Deutsche Kirchenlied, i. 75. WHITE, Norman, a New-York merchant and Christian philanthropist; son of Daniel White; was b. at Andover, Conn., Aug. 8, 1805; and d. at New Rochelle, N.Y., June 13, 1883. He was a lineal descendant of John White, one of the original settlers, in 1635, of Hartford, Conn. Mr. White commenced his life as a merchant in New York, in 1827, and for more than fifty years was actively and successfully in business-life. He was principally engaged in the manufacture and sale of paper, but was also interested in various other branches of trade, and was for several years president of the Mercantile National Bank.

During all this period of more than half a century he was prominent in works of benevolence and in the religious movements of the day. He was an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and for more than forty years a ruling elder. He was president of the Young Men's Bible Society, and afterwards an influential manager and vice-president of the American Bible Society. To his wise foresight and practical sagacity when upon its building committee, this latter society is largely indebted for its present site and its model building. He was interested in the Union Theological Seminary from the time of its founding, was for twenty-five years one of the directors upon its board, and for twelve years its vice-president.

The chief public work of Mr. White's life was in connection with the New-York Sabbath Committee. He had long been deeply impressed with the danger to morality and religion from the increasing desecration of the Lord's Day, especially in our larger cities; and, after much thought and prayer, it was at his suggestion that in 1857 a meeting of Christian men was held in New York at which the Sabbath Committee was formed. The details of the work of this organization are given elsewhere [see art. in loco], and need not be repeated. Of this committee Mr. White was made the chairman, a position he held until his death; and, while he was nobly seconded in his efforts by the eminent Christian men who were associated with him, it is beyond doubt that the very successful results of the work were largely due to the zeal, courage, and patience with which for so many years he guided the undertaking. He was also instrumental in the establishment of similar committees in other places, and when abroad in 1871 was invited to address a meeting held in London, and explain the methods of his work for the sabbath, which had attracted the interest of Christians in that city.

Mr. White's character and influence are well expressed in the following words extracted from the resolutions passed at the time of his death by the directors of the Union Theological Seminary:—

"While energetic in action, he was eminently sagacious in council. In difficult emergencies his advice was always sought, and had great weight. It may be said with perfect truth that both in the church and in society he was characterized by the same union of boldness and wisdom. He was prompt in every good cause, and during his long Christian life was one of the most influential laymen which this city has produced."

WILSON, Samuel Jennings, D.D., LL.D., b. July 19, 1828, in Western Pennsylvania (Washington County), of godly parentage; converted in Washington College (Dr. Brownson, pastor) at twenty-one years of age; graduated thence in 1852; entered the Western Theological Seminary (Presbyterian) the same year; licensed at close of his course, in 1855, by presbytery of Washington; during 1855-57 instructor in Hebrew in the same seminary, elected to its chair of ecclesiastical history and homiletics by the General Assembly in 1857, and ordained sine titulo by presbytery of Washington the same year; relinquished homiletics to Dr. William M. Paxton in 1860; became senior professor in 1870, and about 1879 added history of doctrines; preached as stated supply at Wheeling and at Sharpshburgh; pastor of Sixth Church from 1862 to 1877; completed twenty-five years of continuous service in his professorship, an event celebrated with enthusiasm, on the 18th of April, 1883; died four months later, Aug. 17, 1883, at Sewickley, Penn., on the Ohio, twelve miles from Pittsburgh.

He was an excellent teacher, preacher, and speaker, and in private life unselfish, sympathetic, and sincere. He had great influence in the region of his birth. He was a stanch Presbyterian, and sat as delegate in the Presbyterian Conference in London (1875), and in the Pan-Presbyterian Council in Philadelphia (1880). On the latter occasion he read a paper upon "The Distinctive Principles of Presbyterianism." (See Report of Second General Council of the Presbyterian Alliance, Philadelphia, [1880], pp. 148-156.) He contributed the art. WESTERN THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY in the third volume of this ENCYCLOPEDIA. SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

ZSCHOKKE, Johann Heinrich Daniel, b. at Magdeburg, March 22, 1771; d. at Biberstein, June 27, 1848. He studied at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, and in 1792 began to lecture there upon literary and historical subjects. In 1796 he was refused the appointment as professor, in consequence of his opposition to the Prussian minister's (Wöllner) order, that all preachers should conform their discourses to the Confessional statements. He went to Switzerland, and for the rest of his life played a prominent part in Swiss affairs, especially at Aarau. He was a poet, a novelist, an historian (cf. especially his Des Schweizerlandes Geschichte für das Schweizervolk, 1822, Eng. trans., N.Y., 1855); but he is best known as the author of Stunden der Andacht (1806, last ed., 1874, 6 vols.; twice translated, last in 1862, Meditations on Death and Eternity). It is the best devotional volume produced by rationalism, and has received great popularity in England by royal favor. It was partly to counteract its influence that Tholuck wrote his Hours of Christian Devotion.

MARTENSEN, Hans Lassen, D.D., an eminent Danish theologian and bishop; b. at Flensburg, Aug. 19, 1808; d. in Copenhagen, Feb. 4, 1884. He was brought up in the ideas of Hegel and Franz Baader, and these ideas influenced his Lutheran theology. He obtained the gold medal for his ecclesiastical examination (1832), and, at state expense, studied at Berlin, Munich, Vienna, and Paris, particularly the philosophy of the middle age. On his return, in 1836, he took the degree of licentiate in theology, for which he presented a remarkable thesis on the autonomy of the human conscience, De autonomia conscientie sui humanæ, Copenhagen, 1837 (translated into Danish, 1841, and into German, Kiel, 1844). He began lecturing upon moral philosophy, at the university of Copenhagen, in 1837, and was made ordinary-professor in 1840.

He attracted throngs of hearers. In 1843 he was made bishop of Seeland, and in 1845 court-preacher, but still continued his lectures and writing. He was a man of great spirituality, learning, and ability. He sympathized with the old German mystics, whom he knew so well, and of whom he has written so charmingly. His principal writings (all published in Copenhagen) are Principles of Moral Philosophy, 1841 (German trans., Kiel, 1841); Master Eckart (German trans., Hamburg, 1842), Christian Baptism, 1843 (2d ed., 1847; German trans., 2d ed., 1860); Christian Dogmatics, 1849 (2d ed., 1850; German trans., 4th ed., 1858; English trans., Edinburgh, 1866); Christian Ethics, 1871-78, 2 vols. (German trans., Gotha, 3d ed., 1878-79, 2 vols.; English trans., 1873-82, 2 vols.); Catholicism and Protestantism (German trans., Gütersloh, 1884); Jacob Boehme, 1879 (German trans., Leipzig, 1882); Autobiography, 1883 (German trans., Carlsruhe, 1883). Besides these, Bishop Martensen published Sermons (four series, 1849-54), and occasional discourses, in which with great skill he opposed destructive tendencies in the Danish Church, of which he is one of the most distinguished ornaments.

PRONOUNCING VOCABULARY OF PROPER NAMES

SCHAFF-HERZOG ENCYCLOPÆDIA.

Explanations. — The acute accent (´) denotes the accented syllable. The grave accent (`) over a, e, and i, denotes that they are pronounced as a in "far," e as a, and i as e respectively. The italicized letters in parentheses immediately after a name give the pronunciation of a portion of the name. The system of pronunciation adopted is in the main that used by Thomas in his excellent Pronouncing Biographical Dictionary, Philadelphia, 1871.

Biblical and common English names have been omitted.
